The next day after, he was sent unto the bishop, who first committed him to prison, called the Bishop's Prison; where he was kept in stocks and strong irons, with as much favour as a dog should find. Then the bishop associating unto him one Dr. Brewer, his chancellor, and others of his lewd clergy and friars, began to examine him, and to say, That contrary to the Catholic faith he denied praying to saints, and also denied the supremacy of the pope. Whereunto he answered in such sober manner, and so learnedly proved and defended his assertions, that he did not only confound and put to silence his adversaries, but also brought them in great admiration of him, the most part having pity and compassion on him. The friars took great pains with him to persuade him from his erroneous opinions, to recant and acknowledge his fault, touching the bills. But they did but dig after day; for God hath appointed him to be a blessed witness of his holy name, and to be at defiance with all their persuasions.

The officers searched his house for bills and books, and cruelly and shamefully handled his wife, charging her with divers enormities. But she, like a good woman, took all things patiently that they did unto her; like as in other things she was contented to bear the cross with him, as to fare hardly with him at home, and to live with coarse meat and drink, that they might be the more able somewhat to help the poor, as they did to the uttermost of their power.

Amongst all other priests and friars, Gregory Basset was most busy with him. This Gregory Basset was learned, and had a pleasant tongue, and not long before was fallen from the truth, for which he was imprisoned in Bristol long time, at whose examination was ordained a great pan of fire, where his holy brethren, as the report went abroad, menaced him to burn his hands off; whereupon he there before them recanted, and became afterwards a mortal enemy to the truth all his life. This Gregory, as it is said, was fervent with the poor man, to please the canons of that church, and marvellously tormented his brains how to turn him from his opinions; yea, and he was so diligent and fervent with him, that he would not depart the prison, but lay there night and day; who notwithstanding lost his labour; for good Benet was at a point not to deny Christ before men. So Gregory, as well as the other holy fathers, lost his spurs, insomuch that he said in open audience, that there was never so obstinate an heretic.

The principal point between Basset and him was touching the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, whom in his bills he named Antichrist, the thief, the mercenary, and murderer of Christ's flock; and these disputations lasted about eight days; where at sundry times repaired to him both the black and gray friars, with priests and monks of that city. They that had some learning, persuaded him to believe the church, and shewed by what tokens she is known. The others, unlearned, railed and said, that the devil tempted him; and spit upon him, calling him heretic. But he prayed to God to give them a better mind, and to forgive them: For, said he, I will rather die than worship such a beast, the very whore of Babylon, and a false usurper, as manifestly doth appear by his doings. They asked, What he did that he had not power and authority to do, being God's vicar?—He doth, quoth he, sell the sacraments of the church for money; he selleth remission of sins daily for money; and so do you likewise, for there is no day but ye say divers masses for souls in feigned purgatory; yea, and ye spare not to make lying sermons to the people, to maintain your false traditions, and foul gains. The whole world doth begin now to note your doings, to your utter confusion and shame.—The shame, say they, shall be to thee, and such as thou art, thou foul heretic. Wilt thou allow nothing done in holy church? What a perverse heretic art thou!—I am, said he, no heretic, but a Christian man, I thank Christ, and with all my heart will allow all things done and used in the church to the glory of God, and edifying of my soul; but I see nothing in your church, but that maintaineth the devil.—What is our church? said they.—It is not my church, quoth Benet; God give me grace to be of a better church, for verily your church is the plain church of Antichrist, the malignant church, the second church, a den of thieves, and awmy of poison, and as far wide from the true universal and apostolic church as heaven is distant from the earth.

Dost not thou think, said they, that we pertain to the universal church?—Yes, quoth he, but as dead members, unto whom the church is not beneficial: for your works are the devices of man, and your church a weak foundation; for ye say and preach, That the pope's word is equal with God's word in every degree.—Why, said they, did not Christ say to Peter, "To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven?"—He said that, quoth he, to all as well as to Peter; and Peter had no more authority given him than they, or else the churches planted in every kingdom by their preaching are no churches. Doth not St. Paul say, Upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets? Therefore I say plainly, that the church that is built upon a man, is the devil's church or congregation, and not God's. And as every church this day is appointed to be ruled by a bishop or pastor ordained by the word of God, in preaching and administration of the sacraments, under the prince the supreme governor under God; so, to say that all the churches, with their princes and governors, be subjects unto one bishop, is detestable heresy; and the pope, your god, challenging this power to himself, is the greatest schismatic that ever was in the church, and most foul whore; of whom John in the Revelation speaketh; chap. xvii. v. 1—18.

O thou blind and unlearned fool, said they, is not the confession and consent of all the world, as we confess and consent, That the pope's holiness is the supreme head and vicar of Christ?—That is, said Benet, because they are blinded and know not the scriptures: but if God would of his merey open the eyes of princes to know their office, his false supremacy would soon decay.—We think, said they, thou art so malicious, that thou wilt confess no church.—Look, said he, where they are that confess the true name of Jesus Christ, and where only Christ is the head, and under him the prince of the realm, to order all bishops, ministers, and preachers, and to see them do their duties in setting forth the only glory of God, by preaching the word of God; and where it is preached, that Christ is our only advocate, mediator, and patron, before God his Father, making intercession for us, and where the true faith and confidence in Christ's death and passion, and his only merits and deserving, are extolled, and our own depressed; where the sacrament is duly, without superstition or idolatry, administered in remembrance of his blessed passion, and only sacrifice upon the cross once for all, and where no superstition reigneth; of that church will I be.

Then said a black friar unto him, (God knoweth, a block-head,) Do we not preach the gospel daily?—Yes, said he; but what preaching of the gospel is that, when therewith ye extol superstitious things, and make us believe that we have redemption through pardons and bulls from Rome, a pena et culpa, as ye term it? and by the merits of your orders ye make many brethren and sisters, ye take yearly money of them, ye bury them in your coats, and in shrift ye beguile them; yea, and do a thousand superstitious things more; a man may be weary to speak of them.—I see, said the friar, thou art a damned wretch; I will have no more talk with thee.

Then stepped up a gray friar, a doctor, (God knoweth, of small intelligence,) and laid before him great and many dangers.—I take God to record, said Benet, my life is not dear to me, I am content to depart from it, for I am weary of it, seeing your detestable doings, to the utter destruction of God's flock, and for my part I can no longer forbear: I had rather by death (which I know is not far off) depart this life, that I may no longer be partaker of your detestable idolatries and superstitions, or be subject unto Antichrist your pope.—Our pope, said the friar, is the vicar of God, and our ways are the ways of God.—I pray you, said Benet, depart from me, and tell me not of your ways. He is only my way, which saith, I am the way, the truth, and the life. In this way will I walk, his doings shall be my example, not yours, nor your false popes. His truth will I embrace, not the lies and falsehood of you and your pope. His everlasting life will I seek, the true reward of all faithful people. Away from me, I pray you; vex my soul no longer; ye shall not prevail. There is no good example in you, no truth in you, no life to be hoped for at your hands. Ye are all more vain than vanity itself. If I should hear and follow you thus, everlasting death should hang over me, a just reward for all them that love the life of this world. Away from me, your company I like not.—Thus a whole week, night and day, was Benet plied by these and such other hypocrites.

It would be endless to declare all things done and said to him in the time of his imprisonment, and the hate of the people that time, by means of ignorance, was hot against him: notwithstanding, they could never move his patience. He answered to every matter soberly, and that more by the aid of God's Spirit than by any worldly study. I think he was at the least fifty years old. Being in prison, his wife provided sustenance for him, and when she lamented, he comforted her, and gave her many good and godly exhortations, and prayed her to move him nothing to apply unto his adversaries.

Thus when these goodly canons and priests, with the monks and friars, had done what they could, and perceived that he would by no means relent, then they proceeding unto judgment, drew out their bloody sentence against him, and condemned him, as the manner is, to be burned. Which being done, and the writ which they had procured De Comburendo, being brought from London, they delivered him the 15th of January, 1531, unto sir Thomas Denis, knight, then sheriff of Devonshire, to be burned.

The mild martyr rejoicing his end to approach so near, as the sheep before the shearer, yielded himself with all humbleness to abide and suffer the cross of persecution. And being brought to his execution, in a place called Livery-dole, without Exeter, he made his most humble confession and praye unto Almighty God, and requested all the people to do the like for him, whom he exhorted with such gravity and sobriety, and with such a pithy oration, to seek the true honouring of God, and the true knowledge of him; as also to leave the devices and imaginations of man's inventions; that all the hearers and beholders of him were astonished and in great admiration; insomuch that the most part of the people, as also the scribe who wrote the sentence of condemnation against him, did pronounce and confess that he was God's servant, and a good man.

Nevertheless, two esquires, namely, Thomas Carew and John Barnehouse, standing at the stake by him, first with fair promises and goodly words, but at length through threatenings, willed him to revoke his errors, and to call to our Lady and the saints, and to say, Precor Sanctam Mariam, et omnes Sanctos Dei, &c. To whom he with all meekness answered, saying, "No, no; it is God only upon whose name we must call, and we have no other advocate unto him but only Jesus Christ, who died for us, and now sitteth at the right hand of the Father, to be an advocate for us; and by him must we offer and make our prayers to God, if we will have them to take place, and be heard." With which answer the aforesaid Barnehouse was so enkindled, that he took a furze-bush upon a pike, and, being set on fire, thrust it unto his face, saying, "Ah, whoreson heretic! pray to our Lady, and say, Sancta Maria, ora pro nobis, "or, by God's wounds, I will make thee do it."

To whom the said Thomas Benet, with an humble and meek spirit, most patiently answered, "Alas, sir, trouble me not." And holding up his hands, he said, Pater, ignosce illis: Father, forgive them. Whereupon the gentlemen caused the wood and furzes to be set on fire, and therewith this godly man lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven; saying, O Domine, recipe spiritum meum: Lord, receive my spirit. And so continuing in his prayers, did never stir nor strive, but most patiently abode the cruelty of the fire, until his life was ended. For which the Lord be praised, and send us his grace and blessing, that at the latter day we may with him enjoy the bliss and joy provided and prepared for the elect children of God.

This Benet was burned in a jerkin of neat's leather; at whose burning (such was the fierce rage of the blind people) that well was he or she that could catch a stick or furze to cast into the fire.

Hitherto we have run over, good reader, the names, the acts, and doings, of them which have sustained death, and the torment of burning, for Christ's cause, through the rigorous proclamation above specified, set out in the name of king Henry, but indeed procured by the bishops; which proclamation was so straitly looked upon, and executed so to the uttermost in every point, by the said popish prelates, that no good man could peep out with his head never so little, but he was caught by the back, and brought either to the fire, (as were these above mentioned,) or else were compelled to abjure their religion: whereof there was a great multitude, as well men as women.

We now enter into the story of the good martyr of God, William Tindal; who, as he was a special organ of the Lord, appointed to shake the inward roots and foundation of the pope's proud prelacy; so the great prince of darkness, with his imps, having a special malice against him, left no way unsought how craftily to entrap him, and maliciously to spill his life; as by the process of his story here following may appear.

The LIFE and STORY of the true Servant and Martyr of God, WILLIAM TINDAL; who, for his notable pains and travel, may well be called the "Apostle of England, in the sixteenth Century."

William Tindal, the faithful minister and martyr of Christ, was born about the borders of Wales, some time before 1500, and brought up from a child in the university of Oxford, where he by long continuance increased as well in the knowledge of tongues and other liberal arts, as in the knowledge of the scriptures, whereunto his mind was singularly addicted; insomuch, that in Magdalen-hall he read privately to certain students and fellows of Magdalen-college, some parcel of divinity, instructing them in the knowledge and truth of the scriptures; whose manners also and conversation being correspondent to the same, were such, that all they that knew him reputed and esteemed him to be a man of most virtuous disposition, and unspotted life.

From the university of Oxford he removed to Cambridge, where after he had likewise made his abode a certain space, being now further ripened in the knowledge of God's word, he left that university also, and went to one Mr. Welch, a knight of Gloucestershire, and was there schoolmaster to his children, and in good favour with his master. This gentleman, as he kept a good ordinary commonly at his table, there resorted to him many times sundry abbots, deans, archdeacons, with divers other doctors and great benefited men; who there, together with Mr. William Tindal, sitting at the same table, did use many times to enter into conversation, and talk of learned men, as of Luther, and of Erasmus; also of divers controversies and questions upon the scripture.

Then Mr. Tindal, as he was learned and well practised in God's matters, so he spared not to shew unto them simply and plainly his judgment in matters: and when they at any time did vary from Tindal in opinions and judgment, he would shew them in the book, and lay plainly before them the open and manifest places of the scriptures, to confute their errors, and confirm his sayings. And thus continued they for a certain season, reasoning and contending together divers and sundry times, till at length they waxed weary, and bare a secret grudge in their hearts against him.

Not long after this, it happened that certain of these great doctors had invited Mr. Welch and his wife to a banquet; where they had talk at will and pleasure, uttering their ignorance without any gainsaying. Then Mr. Welch and his wife coming home, and calling for Mr. Tindal, began to reason with him about those matters, whereof the priest had talked before at their banquet. Mr. Tindal answering by scriptures, maintained the truth, and reproved their false opinions. Then said the lady Welch, a stout and a wise woman, as Tindal reported, "Well, there was such a doctor which may dispend an hundred pounds, and another two hundred pounds, and another three hundred pounds: and what, were it reason, think you, that we should believe you before them?" Mr. Tindal gave her no answer at that time; and also after that, because he saw it would not avail, he talked but little in those matters. At that time he was about the translation of a book called Enchiridion Militis Christiani, which being translated, he delivered to his master and lady; who, after they had read and well perused the same, the prelates were not called so often to the house, neither had they the cheer and countenance when they came, as before they had. Which they perceiving, and supposing no less but it came by the means of Mr. Tindal, refrained themselves, and at last utterly withdrew, and came no more there.

As this grew on, the priests of the country clustering together, began to storm against Tindal, railing against him in ale-houses and other places. Of whom Tindal himself, in his prologue before the first book of Moses, thus testifieth in his own words, and reporteth that he suffered much in that country by a sort of unlearned priests, being full rude and ignorant, saith he, God knoweth; which have seen no more Latin, than that only which they read in their proses and missals, which yet many of them can scarcely read, except it be Albertus de Secretis Mulierum, in which yet, though they be never so sorrowfully learned, they pore day and night, and make notes therein, and all to teach the midwives, as they say; and also another, called Lindwood, a book of constitutions to gather tithes, mortuaries, offerings, customs, and other pillage, which they call not their's, but God's part, the duty of holy church, to discharge their consciences withal. For they are bound that they shall not diminish, but increase all things unto the uttermost of their powers, which pertain to holy church. Thus these blind and rude priests, flocking together to the ale-house, (for that was their preaching place,) raged and railed against him, affirming, that his sayings were heresy; adding, moreover, unto his sayings, of their own heads, more than ever he spake, and so accused him secretly to the chancellor, and certain of the bishop's officers.

It followed, not long after this, that there was a sitting of the bishop's chancellor appointed, and warning was given to the priests to appear, amongst whom Mr. Tindal was also warned. And whether he had any misdoubt by their threatenings, or knowledge given that they would lay some things to his charge, it is uncertain; but certain this is, as he himself declared, that he doubted their privy accusations; so that he by the way, in going thitherwards, cried in his mind heartily to God, to give him strength to stand fast in the truth of his words.

Then when the time came of his appearance before the chancellor, he threatened him grievously, reviling at him as though he had been a dog, and laid to his charge many things whereof no accuser yet could be brought forth, (as commonly their manner is, not to bring forth the accuser,) notwithstanding that the priests of the country the same time were present. And thus Mr. Tindal, after those examinations, escaping out of their hands, departed home, and returned to his master again.

There dwelt not far off a certain doctor, that had been an old chancellor before to a bishop, who had been an old familiar acquaintance with Mr. Tindal, and also favoured him well. Unto whom Mr. Tindal went, and opened his mind upon divers questions of the scripture; for to him he durst be bold to disclose his heart. Unto whom the doctor said, "Do ye not know that the pope is very Antichrist, whom the scripture speaketh of? But beware what you say; for if you shall be perceived to be of that opinion, it will cost you your life." And said, moreover, "I have been an officer of his; but I have given it up, and defy him and all his works."

It was not long after, but Mr. Tindal happened to be in the company of a certain divine, accounted a learned man; and in communing and disputing with him, he drove him to that issue, that the said great doctor burst out into these blasphemous words, and said, "We were better to be without God's laws than the Pope's." Mr. Tindal hearing this, full of godly zeal, and not bearing that blasphemous saying, replied again, and said, "I defy the pope, and all his laws;" and further added, That if God spared him life, ere many years, he would cause a boy that driveth the plough to know more of the scripture than he did.

After this, the grudge of the priests increasing still more against Tindal, they never ceased barking at him, and laid many things to his charge, saying, that he was an heretic in sophistry, an heretic in logic, an heretic in divinity; that he bare himself bold of the gentlemen there in that country; but, notwithstanding, shortly he should be otherwise talked withal. To whom Mr. Tindal answering again, thus said, That he was contented they should bring him into any country in all England, giving him ten pounds a year to live with, and binding him to no more but to teach children, and to preach.

To be short, Mr. Tindal being so molested and vexed in the country by the priests, was constrained to leave that country, and to seek another place; and so coming to Mr. Welch, he desired him of his good will that he might depart from him, saying on this wise to him, "Sir, I perceive that I shall not be suffered to tarry long here in this country, neither shall you be able, though you would, to keep me out of the hands of the spirituality; and also what displeasure might grow thereby to you by keeping me, God knoweth; for the which I should be right sorry."

So that in fine, Mr. Tindal, with the good-will of his master, departed, and soon came up to London, and there preached a while, according as he had done in the country before; then went to the city of Bristol, and preached in the common place called St. Austin's Green. At length, he bethinking himself of Cuthbert Tonstal, then bishop of London, and especially for the great commendation of Erasmus, who in his annotations so extolled him for his learning, thus cast with himself, that if he might attain unto his service, he were a happy man. And so coming to Sir Henry Gilford, the king's comptroller, and bringing with him an oration of Socrates, which he had then translated out of Greek into English, he desired him to speak to the said bishop of London for him: which he also did, and willed him moreover to write an epistle to the bishop, and to go himself with him; which he did likewise, and delivered his epistle to a servant of his, named William Hebblethwaite, a man of his old acquaintance. But God, who secretly disposeth the course of things, saw that was not the best for Tindal's purpose, nor for the profit of his church; and therefore gave him to find little favour in the bishop's sight. The answer of whom was this, That his house was full, he had more than he could well find, and advised him to seek in London abroad, where he said he could lack no service, &c. And so remained he in London the space almost of a year, beholding and marking with himself the course of the world, and especially the demeanour of the preachers, how they boasted themselves, and set up their authority and kingdom; beholding also the pomp of the prelates, with other things more, which greatly displeased him. Insomuch that he understood not only there to be no room in the bishop's house for him to translate the New Testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all England. And, therefore, finding no place for his purpose within the realm, and having some aid and provision, by God's providence, ministered unto him by Humphrey Monmouth, and certain other good men, he took his leave of the realm, and departed into Germany. Where the good man, being inflamed with a tender care and zeal of his country, refused no labour nor diligence, how by all means possible to reduce his countrymen to the same taste and understanding of God's holy word, which the Lord had ended him withal.

Whereupon he considering in his mind, and partly also conferring with John Frith, thought with himself no way more to conduce thereunto, than if the scripture were turned into the vulgar speech, that the poor people might also read and see the simple plain word of God. For first, he wisely casting in his mind, perceived by experience how that it was not possible to establish the lay people in any truth, except the scripture were so plainly laid before their eyes in their mother tongue, that they might see the process, order, and meaning of the text; for else, whatsoever truth should be taught them, these enemies of the truth would quench it again, either with apparent reasons of sophistry and traditions of their own making, founded without all ground of scripture, or else, juggling with the text, expound it in such a sense as to render it impossible to gather of the text, if the right process, order, and meaning thereof, were seen.

For these and such other considerations this good man was moved (and no doubt stirred up of God) to translate the scripture into his mother tongue, for the public profit of the simple vulgar people of the country; first undertaking the New Testament, which he first translated about the year of our Lord 1527. After that, he took in hand to translate the Old Testament, finishing the five books of Moses, with sundry most learned and godly prologues prefixed before every one, most worthy to be read by all good Christians, as the like also he did upon the New Testament.

He wrote also divers other works under sundry titles, amongst which is that most worthy monument of his, entitled The Obedience of a Christian Man; wherein with singular dexterity he instructed all men in the office and duty of Christian obedience; with divers other treatises, as, The Wicked Mammon, The Practice of Prelates, with expositions upon certain parts of the scripture; and other books also answering to sir Thomas More, and other adversaries of the truth.

The books of William Tindal being compiled, published, and sent over into England, it cannot be spoken what a door of light they opened to the eyes of the whole English nation, which before were many years shut up in darkness.

At his first departing out of the realm he took his journey into the further parts of Germany, as into Saxony, where he had conference with Luther, and other learned men in those quarters; where after that he had continued a certain season, he came down from thence into the Netherlands, and dwelt in the town of Antwerp, until the time of his apprehension.

Amongst his other books which he compiled, one work he made also for the declaration of the sacrament (as it was then called) of the altar; which he kept by him, considering how the people were not as yet fully persuaded in other matters tending to superstitious ceremonies and gross idolatry. Wherefore he thought as yet time was not come to put forth that work, but rather that it should hinder the people from other instructions, supposing that it would seem to them odious to hear any such thing spoken, or set forth at that time, sounding against their great goddess Diana, that is, against their mass, being had every where in great estimation, as was the goddess amongst the Ephesians, whom they thought to come from heaven.

Wherefore Mr. Tindal, being both prudent in his doings, and no less zealous in the setting forth of God's holy truth, after such sort as it might take most effect with the people, did forbear the putting forth of that work, not doubting but by God's merciful grace a time should come to have that abomination openly declared, as it is at this present day; for which the Lord Almighty be always praised, Amen.

These godly books of Tindal, and especially the New Testament of his translation, after that they began to come into men's hands, and to spread abroad, as they wrought great and singular profit to the godly; so the ungodly, envying and disdaining that the people should be any thing wiser than they, and again, fearing lest by the shining beams of truth their hypocrisy and works of darkness should be discerned, began to stir with no small ado, like as, at the birth of Christ, Herod and all Jerusalem was troubled with him. But especially Satan the prince of darkness, envying the success of the gospel, set to his might also how to impeach and hinder the blessed labour of that man; as by this, and also by sundry other ways, may appear. For at what time Tindal had translated the fifth book of Moses, called Deuteronomium, minding to print the same at Hamburg, he sailed thitherward; where by the way, upon the coast of Holland, he suffered shipwreck, by which he lost all his books, writings, and copies, and so was compelled to begin all again anew. Thus having lost by that ship both money, his copies, and time, he came in another ship to Hamburg; where at his appointment Mr. Coverdale tarried for him, and helped him in the translation of the whole five books of Moses, from Easter to December, in the house of a worshipful widow, Mrs. Margaret Van Emmerson, anno 1529; a great sweating sickness being at the same time in the town. So having despatched his business at Hamburg, he returned afterwards to Antwerp.

When God's will was that the New Testament in the common tongue should come abroad, Tindal, the translator thereof, added to the latter end a certain epistle, wherein he desired them that were learned, to amend if ought were found amiss. Wherefore if any such default had been deserving correction, it had been the part of courtesy and gentleness for men of knowledge and judgment to have shewed their learning therein, and to have redressed that which was to be amended. But the spiritual fathers then being not willing to have the book to prosper, cried out that there were a thousand heresies in it, and that it was not to be corrected, but utterly to be suppressed. Some said it was not possible to translate the scripture into English; some, that it was not lawful for the lay people to have it in their mother-tongue; some, that it would make them all heretics. And to the intent to induce the temporal rulers also unto their purpose, they made matter, and said that it would make the people rebel against the king. All this Tindal himself, in his own prologue before the first book of Moses, declareth, and addeth further, shewing what great pains was taken in examining that translation, and comparing it with their own imaginations and terms, that with less labour he supposeth they might have translated themselves a great part of the Bible; shewing, moreover, that they scanned and examined every tittle and point in the said translation, in such sort, and so narrowly, that there was not one i therein, but if it lacked a dot over its head, they did note it, and numbered it unto the ignorant people for a heresy. So great were then the froward devices of the English clergy to drive the people from the text and knowledge of the scripture, which neither they would translate themselves, nor yet abide it to be translated by others; to the intent, as Tindal saith, that the world being kept still in darkness, they might sit in the consciences of the people, through vain superstition and false doctrine, to satisfy their lust, their ambition, and unsatiable covetousness, and to exalt their own honour above king and emperor, yea, and above God himself.

The bishops and prelates of the realm, thus incensed against the Old and New Testament of the Lord, newly translated by Tindal, and conspiring together with all their heads and counsels how to repeal the same, never rested before they had brought the king at last to their consent. By reason whereof a proclamation in all haste was devised and set forth under public authority, but no just reason shewed, that the Testament of Tindal's translation, with other works more, both of his and of other writers, were inhibited and abandoned, as ye heard before; which was about the year of our Lord 1527. And yet not contented herewith, they proceeded further, how to entangle him in their nets, and to bereave him of his life. Which how they brought to pass, now it remaineth to be declared.

William Tindal being in the town of Antwerp, had been lodged about one whole year in the house of Thomas Pointz, an Englishman, who kept there an house of English merchants. About which time came thither one out of England, whose name was Henry Philips, his father being customer of Poole; a comely fellow, like as he had been a gentleman, having a servant with him; but wherefore he came, or for what purpose he was sent thither, no man could tell.

Mr. Tindal divers times was invited to dinner and supper amongst the merchants; by the means whereof this Henry Philips became acquainted with him, so that within short space Mr. Tindal had a great confidence in him, and brought him to his lodging to the house of Thomas Pointz, and had him also once or twice with him to dinner and supper, and further entered into such friendship with him, that through his procurement he lay in the same house; to whom he shewed moreover his books and other secrets of his study; so little did Tindal then mistrust his traitor.

But Pointz having no great confidence in the fellow, as'ed Mr. Tindal how he came acquainted with this Philips? Mr. Tindal answered, that he was an honest man, handsomely learned, and very comfortable. Then Pointz, perceiving that he bare such favour to him, said no more, thinking that he was brought acquainted with him by some friend of his. The said Philips being in the town three or four days, upon a time desired Pointz to walk with him forth of the town to shew him the commodities thereof, and, in walking together without the town, had communication of divers things, and some of the king's affairs; by which talk Pointz as yet suspected nothing, but after, by the sequel of the matter, he perceived more what the other intended. In the mean time, this he well perceived, that he bare no great favour either to the setting forth of any good thing, or to the proceedings of the king of England. But after, when the time was past, Pointz perceived this to be his mind, to feel if he could perceive by him, whether he might break with him in the matter, for lucre of money to help him to his purpose: for he perceived before that he was monied, and would that Pointz should think no less; but by whom it was unknown. For he had desired Pointz before to help him to divers things, and such things as he named he required might be of the best; for, said he, I have money enough. But of this talk came nothing, but that men should think he had some things to do; for nothing else followed of his talk. So it was to be suspected, that Philips was in doubt to move this matter to any of the rulers or officers of the town of Antwerp, for fear it should come to the knowledge of some Englishmen, and by means thereof Mr. Tindal should have had warning.

So Philips went from Antwerp to the court of Brussels, which is from thence 24 English miles, the king having there no ambassador; for at that time the king of England and the emperor were at a controversy, for the question betwixt the king and the lady Catharine, who was aunt to the emperor, and the discord grew so much, that it was doubted lest there should have been war between the emperor and the king; so that Philips, as a traitor both against God and the king, was there the better retained, as also other traitors more besides him; who after he had betrayed Mr. Tindal into their hands, shewed himself likewise against the king's own person, and there set forth things against the king. To make short, the said Philips did so much there, that he procured to bring from thence with him to Antwerp the emperor's procuror-general, with other officers.

Within a while after, Pointz sitting at his door, Philips' man came unto him, and asked whether Mr. Tindal were there, and said his master would come to him; and so departed. But whether his master Philips were in the town or not, it was not known; but at that time Pointz heard no more, neither of the master nor of the man. Within three or four days after, Pointz went forth to the town of Barrow, being 18 English miles distant from Antwerp, where he had business to do for the space of a month or six weeks; and in the time of his absence, Henry Philips came again to Antwerp, to the house of Pointz, and coming in, spake with his wife, asking her for Mr. Tindal, and whether he would dine there with him; saying, what good meat shall we have? She answered, such as the market will give. Then went he forth again, as it is thought, to provide and set the officers, which he brought with him from Brussels, in the street and about the door. Then about noon he came again, and went to Mr. Tindal, and desired him to lend him forty shillings; for, said he, I lost my purse this morning in the passage between this and Mechlin. So Mr. Tindal took him forty shillings; which was easy to be had of him, if he had it, for in the wily subtleties of this world he was simple and unexpert.

Then said Philips, Mr. Tindal, you shall be my guest here to-day.—No, said Mr. Tindal, I go forth this day to dinner, and you shall go with me, and be my guest, where you shall be welcome. So when it was dinner time, Mr. Tindal went forth with Philips; and at the going out of Pointz's house was a long narrow entry, so that two could not go in a front. Mr. Tindal would have put Philips before him, but Philips would in no wise, but put Mr. Tindal before; for that he pretended to shew great humility. So Mr. Tindal, being a man of no great stature, went before, and Philips, a tall comely person, followed behind him; who had set officers on either side of the door upon two seats, who being there, might see who came in the entry; and coming through the same entry, Philips pointed with his finger over Mr. Tindal's head down to him, that the officers which sat at the door might see that it was he whom they should take; as the officers that took Mr. Tindal afterwards told Pointz, and said to Pointz when they had laid him in prison, that they pitied to see his simplicity when they took him.

Then they took him, and brought him to the emperor's attorney, or procuror-general, where he dined. Then came the procuror-general to the house of Pointz, and sent away all that was there of Mr. Tindal's, as well his books as other things, and from thence Tindal was had to the castle of Filford, 18 English miles from Antwerp; and there he remained until he was put to death.

Then, by the help of English merchants, were letters sent in the favour of Tindal to the court of Brussels. Also, not long after, letters were directed out of England to the council at Brussels, and sent to the merchant adventurers to Antwerp, commanding them to see that with speed they should be delivered.—Then such of the chief of the merchants as were there at that time being called together, required the said Pointz to take in hand the delivery of those letters, with letters also from them in favour of Mr. Tindal to the lord of Barrow and others: which lord of Barrow, as it was told Pointz by the way, at that time was departed from Brussels, as the chief conductor of the eldest daughter of the king of Denmark, to be married to the Palesgrave, whose mother was sister to the emperor, she being chief princess of Denmark. Who after he heard of his departure, did ride after the next way, and overtook him at Aehon, where he delivered to him his letters. The which when he had received and read, he made no direct answer, but somewhat objecting, said, there were of their countrymen that were burned in England not long before; (as indeed there were Anabaptists burned in Smithfield.) And so Pointz said to him, Howbeit, whatsoever the crime was, if his lordship or any other nobleman had written requiring to have had them, he thought they should not have been denied.—Well, said he, I have no leisure to write, for the princess is ready to ride.

Then said Pointz, If it shall please your lordship, I will attend upon you unto the next baiting-place, (which was at Maestricht.) If you do so, said the lord, I will advise myself by the way what to write. So Pointz followed him from Aehon to Maestricht, which are 15 English miles asunder; and there he received letters of him, one to the council there, another to the company of the merchant adventurers, and another also to the lord Cromwell in England.

So Pointz rode from thence to Brussels, and then and there delivered to the council the letters out of England, with the lord of Barrow's letters also, and received soon answer into England of the same letters; which he brought to Antwerp to the English merchants, who requested him to go with them into England. And he, very desirous to have Mr. Tindal out of prison, hesitated not to take pains, with loss of time in his own business, and diligently followed with the said letters, which he there delivered to the council; and was commanded by them to tarry until he had other letters, with which he was not despatched thence in a month after. At length the letters being delivered him, he returned again, and delivered them to the emperor's council at Brussels, and there tarried for answer of the same.

When the said Pointz had tarried three or four days, it was told him by one that belonged to the Chancery, that Mr. Tindal should have been delivered to him, according to the tenor of the letters: but Philips being there, followed the suit against Mr. Tindal; and hearing that he should be delivered to Pointz, and doubting lest he should be put from his purpose, he knew no other remedy but to accuse Pointz, saying, That he was a dweller in the town of Antwerp, and there had been a succourer of Tindal, and was one of the same opinion, and that all this was only his own labour and suit, to have Mr. Tindal at liberty, and no man's else.

Thus, upon his information and accusation, Pointz was attached by the procuror-general, the emperor's attorney, delivered to the keeping of two sergeants at arms; and the same evening was sent to him one of the chancery, with the procuror-general, who ministered to him an oath, that he should truly make answer to all such things as should be inquired of him, thinking they would have had no other examinations of him but of his message. The next day likewise they came again, and had him in examination, and so five or six days, one after another, upon not so few as an hundred articles, as well of the king's affairs as of the message concerning Tindal, of his aiders, and of his religion. Out of which examinations, the procuror-general drew twenty-three or twenty-four articles, and declared the same against the said Pointz, the copy whereof he delivered to him to make answer thereunto, and permitted him to have an advocate and proctor, that is, a doctor and proctor in the law; and order was taken, that eight days after he should deliver unto them his answer, and from eight days to eight days to proceed till the process were ended. Also, that he should send no messenger to Antwerp, where his house was, being 24 English miles from Brussels, where he was prisoner, nor to any other place, but by the post of the town of Brussels; nor to send any letters, nor any to be delivered to him, but written in Dutch, and the procuror-general, who was party against him, to read them, to peruse and examine them thoroughly, contrary to all right and equity, before they were sent or delivered; neither might any be suffered to speak or talk with Pointz in any other tongue or language, except only in the Dutch tongue, so that his keepers (who were Dutchmen,) might understand what the contents of the letters or talk should be. Saying, that at one certain time the provincial of the white friars came to dinner where Pointz was prisoner, and brought with him a young novice, being an Englishman, whom the provincial after dinner, of his own accord, did bid to talk with the said Pointz, and so with him he was licensed to talk: the purpose and great policy therein was easy to be perceived. Between Pointz and the novice was much pretty talk, as of sir Thomas More, and the bishop of Rochester. After this, Pointz delivered up his answer to the procuror-general, and then after, at the days appointed, went forth with replication duplie, with other answers, each to other, in writing, what they could.

As the commissioners came to Pointz, Philips, the traitor, accompanied them to the door in following the process against him, as he also did against Mr. Tindal. Thus Pointz for Mr. Tindal was sore troubled, and long kept in prison; but at length, when he saw no other remedy, by night he made his escape. But good Tindal could not escape their hands, but remained in prison still. Who being brought unto his answer, was offered to have an advocate and a proctor; for in any criminal cause there, it shall be permitted to have counsel, to make answer in the law. But he refused to have any such, saying, that he would answer for himself; and so he did.

At last, after much reasoning, when no reason would serve, although he deserved no death, he was condemned by virtue of the emperor's decree, made in the assembly at Augsburg; and upon the same brought forth to the place of execution, was there tied to the stake, and then strangled first by the hangman, and afterwards with fire consumed, in the morning, at the town of Filford, anno 1536, crying thus at the stake, with a fervent zeal and a loud voice, Lord, open the king of England's eyes!

Such was the power of his doctrine, and sincerity of his life, that during the time of his imprisonment, which endured a year and a half, it is said he converted his keeper, his daughter, and other of his household. Also, the rest that were with him conversant in the castle, reported of him, that if he were not a good Christian man, they could not tell whom to trust.

The procurator-general, the emperor's attorney, being there, left this testimony of him, That he was homo doctus, pius, et bonus, that is, a learned, a good, and a godly man.

As touching his translation of the New Testament, because his enemies did so much carp at it, pretending it to be so full of heresies: to answer therefore to their slanderous tongues and lying lips, thou shall hear and understand, what faithful dealing and sincere conscience he used in the same, by the testimony and allegation of his own words, written in the epistle of John Frith, as followeth, "I call God to record against the day we shall appear before our Lord Jesus, to give our reckoning of our doings, that I never altered one syllable of God's word against my conscience, nor would do this day, if all that is in earth, whether it be honour, pleasure, or riches, might be given me."

The HISTORY of that worthy Martyr JOHN LAMBERT, otherwise named NICHOLSON, with his Troubles, Examination, and Answers, as well before the Archbishop of Canterbury, Warham, and other Bishops; as also before King Henry the Eighth; by whom at length he was condemned to death, and burned in Smithfield, in 1538.

Immediately upon the ruin and destruction of the monasteries, the same year, and in the month of November, followed the trouble and condemnation of John Lambert, the faithful servant of Jesus Christ, and martyr of blessed memory. This Lambert being born and brought up in Norfolk, was first converted by Bilney, and studied in the university of Cambridge; where after that he had sufficiently profited both in the Latin and Greek, and had translated out of both tongues sundry things into the English tongue, being enforced at last by violence of the times, he departed from thence to the parts beyond the seas, to Tindal and Frith, and there remained the space of a year and more, being preacher and chaplain to the English house at Antwerp, till he was disturbed by Sir Thomas More, and by the accusation of one Barlow was carried from Antwerp to London; where he was brought to examination, first at Lambeth, then at the bishop's house at Oxford, before Warham, the archbishop of Canterbury, and other adversaries, having five-and-forty articles ministered against him, whereunto he rendered answer again by writing.

The answers of John Lambert, to the five and forty articles, were directed and delivered to Dr. Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, as it appeareth about the year of our Lord 1532, at what time the said Lambert was in custody in the archbishop's house at Oxford, being there destitute of all help and furniture of books, as by his own words is to be gathered. But so the providence of God wrought for Lambert, that within short space after, anno 1533, the said archbishop Warham died; whereby it seemeth that Lambert for that time was delivered. In this mean while, Dr. Cranmer was sent over in embassy with the earl of Wiltshire, Dr. Stokesley, Dr. Kern, Dr. Benet, and other learned men, to the Bishop of Rome, lying then at Bononia, to dispute the matter of the king's marriage openly, first in the court of Rome, then in the court of the emperor. Where, after sundry promises and appointments made, yet when the time came, no man there appeared to dispute with them, in these two propositions: First, that no man, jure divino, could or ought to marry his brother's wife. Secondly, That the bishop of Rome by no means ought to dispense to the contrary.

After the death of William Warham, succeeded in that see the said Dr. Cranmer. Lambert in the mean season being delivered, partly by the death of this archbishop, partly by the coming of queen Anne, returned unto London, and there exercised himself about the Stocks, in teaching children both in the Greek and Latin tongue. And forso-much as priests in those days could not be permitted to have wives, he left his priesthood, and applied himself to that function of teaching, intending shortly after also to be free of the Grocers' company, and to be married. But God, who disposeth all men's purposes after the secret pleasure of his own will, did both intercept his marriage, and also his freedom, and married him to his Son Christ Jesus, as now consequently followeth to be declared. Thus then, after that John Lambert now had continued in his vocation of teaching, with great commendation, and no less advantage to the youth; it happened this present year, 1538, he was present at a sermon, in St. Peter's church at London. He that preached was named Dr. Taylor, a man in those days not far disagreeing from the gospel, and afterwards in the time of king Edward was made bishop of Lincoln, but at last, in the time of queen Mary, was deprived from the same, and so ended his life among the confessors of Jesus Christ.

When the sermon was done, Lambert having gotten opportunity, went gently unto the preacher to talk with him, and uttered divers arguments wherein he desired to be satisfied. All the whole matter or controversy was concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. Taylor excusing himself at that present for other business, willed him to write his mind, and to come again at more leisure.

Lambert was contented, and so departed; who, within a while after, when he had written his mind, came again unto him. The sum of his arguments were ten, which he comprehended in writing, approving the truth of the cause, partly by the scriptures, and partly by good reason, and by the doctors. Which arguments, although they came not all unto our hands, yet such men as were present at those affairs reported them to be of great force and authority. And of a few which were borne away in memory, the first reason was this which followeth, gathered upon Christ's words, where it is said in the gospel, "This cup is the new testament," &c.

And if, saith he, these words do not change neither the cup, neither the wine, corporally into the New Testament, by like reason it is not agreeable that the words spoken of the bread, should turn the bread corporally into the body of Christ.

Another reason was this: That it is not agreeable to a natural body to be in two places or more at one time: wherefore it must follow of necessity, that either Christ had not a natural body, or else truly according to the common nature of a body it cannot be present in two places at once, and much less in many, that is to say, in heaven and in earth, on the right hand of his Father, and in the sacrament.

Moreover, a natural body cannot be without his form and shape, conditions and accidents, like as the accidents and conditions also cannot be without their subject or substance. Then forasmuch as in the sacrament there is no quality, quantity, or condition of the body of Christ, and finally no appearance at all of flesh; who doth not very plainly perceive that there is no transubstantiate body of his in the sacrament? And to reason by the contrary: all the proper conditions, signs, and accidents, whatsoever they be, pertaining to bread, we do see to be present in the sacrament, which cannot be there without the subject; therefore we must of necessity confess the bread to be there. He added also many other allegations out of the doctors.

But to be short, this Taylor, the preacher, whom I spoke of before, willing and desiring, as is supposed, of a good mind to satisfy Lambert in this matter, amongst other whom he took to counsel, he also conferred with Dr. Barns. Which Barns, although he did otherwise favour the gospel, and was an earnest preacher, notwithstanding seemed not greatly to favour this cause, fearing peradventure that it would breed some hinderance among the people to the preaching of the gospel, which was now in a good forwardness, if such sacramentaries should be suffered: he persuaded Taylor by and by to refer the matter to Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury.

Upon these originals Lambert's quarrel first began, and was brought unto this point, That through the sinister doing of many, it began of a private talk to be a public and common matter. For he was sent for by the archbishop, and brought into the open court, and forced to defend his cause openly; for the archbishop had not yet favoured the doctrine of the sacrament, whereof afterwards he was an earnest professor. In that disputation it is said, that Lambert did appeal from the bishops to the king's majesty.

King Henry, for two years past, having shewed the part of an hard husband, at last beheaded queen Anne his wife. Which deed did not only greatly displease the German princes, (who for that only cause had broken off the league with him, anno 1536,) but also many good men in England.

A short time after this, abbeyes began to be subverted, and all their goods to be confiscated and given abroad. For which causes, but especially for the late rejection of the bishop of Rome, the commons had conceived a very evil opinion of him, insomuch that the seditious sort rebelled against him.

At that time Stephen Gardiner, then bishop of Winchester, was in authority amongst the king's counsellors; who, as he was of a cruel nature, so was he no less of a subtle and crafty wit, ever looking for some occasion how to hinder the gospel; however, he was not long so greatly esteemed by the king, that he could much prevail to achieve his conceived purpose. But at length, upon this matter he thought he had a proper opportunity to accomplish his desire; he went straight unto the king, privily admonishing him, and with fair flattering words giving him most pernicious counsel; declaring how great hatred and suspicion were raised upon him in almost all places.

First, for abolishing the bishop of Rome's authority, then for subversion of the monasteries, and also for that the divorce of queen Katharine was yet fresh in men's minds: and now the time served, if he would take it, easily to remedy all these matters, and pacify the minds of them which were displeased and offended with him, if only in this matter of John Lambert he would manifest unto the people how stoutly he would resist heretics; and thus he should discharge himself of all suspicion.

The king, giving ear more willingly than prudently or godlyly to this syren, immediately received the wicked counsel of the bishop, and by and by sent out a general commission, commanding all the nobles and bishops of his realm to come with all speed to London, to assist the king against heretics and heresies, which the king himself would sit in judgment upon.

These preparations made, a day was set for Lambert, where a great assembly of the nobles was gathered from all parts of the realm, not without much wonder and expectation in this so strange a case. All the seats and places were full of men round about the scaffold.

By and by the godly servant of Christ, John Lambert, was brought from the prison with a guard of armed men, even as a lamb to fight with many lions, and placed right over against where the king's royal seat was, so that now they tarried but for the king's coming to that place.

At last the king himself did come as judge of that great controversy, with a great guard, clothed all in white, and covering by that colour and dissembling the severity of bloody judgment.

On his right hand sat the bishops, and behind them the famous lawyers, clothed all in purple. On the left hand sat the peers of the realm, justices, and other nobles, in their order; behind whom sat the gentlemen of the king's privy chamber. And this was the manner and form of the judgment, which though it was terrible enough of itself to abash any innocent; yet the king's look, his cruel countenance, and his brows bent unto severity, did not a little augment this terror, plainly declaring a mind full of indignation far unworthy such a prince, especially in such a matter, and against so humble and obedient a subject.

When the king was sat in his throne, he beheld Lambert with a stern countenance, and then turning himself unto his counsellors, he called forth Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, commanding him to declare unto the people the causes of this present assembly and judgment.

The whole effect of this oration tended in a manner to this purpose: That the king in this session would have all states, degrees, bishops, and all others, to be admonished of his will and pleasure, that no man should conceive any sinister opinion of him, that, now the authority and name of the bishop of Rome being utterly abolished, he would also extinguish all religion, or give liberty unto heretics, to trouble the churches of England, without punishment; whereof he is the head. And, moreover, that they should not think that they were assembled at that present, to make any disputation upon the heretical doctrine; but only for this purpose, that by the industry of him and other bishops, the heresies of this man here present, (meaning Lambert,) and the heresies of all such like, should be refuted or openly condemned in the presence of them all.

When he had made an end of his oration, the king standing up upon his feet, leaning upon a cushion of white cloth of tissue, turning himself toward Lambert with his brows bent, as it were threatening some grievous thing to him, said these words, Ho, good fellow! what is thy name? Then the humble lamb of Christ, humbly kneeling down upon his knees, said, My name is John Nicholson, although of many I be called Lambert.—What, (said the king,) have you two names? I would not trust you having two names, although you were my brother.—Lambert: O most noble prince, your bishops forced me of necessity to change my name.

And after divers prefaces and much talk had in this manner, the king commanded him to go unto the matter, and to declare his mind and opinion, what he thought as touching the sacrament of the altar.

Then Lambert, beginning to speak for himself, gave God thanks, which had so inclined the heart of the king, that he himself would not disdain to hear and understand the controversies of religion; for that it happeneth oftentimes, through the cruelty of the bishops, that many good and innocent men in many places are privily murdered, and put to death, without the king's knowledge.

But now forasmuch as that high and eternal King of kings, in whose hands are the hearts of all princes, hath inspired and stirred up the king's mind, that he himself will be present to understand the causes of his subjects, specially whom God of his divine goodness hath so abundantly endued with so great gifts of judgment and knowledge, he doth not mistrust but that God will bring some great thing to pass through him, to the setting forth of the glory of his name.

Then the king, with an angry voice, interrupting his oration: I came not hither, said he, to hear mine own praises thus painted out in my presence; but briefly go to the matter, without any more circumstance. This he spake in Latin.

But Lambert being abashed at the king's angry words, contrary to all men's expectation, stayed a while, considering whither he might turn himself in these great straits and extremities.

But the king being hasty, with anger and vehemency said, Why standest thou still? answer as touching the sacrament of the altar: whether dost thou say, That it is the body of Christ, or wilt deny it? And with that word the king lifted up his cap.

Lambert. I answer with St. Augustine, That it is the body of Christ, after a certain manner.

The king. Answer me neither out of St. Augustine, neither by the authority of any other, but tell me plainly, whether thou sayest it is the body of Christ or no? These words the king spake again in Latin.

Lambert. Then I do deny it to be the body of Christ.

The king. Mark well, for now thou shalt be condemned even by Christ's own words, Hoc est corpus meum.

Then he commanded Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, to refute his assertion; who, first making a short preface unto the hearers, began his disputation with Lambert very modestly, saying, Brother Lambert, let this matter be handled between us indifferently, that if I do convince this your argument to be false by the scripture, you will willingly refuse the same; but if you shall prove it true by the manifest testimonies of the scripture, I do promise I will willingly embrace the same.

The argument was this, taken out of that place of the Acts of the Apostles, where as Christ appeared unto St. Paul by the way: disputing out of that place, that it is not disagreeable to the word of God, that the body of Christ may be in two places at once, which being in heaven was seen of St. Paul the same time upon earth; and if it may be in two places, why by the like reason may it not be in many places.

In this manner the archbishop began to refute the second argument of Lambert, which, as we have before said, was written and delivered by the said Lambert unto the preacher; for the king had first disputed against his first reason.

Lambert answered unto this argument, saying, That the minor was not thereby proved, that Christ's body was dispersed in two places or more, but remaineth rather still in one place, as touching the manner of his body. For the scripture doth not say, that Christ being upon the earth did speak unto Paul; but "That suddenly a light from heaven did shine round about him, and he falling to the ground heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? I am Jesus whom thou persecutest," &c. Here this place doth nothing let but that Christ, sitting in heaven, might speak unto Paul, and be heard upon earth; for they which were with Paul verily heard the voice, but did see no body.

The archbishop, on the contrary part, said, Paul himself doth witness, Acts ix. and xxvi. that Christ did appear unto him in the same vision.

But Lambert again said, that Christ did witness in the same place, "That he would again appear unto him, and deliver him out of the hands of the Gentiles:" notwithstanding, we read in no place that Christ did corporally appear unto him.

Thus, when they had contended about the conversion of St. Paul, and Lambert so answering for himself, that the king seemed greatly to be moved therewith, and the bishop himself that disputed to be entangled, and all the audience amazed; then the bishop of Winchester, which was appointed the sixth place of the disputation, fearing lest the argument should be taken out of his mouth, or rather being drowned with malice against the poor man, without the king's commandment, observing no order, before the archbishop had made an end, unshamefacedly kneeling down to take in hand the disputation, alleged a place out of the twelfth chapter of the Corinthians, where St. Paul saith, "Have I not seen Jesus?" and again in the fifteenth chapter: "He appeared unto Cephas; and afterwards unto James, then to all the apostles; but last of all he appeared unto me, as one born out of due time."

Hereunto Lambert answered, he did nothing doubt but that Christ was seen and did appear; but he did deny that he was in two or in divers places according to the manner of his body.

Then again the king and the bishops raged against Lambert, insomuch that he was not only forced to silence, but also might have been driven into a rage, if his ears had not been acquainted with such taunts afore. After this, the other bishops, every one in his order, as they were appointed, supplied their places of disputation.

There were appointed ten in number, for the performing of this tragedy; for his ten arguments, which, as before we have declared, were delivered unto Taylor the preacher. It were too long in this place to repeat the reasons and arguments of every bishop; and no less superfluous, especially as they were all but common reasons, and nothing forcible, and such as by the long use of disputation have been beaten, and had little in them either worthy of the hearer or the reader.

Lambert in the mean time being compassed in with so many and great perplexities, vexed on the one side with checks and taunts, and pressed on the other side with the authority and threats of the personages; and partly being amazed with the majesty of the place in the presence of the king; and especially being wearied with long standing, which continued no less than five hours, from twelve o'clock until five at night; being brought in despair, that he should nothing profit in this purpose, and seeing no hope at all in speaking, was at this point that he chose rather to hold his peace.

Whereby it came to pass, that these bishops which last of all disputed with him, spake what they listed without interruption, save only that Lambert would now and then allege somewhat out of St. Augustine for the defence of his cause; in which author he seemed to be very prompt and ready. But for the most part, as I said, being evercome with weariness and other griefs, he held his peace, defending himself rather with silence, than with arguments which he saw would nothing at all prevail.

At the last, when the day was passed, and torches began to be lighted, the king minding to break up this pretended disputation, said unto Lambert in this wise, What sayest thou now, after all these great labours which thou hast taken upon thee, and all the reasons and instructions of these learned men? Art thou not yet satisfied? wilt thou live or die? what sayest thou? Thou hast yet free choice.

Lambert answered, I yield and submit myself wholly unto the will of your majesty.

Then, said the king, commit thyself unto the hands of God, and not unto mine.

Lambert: I commend my soul unto the hands of God, but my body I wholly yield and submit unto your clemency.

Then said the king, If you do commit yourself unto my judgment, you must die; for I will not be a patron unto heretics. And turning himself unto Cromwell, he said, Cromwell, read the sentence of condemnation against him. This Cromwell was at that time the chief friend of the gospellers.

And here it is much to be marvelled at, to see how unfortunately it came to pass in this matter, that through the pestiferous and crafty counsel of this one bishop of Winchester, Satan, which oftentimes doth raise up one brother to the destruction of another, did here perform the condemnation of this Lambert by no other ministers than gospellers themselves, Taylor, Barnes, Cranmer, and Cromwell; who afterwards, in a manner, all suffered the like for the gospel's sake.

This undoubtedly was the malicious and crafty subtlety of the bishop of Winchester, which desired rather that the sentence might be read by Cromwell, than by any other; so that if he refused to do it, he should likewise have incurred the like danger. But, to be short, Cromwell, at the king's commandment, taking the schedule of condemnation in hand, read the same; wherein was contained the burning of heretics, which either spake or wrote any thing, or had any books by them, repugnant or disagreeing from the papistical church and tradition touching the sacrament of the altar; also a decree that the same should be set upon the church porches, and be read four times in every year, in every church throughout the realm, whereby the worshipping of the bread should be the more firmly fixed in the hearts of the people. And in this manner was the condemnation of John Lambert. Wherein great pity it was, and much to be lamented, to see the king's highness that day so to oppose and set his power and strength so fiercely and vehemently, in assisting so many proud and furious adversaries against one poor soul.

But thus was John Lambert, in this bloody session, by the king judged and condemned to death; whose judgment now remaineth with the Lord against that day, when, before the tribunal seat of that great Judge, both princes and subjects shall appear, not to judge, but to be judged, according as they have done and deserved.

Upon the day that was appointed for this holy martyr of God to suffer, he was brought out of the prison at eight of the clock in the morning unto the house of the lord Cromwell, and so carried into his inward chamber, where, it is reported by many, that Cromwell desired of him forgiveness for what he had done.—There at the last, Lambert being admonished that the hour of his death was at hand, he was greatly comforted and cheered; and being brought out of the chamber into the hall, he saluted the gentlemen, and sat down to breakfast with them, shewing no manner of sadness or fear. When the breakfast was ended, he was carried straightway to the place of execution, where he should offer himself unto the Lord for a sacrifice of sweet savour, who is blessed in his saints for ever and ever.

As touching the terrible manner and fashion of the burning of this blessed martyr, here is to be noted, that of all other which have been burned and offered up at Smithfield, there was yet none so cruelly and piteously handled as he. For, after that his legs were consumed and burned up to the stumps, and that the wretched tormentors and enemies of God had withdrawn the fire from him, so that but a small fire and coals were left under him, then two that stood on each side of him, with their halberts pitched him upon their pikes, as far as the chain would reach. Then he lifting up such hands as he had, and his fingers' ends flaming with fire, cried unto the people in these words, "None but Christ! none but Christ! and so being let down again from their halberts, fell into the fire, and there ended his life.

Reader! magnify God, that popish kings, and popish prelates, have no longer any jurisdiction in these realms; and pray earnestly to him, that all obstructions to the investigation and avowal of religious truth, from the civil powers, may cease, to the ends of the earth!

The Death of Robert Packington.

Amongst other acts and matters passed and done this present year, which is of the Lord 1538, here is not to be silenced the unworthy and lamentable death of Robert Pack- ington, mercer, of London, wrought and caused by the enemies of God's word and of all good proceedings. The story is this: the said Robert Packington, being a man of substance, and dwelling in Cheapside, used every day at five o'clock, summer and winter, to go to pray at a church then called St. Thomas of Acres, but now named Mercers' Chapel; and one morning amongst all other being a great misty morning, such as hath seldom been seen, even as he was crossing the street from his house to the church, he was suddenly murdered with a gun, which by the neighbours was plainly heard, and by a great number of labourers standing at Soper-lane end; he was both seen to go forth of his house, and the clap of the gun was heard, but the deed-doer was a great while unknown. Although many in the mean time were suspected, yet none could be found faulty therein, the murderer so covertly was conveyed; till at length, by the confession of Dr. Incent, dean of Paul's, on his death-bed, it was known, and by him confessed, that he himself was the author thereof, by hiring an Italian for forty crowns, or thereabout, to do the feat. For the testimony whereof, and also for the repentant words of the said Incent, the names both of them which heard him confess it, and of them which heard the witnesses report it, remain yet in memory.

The cause why he was so little favoured with the clergy, was this: For that he was known to be a man of great courage, and one time could both speak and also would be heard; for at the same time he was one of the burgesses of the parliament for the city of London, and had talked somewhat against the covetousness and cruelty of the clergy; wherefore he was had in contempt with them, and was thought also to have some talk with the king, for which he was the more had in disdain with them, and murdered by the said Dr. Incent, for his labour, as hath been above declared.

And thus much of Robert Packington, who was the brother of Augustine Packington before mentioned, who deceived bishop Tonstal in buying the new translated Testament of Tindal; whose piteous murder, although it was private and sudden, yet hath it so pleased the Lord not to keep it in darkness, but to bring it at length to light.

The Burning of one Collins, at London.

Neither is here to be omitted the burning of one Collins, sometime a lawyer, and a gentleman, who suffered the fire this year also in Smithfield, anno 1538. Whom although I do not here recite as in the number of God's professed martyrs, yet neither do I think him to be clean sequestered from the company of the Lord's saved flock and family, notwithstanding that the bishop of Rome's church did condemn and burn him for an heretic; but rather do recount him therefore, as one belonging to the holy company of saints. At leastwise this case of him, and of his end, may be thought to be such, as may well reprove and condemn their cruelty and madness, in burning so without discretion this man, being mad and distracted of his perfect wits, as he then was by this occasion, as here followeth.

This gentleman had a wife of exceeding beauty and comeliness, but notwithstanding, of so light behaviour and unchaste conditions, that she forsaking her husband, who loved her greatly, betook herself unto another paramour. Which when he understood, he took it very grievously and heavily, more than reason would. At last, being overcome with exceeding sorrow and heaviness, he fell mad, being at that time a student of the law in London. When he was thus deprived of his reason, by chance he came into a church, where the priest was saying mass, and was come to the place where they used to hold up and shew the sacrament : Collins, being beside his wits, seeing the priest holding up the host over his head, and shewing it to the people, he in like manner counterfeiting the priest, took up a little dog by the legs, and held him over his head, shewing him unto the people. And for this he was by and by brought to examination, and condemned to the fire, and was burned, and the dog with him, the same year of our Lord in which John Lambert was burned, 1538.

With this aforesaid Collins may also be adjoined the burning of Cowbridge, who likewise being mad and beside his right senses, was either the same or the next year following condemned by Longland, bishop of Lincoln, and committed to the fire by him to be burnt at Oxford. What his opinions and articles were wherewith he was charged, it needeth not here to rehearse ; for as he was then a man mad, and destitute of sense and reason, so his words and sayings could not be sound. Yea, rather, what wise man would ever collect articles against him, which said, He could not tell what. And if his articles were so horrible and mad as Cope in his Dialogues doth declare them, then was he in my judgment a man more fit to be sent to Bedlam, than to be had to the fire in Smithfield to be burned. For what reason is it to require reason of a creature mad or unreasonable, or to make heresy of the words of a senseless man, not knowing what he affirmed?

But this is the manner and property of this holy mother church of Rome, that whatsoever cometh into their hands and inquisition, to the fire it must go. There is no other way ; neither pity that will move, nor excuse that will serve, nor age that they will spare, nor any respect almost that they consider, as by these two miserable examples, both of Collins and Cowbridge, it may appear. Who rather should have been pitied, and all ways convenient sought how to reduce the silly wretches into their right minds again, according as the true pastors of Israel be commanded by the Spirit of God, to seek again the things that be lost, and to bind up the things that be broken.

But to end with this matter of Cowbridge ; whatsoever his madness was before, or however erroneous his articles were, yet as touching his end, that is certain, that in the midst of the flame, he lifting up his head to heaven, soberly and discreetly called upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and so departed.

William Leiton, and Puttedew, Martyrs.

About the same time and year, or not much before, when John Lambert suffered at London, there was one Puttedew also condemned to the fire in Suffolk ; who coming into the church, and merrily telling the priest, That after he had drunk up all the wine, alone, he afterwards blessed the hungry people with the empty chalice ; was for the same immediately apprehended, and shortly after hurned, leaving to us an experiment, Quam parum sit tutum ludere cum sanctis ; How unsafe it is to jest with the saints ; as the old saying was then : but rather, as we may say now, Quam male tutum sit ludere cum impiis ; How very unsafe it is to sport with the wicked.

To the other : William Leiton was a monk of Aye, in the county of Suffolk, and was burned at Norwich, for speaking against a certain idol which was accustomed to be carried about the processions at Aye ; and also for holding that the sacramental supper ought to be administered in both kinds ; about the year and time aforesaid.

In the burning of another Suffolk man, named N. Peke, dwelling sometimes at Earlestoneham, and burnt at Ipswich, somewhat before the burning of these aforesaid, thus I find it recorded : That when he being fast bound to a stake, and furze set on fire round about him, was so scorched, that he was as black as any soot, one Dr. Reading there standing before him, with Dr. Heyre and Dr. Springwell, having a long white wand in his hand, did knock him upon his right shoulder, and said, "Peke, recant, and believe that the sacrament of the altar is the very body of Christ, flesh, blood, and bone, after that the priest hath spoken the words of consecration over it, and here have I in my hand to absolve thee for thy misbelief that hath been in thee ;" having a scroll of paper in his hand. When he had spoken these words, Peke answered and said, "I defy it, and thee also ;" and with a great violence he spit from him very blood, which came by reason that his veins brake in his body for extreme anguish. And when the said Peke had so spoken, then Dr. Reading said, To as many as shall cast a stick to the burning of this heretic, is granted forty days of pardon by my lord bishop of Norwich.

Then baron Cnrson, Sir John Audley, knight, with many others of estimation, being there present, did rise from their seats, and with their swords did cut down boughs, and throw them into the fire ; and so did all the multitude of the people.

Some Account of the Life and Death of LORD THOMAS CROMWELL.

One of the greatest supports of the true religion, and the most zealous forwarder of the Reformation, was Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, who was the son of a blacksmith at Putney, and born in the year 1498. Though he had little advantage from education, yet having a fine natural understanding, he rose by degrees into the confidential favourite, and at last prime minister, of Henry VIII. and from the moment he possessed any influence in the cabinet, he employed it in promoting the Reformation, to his zeal for which he became at last a victim : for the more firmly to promote the Protestant cause, he contrived to marry the king to Anne of Cleves, whose friends were all Lutherans. Unfortunately, Henry took a disgust to this lady, which brought on Cromwell's ruin ; the king, with his usual caprice and cruelty, taking this opportunity to sacrifice his minister to the Roman Catholic party, to whom he seemed desirous to reconcile himself as soon as he had Catharine Howard in view. In his zeal for Protestantism, Cromwell had introduced the unjustifiable mode of attainder in cases of treason and heresy ; and his enemies (the ancient nobility and the Catholics) having preferred many complaints against him, availed themselves of his own law. He was attainted of treason and heresy, of neither of which he could be proved guilty ; however, he was convicted unheard, and beheaded in 1540.

He was a great and good man, and the chief instrument of the suppression of the abbeyes and monasteries, and of the destruction of images and relics. To him also we are indebted for the institutions of parish registers of births, marriages, and burials. The following prayer, repeated by him a few minutes before he was beheaded, gives us a very favourable opinion both of the soundness of his understanding, and the piety of his heart.

"O Lord Jesus, which art the only health of all men living, and the everlasting life of them which die in thee ; I, wretched sinner, do submit myself wholly unto thy most blessed will, and being sure that the thing cannot perish which is committed unto thy mercy, I now willingly leave this frail and wicked flesh, in sure hope that thou wilt in better wise restore it to me again at the last day, in the resurrection of the just. I beseech thee, most merciful Lord Jesus Christ, that thou wilt by thy grace make strong my soul against all temptations, and defend me with the buckler of thy mercy against all the assaults of the devil. I see and acknowledge that there is in myself no hope of salvation, but all my confidence, hope, and trust, is in thy most merciful goodness. I have no merits nor good works which I may allege before thee. Of sins and evil works, alas, I see a great heap; but yet through thy mercy I trust to be in the number of them to whom thou wilt not impute their sins, but wilt take and accept me for righteous and just, and to be the inheritor of everlasting life. Thou, merciful Lord, wert born for my sake; thou didst both suffer hunger and thirst for my sake; thou didst teach, pray, and fast, for my sake; all thy holy actions and works thou wroughtest for my sake; thou sufferedst most grievous pains and torments for my sake; finally, thou gavest thy most precious body and thy blood to be shed on the cross for my sake. Now, most merciful Saviour, let all these things profit me, which hast given thyself also for me. Let thy blood cleanse and wash away the spots and foulness of my sins. Let thy righteousness hide and cover my unrighteousness. Let the merits of thy passion and bloodshedding be satisfaction for my sins. Give me, Lord, thy grace, that the faith of my salvation in thy blood waver not in me, but may ever be firm and constant. That the hope of thy mercy and life everlasting never decay in me, that love wax not cold in me. Finally, that the weakness of my flesh be not overcome with the fear of death. Grant me, merciful Saviour, that when death hath shut up the eyes of my body, yet the eyes of my soul may still behold and look upon thee; and when death hath taken away the use of my tongue, yet my heart may cry and say unto thee, Lord, into thy hands I commend my soul; Lord Jesus, receive my spirit, Amen."

And thus having finished his prayer, after he had piously and lovingly exhorted them that were about him on the scaffold, he quietly committed his soul into the hands of God, and so patiently suffered the stroke of the axe.

The History of ROBERT BARNES, THOMAS GARRET, and WILLIAM HIEROME, Divines.

Like as, in foreign battles, the chief point of victory consisteth in the safety of the general or captain; even so when the valiant standard-bearer and stay of the church of England, Thomas Cromwell I mean, was made away, pity it is to behold what miserable slaughter of good men and good women ensued thereupon, whereof we have now to treat. For Winchester having not gotten his full purpose, and free swing to exercise his cruelty, wonder it was to see, that Aper Calydonius, (or, as the scripture speaketh, that wild boar,) what troubles he raised in the Lord's vineyard. And lest by delays he might lose the occasion presently offered, he straightways made his first assaults upon Robert Barnes, Thomas Garret, and William Hierome, whom in the very same month, within two days after Cromwell's death, he caused to be put to execution.

First of all we will somewhat speak of Barnes, doctor of divinity.—This Barnes, after he came from the university of Louvain, went to Cambridge, where he was made prior and master of the house of the Augustines. At that time the knowledge of good letters was scarcely entered into the university, all things being full of rudeness and barbarity, saving in very few, which were private and secret. Whereupon Barnes, having some feeling of better learning and authors, began in his house to read Terence, Plautus, and Cicero; so that what with his industry, pains, and labour, and with the help of Thomas Parnel, his scholar, whom he brought from Louvain with him, reading Copia verborum et rerum, he caused the house shortly to flourish with good letters, and made a great part of the house learned, (which before were drowned in barbarous rudeness,) as Mr. Cambridge, Mr. Field, Mr. Coleman, Mr. Burley, Mr. Coverdale, with divers others of the university, that sojourned there for learning's sake. After these foundations laid, then did he read openly in the house Paul's epistles, and put by Duns and Dorbel, and yet he was a questionary himself; and only because he would have Christ there taught, and his holy word, he turned their unsavoury problems and fruitless disputations to better matter of the holy scripture, and thereby in short space he made divers good divines. The same order of disputation which he kept in his house, he observed likewise in the university abroad, when he should dispute with any man in the common schools. And the first man that answered Dr. Barnes in the scriptures, was Mr. Stafford, for his form to be bachelor of divinity; which disputation was marvellous in the sight of the great blind doctors, and joyful to the godly-spirited.

Thus Barnes, what with his reading, disputation, and preaching, became famous and mighty in the scriptures, preaching ever against false bishops and hypocrites; and yet did not see his inward and outward idolatry, which he both taught and maintained, till that good Mr. Bilney, with others, converted him wholly unto Christ.

The first sermon that ever he preached of this truth, was the Sunday before Christmas-day, at St. Edward's church, belonging to Trinity-hall, in Cambridge, by the Pease-market; whose text was the epistle of the same Sunday, Rejoice in the Lord, &c. And for that sermon he was immediately accused of heresy, by two fellows of the King's hall. Then the godly learned in Christ, both of Pembroke-hall, St. John's, Peter's-house, Queen's-college, the King's-college, Gunwell-hall, and Benet-college, shewed themselves, and flocked together in open sight, both in the schools and at open sermons, at St. Mary's, and at the Austin's, and at other disputations; and then they conferred continually together.

The house that they resorted most commonly unto was the White-horse; which, for despite of them, to bring God's word into contempt, was called Germany. This house especially was chosen, because many of them of St. John's, the King's college, and the Queen's-college, came in on the back part.

At this time much trouble began to ensue: the adversaries of Dr. Barnes accused him in the Regent-house before the vice-chancellor, where his articles were presented with him, and received, he promising to make answer at the next convocation; and so it was done. Then Dr. Nottoris, a rank enemy to Christ, moved Dr. Barnes to recant; but he refused so to do: which appeareth in his book that he made to king Henry VIII. in English, confuting the judgment of cardinal Wolsey, and the residue of the bishops papistical, and so for the time stood steadfast. And this tragedy continued in Cambridge, one preaching against another, in trying out of God's truth, until within six days of Shrovetide. Then suddenly was sent down to Cambridge a sergeant of arms, called Gibson, dwelling in St. Thomas Apostles in London, who suddenly arrested Dr. Barnes openly in the convocacation-house, to make all others afraid; and privately they had determined to make search for Luther's books, and all the German works, suddenly.

But good Dr. Farman, of the Queen's-college, sent word thereof to the chambers of those that were suspected, which were in number thirty persons. But, God be praised, they were conveyed away by the time that the sergeant at arms, the vice-chancellor, and the proctors, were at every man's chamber, going directly to the place where the books lay; whereby it was perceived, that there were some private spies amongst that small company. And that night they studied together, and gave him his answer; which answer he carried with him to London next morning. In the morning he was carried by the sergeant at arms, to cardinal Wolsey to Westminster, waiting there all day, and could not speak with him till night. Then, by reason of Dr. Gardiner, secretary to the cardinal, (of whose familiar acquaintance he had been before,) and Mr. Fox, master of the wards, he spake the same night with the cardinal in his chamber of state, kneeling on his knees. Then said the cardinal to them, Is this Dr. Barnes your man that is accused of heresy?—Yea, and please your grace, and we trust you shall find him reformable, for he is both well learned and wise.

What, Mr. Doctor, (said the cardinal,) had you not a sufficient scope in the scriptures to teach the people, but that my golden shoes, my pollaxes, my pillars, my golden cushions, my crosses, did so sore offend you, that you must make us ridiculum caput amongst the people? We were jollily that day laughed to scorn. Verily it was a sermon more fit to be preached on a stage than in a pulpit; for at the last you said, I wear a pair of red gloves. I should say bloody gloves, (quoth you,) that I should not be cold in the midst of my ceremonies. And he answered, I spake nothing but the truth out of the scriptures, according to my conscience, and according to the old doctors. And then did he deliver him six sheets of paper written, to confirm and corroborate his sayings.

He received them, smiling on him, and saying, We perceive then that you intend to stand to your articles, and to shew your learning.

Yea, said Barnes, that I do intend, by God's grace, with your lordship's favour.

He answered, Such as you are do bear us little favour, and the Catholic church. I will ask you a question: whether do you think it more necessary that I should have all this royalty, because I represent the king's majesty's person in all the high courts of this realm, to the terror and keeping down of all rebellious treasons, traitors, and all the wicked and corrupt members of this commonwealth; or to be as simple as you would have us, to sell all these aforesaid things, and to give it to the poor, which shortly will get drunk with it, and to pull away this majesty of a princely dignity, which is a terror to all the wicked, and to follow your counsel in this behalf?

He answered, I think it necessary to be sold and given to the poor; for this is not comely for your calling, nor is the king's majesty maintained by your pomp and pollaxes, but by God, who saith, Kings and their majesty reign and stand by me.

Then answered he, Lo, master doctors, here is the learned wise man that you told me of! Then they kneeled down, and said, We desire your grace to be good unto him, for he will be reformable.

Then said he, Stand you up; for your sakes and the university we will be good unto him. How say you, master doctor, do you not know that I am legatus de latera, and that I am able to dispense in all matters concerning religion within this realm, as much as the pope may?—He said, I know it to be so.

Will you then be ruled by us, and we will do all things for your honesty, and the honesty of the university?

He answered, I thank your grace for your good-will; I will stick to the holy scriptures, and to God's book, according to the simple talent that God hath lent me.

Well, said he, thou shalt have thy learning tried to the uttermost, and thou shalt have the law.

Then he required him that he might have justice with equity: and forthwith he should have gone to the Tower, but that Gardiner and Fox became his sureties that night; and so he came home to Mr. Parnel's house again, and that night fell to writing again, and slept not, Mr. Coverdale, Mr. Goodwin, and Mr. Field, being his writers; and in the morning he came to York-place to Gardiner and Fox, and by and by he was committed to the sergeant at arms, to bring him into the Chapter-house at Westminster, before the bishops, and the abbot of Westminster, called Islip.

The same time when Dr. Barnes should appear before the cardinal, there were five Still-yard men to be examined for Luther's books and Lollardy; but after they spied Barnes, they set the others aside, and asked the sergeant at arms, what was his errand? He said, he had brought one Dr. Barnes to be examined of heresy; and presented both his articles and his accusers. Then immediately, after a little talk, they swore him, and laid his articles to him. Who like as he answered the cardinal before, so said he unto them; and then he offered the books of his probations unto them. Who asked him whether he had another for himself? and he said, Yea; shewing it unto them. Who then took it from him, and said they would have no leisure to dispute with him at that present, for other affairs of the king's majesty, which they had to do; and therefore bade him stand aside. Then they called the Still-yard men again one by one; and when they were examined, they called forth the master of the Fleet, and they were committed all to the Fleet. Then they called Dr. Barnes again, and asked him whether he would subscribe to his articles or no; and he subscribed willingly; and then they committed him and young master Parnel to the Fleet also with the other. There they remained till Saturday in the morning, and the warden of the Fleet was commanded that no man should speak with him.

On the Saturday he came again before them into the Chapter-house, and there with the Still-yard men remained till five o'clock at night. And after long disputations, threatenings, and scornings, they called him, to know whether he would abjure or burn? He was then in a great agony, and thought rather to burn than to abjure. But then was he said again to have the counsel of Gardiner and Fox, and they persuaded him rather to abjure than to burn, because they said he should do no more in time to come, and with divers other persuasions that were mighty in the sight of reason and foolish flesh. Upon that, kneeling upon his knees, he consented to abjure; and the abjuration being put in his hand, he abjured as it was there written, and then he subscribed with his own hand; and yet they would scarcely receive him into the bosom of the church, as they termed it. Then they put him to an oath, and charged him to execute, do, and fulfil, all that they commanded him; and he promised so to do.

Then they commanded the warden of the Fleet to carry him and his fellows to the place from whence he came, and to be kept in close prison, and in the morning to provide five faggots for Dr. Barnes and the Still-yard men. The fifth Still-yard man was commanded to have a taper of five pounds weight to be provided for him, to offer to the rood of Northen, in Paul's, and all these things to be ready by eight of the clock in the morning; and that he, with all that he could make, with bills and gloves, and the knight marshal, with all his tipstiffs, should bring them to Paul's, and conduct them home again.

In the morning they were all ready by their hour appointed in Paul's church, the church being so full that no man could get in. The cardinal had a scaffold made on the top of the stairs for himself, with six-and-thirty abbots, mitred priors, and bishops, and he in his whole pomp, mitred, (which Barnes spake against,) sat there enthroned, his chaplains and spiritual doctors in gowns of damask and satin, and he himself in purple, even like a bloody Antiehrst. And there was a new pulpit erected on the top of the stairs also, for the bishop of Rochester to preach against Luther and Dr. Barnes; and great baskets full of books standing before them within the rails, which were commanded, after the great fire was made before the rood of Northen, there to be burned, and these heretics after the sermon to go thrice about the fire, and to east in their faggots.

Now, while the sermon was a-doing, Dr. Barnes and the Still-yard men were commanded to kneel down and ask God forgiveness, the Catholic church, and cardinal; and, after that, he was commanded at the end of the sermon to declare that he was more charitably handled than he deserved, or was worthy, his heresies were so horrible and so detestable; and once again kneeling on his knees, desired of the people forgiveness, and to pray for him; and so the cardinal departed under a canopy with all his mitred men with him, till he came to the second gate of Paul's, and then he took his mule, and the mitred men came back again. Then these poor men being commanded to come down from the stage, (whereon the sweepers use to stand when they sweep the church,) the bishops sat down again, and commanded the knight marshal and the warden of the Fleet with their company to carry them about the fire; and so were they brought to the bishops, and there for absolution kneeled down: when Rochester stood up, and declared unto the people how many days of pardon and forgiveness of sins they had for being at that sermon, and there did pardon Dr. Barnes, with the others, and shewed the people that they were received into the church again.

This done, the warden of the Fleet and the knight marshal were commanded to have them to the Fleet again, and charged that they should have the liberty of the Fleet as other prisoners had, and that their friends might resort unto them, and there to remain till the lord cardinal's pleasure was known.

After that Barnes there in the Fleet had continued the space of half a year, at length being delivered, he was committed to be a free prisoner at the Austin friars in London. When those caterpillars and bloody beasts had there undermined him, they complained again to the lord cardinal; whereupon he was removed to the Austin friars of Northampton, there to be burned. Yet he himself understanding nothing thereof, but supposing still that he should there remain and continue in free prison: at last one Mr. Horne, who had brought him up, and was his special friend, having intelligence of the writ which should shortly be sent down to burn him, gave him counsel to feign himself to be desperate, and that he should write a letter to the cardinal, and leave it on his table where he lay, and a paper by, to declare whither he was gone to drown himself, and to leave his clothes in the same place; and there another letter to be left to the mayor of the town to search for him in the water, because he had a letter written in parchment about his neck, closed in wax, for the cardinal, which should teach all men to beware by him. Upon this, they were seven days in searching for him; but he was conveyed to London in a poor man's apparel, and so tarried not there, but took shipping, and went by long seas to Antwerp, and so to Luther, and there fell to study till he had made an answer to all the bishops of the realm, and had made a book, entitled, Acta Romanorum Pontificum, and another book with a supplication to king Henry. Immediately it was told the cardinal, that he was drowned, and he said, Pecit memoria ejus cum sonitu. But this did light upon himself shortly after, who wretchedly died at Leicester.

In the same season, Dr. Barnes was made strong in Christ, and got favour both of the learned in Christ, and foreign princes in Germany, and was great with Lutlier, Melancthon, Pomeran, Justus Jonas, Hegendorphinus, and Æpinus, as also with the duke of Saxony, and with the king of Denmark; which king of Denmark, in the time of More and Stokesley, sent him with the Lubecks, as an ambassador to king Henry VIII. He lay with the Lubecks' chaneellor at the Still-yard.

Sir Thomas More, then chaneellor, would fain have entrapped him; but the king would not let him, for Cromwell was his great friend. And ere he went, the Lubecks and he disputed with the bishops of this realm in defence of the truth; and so he departed again without restraint with the Lubecks.

After his going again to Wittenburg to the duke of Saxony and to Luther, he remained there to set forward his works in print that he had begun; from whence he returned again in the beginning of the reign of queen Anne, as others did, and continued a faithful preacher in this city, being all her time well entertained and promoted. After that, he was sent ambassador by king Henry VIII. to the duke of Cleves, for the marriage of the lady Anne of Cleves, between the king and her, and well accepted in the embassy, and in all his doings, until the time that Stephen Gardiner came out of France; but after he came, neither religion prospered, nor the queen's majesty, nor Cromwell, nor the preachers; who, after the marriage of the lady Cleves, never ceased until he had grafted the marriage in another stoek, by the occasion whereof he began his bloody broil.

For not long after, Dr. Barnes, with his brethren, were apprehended and carried before the king's majesty to Hampton-court, and there he was examined. Where the king's majesty seeking the best means of his safety, to bring Winchester and him agreed, at Winchester's request granted him leave to go home with the bishop to confer with him; and so he did. But as it happened, they not agreeing, Gardiner and his companions sought by all subtle means how to entangle and to entrap them in further danger; which not long after was brought to pass. For by certain complaints made to the king of them, they were enjoined to preach three sermons the next Easter following at the Spittle. At which sermons, besides other reporters which were thither sent, Stephen Gardiner also was there present sitting with the mayor, either to bear record of their recantation, or else (as the Pharisees came to Christ) to trip them in their talk, if they had spoken any thing awry.

When these three had thus preached their sermons, among whom Barnes preaching the first sermon, and seeing Stephen Gardiner there present, humbly desired him in the face of all the audience, if he forgave him, to hold up his hand, and the said Gardiner thereupon held up his finger; yet notwith standing shortly after, by the means of the said reports, they were sent for to Hampton-court; who from thence were carried to the Tower by Sir John Gostwike. From thence they never came out till they came to their death.

And thus hitherto concerning the history of Barnes. Now let us likewise consider the story and doings of Thomas Garret.

The Story of THOMAS GARRET, or Garrard, and his trouble in Oxford, testified and recorded by Anthony Dalabar, who was there present the same time.

About the year of our Lord 1526, Mr. Garret, curate in Honey-lane, in London, came unto Oxford, and brought with him sundry books in Latin, treating of the scripture, with the first part of Unio dissidentium, and Tindal's first translation of the New Testament in English, which books he sold to divers scholars in Oxford.

After he had been there awhile, and had despatched those books, news came from London, that he was searched for through all London, to be apprehended and taken as an heretic, and to be imprisoned for selling of those heretical books, as they termed them, because they spake against the usurped authority and erroneous doctrine of the bishop of Rome, and his no less impure and filthy synagogue. For it was not unknown to cardinal Wolsey, and to the bishop of London, and to others of that ungodly generation, that Mr. Garret had a great number of those books, and that he was gone to Oxford to make sale of them there to such as he knew to be the lovers of the gospel. Wherefore they determined forthwith to make a private search through all Oxford to apprehend and imprison him, and to burn all his aforesaid books, and him too, if they could; so burning hot was their charity. But yet at that time one of the aforesaid proctors, called Mr. Cole, of Magdalen-college, who after was cross-bearer unto cardinal Wolsey, was well acquainted with Mr. Garret, and therefore he gave secret warning unto a friend or two of Mr. Garret's of his private search, and willed therefore that he should forthwith, as secretly as he could, depart out of Oxford; for if he were taken in the search, no remedy but he should be forthwith sent up unto the cardinal, and so he should be committed unto the Tower.

The Christmas before that time, I, Anthony Dalabar, then scholar of Alborn-hall, who had books of Mr. Garret's, had been in my country in Dorsetshire, at Stalbridge, where I had a brother, parson of that parish, who was very desirous to have a curate out of Oxford, and willed me in any wise to get him one there if I could. This just occasion offered, it was thought good among the brethren, (for so did we not only call one another, but were indeed one to another,) that Mr. Garret, changing his name, should be sent forth with my letters into Dorsetshire, to my brother, to serve him there for a time, until he might secretly from thence convey himself some whither over the sea. According hereunto I wrote my letters in all haste possible unto my brother, for Mr. Garret to be his curate, but not declaring what he was indeed; for my brother was a rank Papist, and afterwards was the most mortal enemy that ever I had for the gospel's sake.

So the Wednesday in the morning before Shrovetide, Mr. Garret departed out of Oxford towards Dorsetshire, with his letters for his new service. How far he went, and by what occasion he soon returned, I know not. But the Friday next, in the night time he came again to Radley's house, where he lay before, and so after midnight, in the private search which was then made for him, he was apprehended and taken there in his bed by the two proctors, and on the Saturday in the morning was delivered unto one Dr. Cotisford, master of Lincoln-college, then being commissary of the university, who kept him as prisoner, in his own chamber. There was great joy and rejoicing among all the Papists for his apprehension, and especially with Dr. London, warden of the new college, and Dr. Highton, dean of Frideswides, two arch Papists, who immediately sent their letters in post-haste unto the cardinal, to inform him of the apprehension of this notable heretic. For which their doing they were well assured to have great thanks. But of all this sudden hurly-burly I was utterly ignorant, so that I knew neither of Mr. Garret's sudden return, neither that he was taken, until that afterwards he came unto my chamber, being then in Gloucester-college, as a man amazed; and as soon as he saw me, he said he was undone, for he was taken. Thus he spake unadvisedly in the presence of a young man that came with him. When the young man was departed, I asked him what he was, and what acquaintance he had with him? He said, he knew him not; but had been to see a monk of his acquaintance in that college, who was not in his chamber, and therefore he desired his servant (not knowing my chamber, for that I was newly removed thither) to bring him to me; and so forthwith declared how he was returned and taken that night in the private search, as ye have heard; and that now when the commissary and all his company were gone to even-song, and had locked him alone in his chamber, he hearing nobody stirring in the college, put back the bar of the lock with his finger, and so came straight unto Gloucester-college, to speak with that monk, if he had been within, who had also bought books of him.

Then said I unto him, Alas! Mr. Garret, by this your un-circumspect coming unto me, and speaking so before this young man, you have disclosed yourself, and utterly undone me. I asked him, why he went not unto my brother with my letters? He said, after that he was gone a day's journey and a half, he was so fearful, that his heart would no other but that he must needs return again unto Oxford; and so he came again on Friday at night, and then was taken, as ye heard before. But now with deep sighs and plenty of tears he prayed me to help to convey him away; and so he cast off his hood and his gown, wherein he came unto me, and desired me to give him a coat with sleeves, if I had any, and told me that he would go into Wales, and thence convey himself into Germany, if he might. Then I put on him a sleeved coat of mine. He would also have had another manner of cap of me; but I had none but priest-like, such as his own was.

Then kneeled we both down together upon our knees, and lifting up our hearts and hands to God our heavenly Father, desiring him with plenty of tears so to conduct and prosper him in his journey, that he might well escape the danger of all his enemies, to the glory of his holy name, if his good pleasure and will so were; and then we embraced and kissed each other, and scarcely for sorrow could we speak one to another: and so he departed from me apparelled in my coat, being committed unto the tuition of our almighty and merciful Father.

When he was gone down the stairs from my chamber, I straightways did shut my chamber door, and went into my study, and took the New Testament in my hands, kneeled down on my knees, and with many a deep sigh and salt tear I did with much deliberation read over the tenth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel; and when I had so done, with prayer I did commit unto God that our dearly beloved brother Garret, earnestly beseeching him, in and for Jesus Christ's sake, his only begotten Son our Lord, that he would vouchsafe not only safely to conduct and keep our said dear brother from the hands of all his enemies, but also that he would endue his tender and lately born little flock in Oxford, with heavenly strength, by his holy Spirit, that they might be well able thereby valiantly to withstand all their fierce enemies, and also might quietly, and with all godly patience, bear Christ's heavy cross, which I now saw was presently to be laid on their young and weak backs, unable to bear so huge a burden, without the great help of his holy Spirit.

This done, I laid aside my book safe, folded up Mr. Garret's gown and hood, and laid them in my press among mine apparel; and so having put on my short gown, shut up my study and chamber doors, and went towards Frideswides, to speak with that worthy martyr of God, Mr. Clark, and others, and to declare unto them what had happened that afternoon. But of purpose I went by St. Mary's church, to go first unto Corpus Christi college, to speak with Diet and Udal, my faithful brethren and fellows in the Lord there. But by chance I met by the way with a brother of our's, one Mr. Eden, fellow of Magdalen-college, who, as soon as he saw me, came with a pitiful countenance unto me, saying that we were all undone, for Mr. Garret was returned again to Oxford, taken last night in the private search, and was in prison with the commissary. I said it was not so. He said it was so. I told him it could not be so, for I was sure he was gone. He answered me, and said, I know he was gone with your letters, but he came again yesterday in the evening, and was taken in his bed at Radley's this night in the private search; for (quoth he) I heard our proctor, Mr. Cole, say and declare the same this day in our college to divers of the house. But I told him again, that I was well assured he was now gone; for I spake with him later than either the proctor or the commissary did. And then I declared the whole matter unto him, how and when he came unto me, and how he went his way; willing him to declare the same to our other brethren whom he should meet withal, and to give God hearty thanks for his wonderful deliverance, and to pray him also that he would grant him safely to pass away from all his enemies; and told him that I was going unto Mr. Clark, of Frideswides, to declare unto him this matter: for I knew and thought verily that he and divers others there were in great sorrow for this matter. Then I went straight to Frideswides, and even-song was begun, and the dean and the other canons were there in their gay amies; they were almost at Magnificat before I came thither. I stood at the quire door, and heard Mr. Taverner play, and others of the chapel there sing with him, and among whom I myself was wont to sing also; but now my singing and music were turned into sighing and musing.

As I thus and there stood, in cometh Dr. Cotisford the commissary, as fast as ever he could go, bare-headed, as pale as ashes, (I knew his grief well enough,) and to the dean he goeth into the quire, where he was sitting in his stall, and talked with him very sorrowfully; what I know not, but whereof I might and did well and truly guess. I went aside from the quire door, to see and hear more.—The commissary and dean came out of the quire wonderfully troubled, as it seemed.

About the middle of the church met them Dr. London, puffing, blustering, and blowing, like a hungry and greedy lion seeking his prey. They talked together awhile, but the commissary was much blamed of them for keeping of his prisoner so negligently, insomuch that he wept for sorrow; and it was known abroad that Mr. Garret was escaped, and gone out of the commissary's chamber at even-song time; but whither no man could tell. These doctors departed, and sent abroad their servants and spies every where.

Mr. Clark, about the middle of Compline, came forth of the quire; I followed him to his chamber, and declared what was happened that afternoon, of Mr. Garret's escape. He was glad, for he knew of his foretaking. Then he sent for one Mr. Sumner and Mr. Bets, fellows and canons there. In the mean while he gave me a very good exhortation, praying God to give me, and all the rest of our brethren, the wisdom of the serpent and the simplicity of the dove; for we should have shortly much need thereof, as he verily thought. When Mr. Sumner and Mr. Bets were come to him, he caused me to declare again the whole matter to them two, and they were very glad that Mr. Garret was so delivered, trusting that he should escape all his enemies. Then desiring him to tell unto our other brethren what was happened, (for there were divers others in that college,) I went to Corpus Christi college to comfort our brethren there, being in like heaviness. There I tarried and supped with them; at which supper we were not very merry, considering our state and peril at hand.

When we had ended our supper, and committed our whole cause with fervent sighs and hearty prayers unto God our heavenly Father, I went to Alborn-hall, and there lay that night. In the morning I was up very early, and as soon as I could get out of the door, I went straight towards Gloucester-college, to my chamber. It had rained that morning, and with my going I had besprinkled my hose and shoes with mire. And when I was come unto Gloucester-college, which was about six of the clock, I found the gates fast shut. Whereat I did much marvel; for they were wont to be open daily long before that time. Then did I walk up and down by the wall there a whole hour before the gates were opened. In the mean while, my musing head being full of forecasting cares, and my sorrowful heart flowing with doleful sighs, I fully determined in my conscience before God, that if I should chance to be taken and be examined, I would accuse no man, nor declare any thing further than I did already perceive was manifestly known before. And so when the gate was opened, thinking to shift myself, and to put on a longer gown, I went in towards my chamber, and going up the stairs, would have opened my door, but I could not in a long season do it. Whereby I perceived that my lock had been meddled withal, and therewith was somewhat altered. Yet at last with much ado I opened the lock, and went in. When I came in, I saw my bed all to be tossed and tumbled, my clothes in my press thrown down, and my study door open. Whereat I was amazed, and thought verily that some search was made there that night for Mr. Garret, and that it was known of his being with me, by the monk's man that brought him to my chamber.

Now there was lying in the next chamber unto me, a monk, who, as soon as he had heard me in the chamber, came to me, and told how Mr. Garret was sought for in my chamber that night, and what ado there was made by the commissary and the two proctors, with bills and swords thrust through my bed-straw, and how every corner of my chamber was searched for Mr. Garret. And although his gown and his hood lay there in my press with my clothes, yet they perceived them not.—Then he told me he was commanded to bring me, as soon as I came in, unto the prior of the students, named Anthony Dunstan, a monk of Westminster. This so troubled me, that I forgot to make clean my hose and shoes, and to shift me into another gown; and therefore, dirty as I was, and in my short gown, I went with him into the said prior's chamber, where I found the said prior standing and looking for my coming. He asked me where I had been that night? I told him I lay at Alborn-hall with my old bed-fellow Fitzjames; but he would not believe me. He asked me if Mr. Garret were with me yesterday? I told him, yea. Then he would know where he was? and wherefore he came unto me? I told him, I knew not where he was, except he were at Woodstock; for so (said I) he had shewed me that he would go thither, because one of the keepers there, his friend, had promised him a piece of venison to make merry withal this Shrovetide; and that he would have borrowed a hat and a pair of high shoes of me, but I had none indeed to lend him. This tale I thought meetest, though it were nothing so. Then had he spied on my finger a big ring of silver very well double gilt, with two letters, A. D. engraved in it for my name; I suppose he thought it to be of gold. He required to see it, I gave it unto him. When he had it in his hand, he said it was his ring, for therein was his name, an A for Anthony, and a D for Dunstan. When I heard him so say, I wished in my heart to be as well delivered from and out of his company, as I was assured to be delivered from my ring for ever.

Then he called for pen, ink, and paper, and commanded me to write when and how Garret came unto me, and where he was become. I had scarcely written three words, but the chief beadle, with two or three of the commissary's men, were come unto master Prior, requiring him straightways to bring us away unto Lincoln-college, to the commissary and to Dr. London. Whither when I was brought into the chapel, there I found Dr. Cotisford, commissary, Dr. Higdon, then dean of the cardinal's college, and Dr. London, warden of the new college, standing together at the altar in the chapel. When I was brought unto them, after salutations given and taken between them, they called for chairs, and sat down, and called for me to come to them. And first they asked what my name was? I told them that my name was Anthony Dalaber. Then they also asked me how long I had been student in the university? and I told them, almost three years. And they asked me what I studied? I told them that I had read sophistry and logie in Alborn-hall, and now was removed unto Gloucester-college to study the civil law; which the aforesaid prior of the students affirmed to be true. Then they asked me whether I knew Mr. Garret, and how long I had known him? I told them I knew him well, and had known him almost a twelvemonth. They asked me, when he was with me? I told them, yesterday at afternoon.

Now by this time, whiles they had me in this talk, one came unto them which was sent for, with pen, ink, and paper; I found it was the clerk of the university. As soon as he was come, there was a board and trestles, with a form for him to sit on, set between the doctors and me, and a great mass book laid before me, and I was commanded to lay my right hand on it, and to swear that I should truly answer unto such articles and interrogatories as should be by them examined upon. I made danger of it awhile at first, but afterwards being persuaded by them, partly by fair words and partly by great threats, I promised to do as they would have me, but in my heart meant nothing so to do. So I laid my hand on the book, and one of them gave me my oath, and that done, commanded me to kiss the book. Then made they great courtesy between them who should examine me, and minister interrogatories unto me. At last the rankest papistical pharisee of them all Dr. London, took upon him to do it.

Then he asked me again by my oath where Mr. Garret was, and whither I had conveyed him? I told him I had not conveyed him, nor yet knew where he was, nor whither he was gone, except he were gone to Woodstock, (as I had before said,) as he shewed me he would. Then he asked me again, when he came to me, how he came to me, what and how long he talked with me, and whither he went from me? I told him he came to me about even-song time, and that one brought him unto my chamber door, whom I knew not, and that he told me he would go to Woodstock for some venison to make merry withal this Shrovetide, and that he would have borrowed a hat and a pair of high shoes of me, but I had none such to lend him; and then he straightway went his way from me, but whither I knew not. All these my sayings the scribe wrote in a book.

Then they earnestly required me to tell them whither I had conveyed him, for surely they said I brought him going some whither this morning; for that they might well perceive, by my foul shoes and dirty hosen, I had travelled with him the most part of this night. I answered plainly, that I lay at Alborn-hall with Sir Fitzjames, and that I had good witness thereof there. They asked me where I was at even-song? I told them, at Frideswides, and that I saw first master commissary, and then master Dr. London, come thither at that time unto master dean of Frideswides, and that I saw them talking together in the church there. Dr. London and the dean threatened me, that if I would not tell the truth what I had done with him, or whither he was gone, I should surely be sent to the Tower of London, and there be racked, and put into Little-ease. But master commissary prayed me with gentle words, to tell him where he was, that he might have him again, and he would be my very great friend, and deliver me out of trouble straightway. I told him I could not tell where he was, nor whither he was gone. Thus they did toss me almost two hours in the chapel; sometimes with threatenings and foul words, and then with fair words and fair promises flattering me.

Then was he that brought Mr. Garret unto my chamber, brought before me, and caused to declare what Mr. Garret said unto me at his coming to my chamber: but I said plainly I heard him say no such thing; for I thought my ney to be as good as his yea, seeing it was to rid and deliver my godly brother out of trouble and peril of his life.

At the last, when they could get nothing of me whereby to hurt or aeense any man, or to know any thing of which they sought, they all three together brought me up a long stairs into a great chamber, over master commissary's chamber, wherein stood a great pair of very high stocks. Then master commissary asked me for my purse and girdle, took away my money and my knives, and then they put both my legs into the stocks, and so locked me fast in them; in which I sat, my feet being almost as high as my head; and so departed they, I think, to their abominable mass, and locked fast the chamber door, leaving me alone.

When they all were gone, then came unto my remembrance the worthy forewarning and godly declaration of that most constant martyr of God, Mr. John Clarke, my father in Christ, who, well near two years before that, when I did earnestly desire him to grant me to be his scholar, and that I might go with him when and wheresoever he should teach or preach, (which he did daily,) said unto me much after this sort: "Dalaber, you desire you wot not what, and that you are, I fear, unable to take upon you; for though now my preaching be sweet and pleasant unto you, because there is yet no persecution laid on you for it, yet the time will come, and that peradventure shortly, if you continue to live godly therein, that God will lay on you the cross of persecution, to try you withal, whether you can as pure gold abide the fire, or as stubble and dross be consumed. For the Holy Ghost plainly affirmeth by St. Paul, 'That all who will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution.' Yea, you shall be called and judged a heretic, you shall be abhorred of the world, your own friends and kinsfolk will forsake you, and also hate you, and you shall be cast into prison, and no man shall dare to help or comfort you, and you shall be accused and brought before the bishops, to your reproach and shame, to the great sorrow of all your friends and kinsfolk. Then will ye wish ye had never known this doctrine; then will ye curse Clarke, and wish that ye had never known him, because he hath brought you to all these troubles. Therefore, rather than that you should do this, leave off from meddling with this doctrine, and desire not to be and continue in my company."

At which words I was so grieved, that I fell down on my knees at his feet, and with abundance of tears and sighs, even from the very bottom of my heart, I earnestly besought him, that for the tender mercy of God, shewed to us in our Lord Jesus Christ, he would not refuse me, but receive me into his company, as I had desired; saying, that I trusted verily, that he which had begun this in me would not forsake me, but give me grace to continue therein unto the end. When he heard me say so, he came to me and took me up in his arms, kissed me, the tears trickling down from his eyes, and said unto me, The Lord Almighty grant you so to do, and from henceforth for ever take me for your father, and I will take you for my son in Christ.

Now were there at this time in Oxford divers graduates and scholars of sundry colleges and halls, whom God had called to the knowledge of his holy word, which all resorted unto Mr. Clarke's disputations and lectures in divinity at all times as they might; and when they might not come conveniently, I was by Mr. Clarke appointed to resort to every one of them weekly, and to know what doubts they had in any place of the scripture, that by me from him they might have the true understanding of the same. Which exercise did me much good and profit, to the understanding of the holy scriptures, which I most desired.

This aforesaid forewarning and godly declaration, I said, of this holy martyr of God, Mr. Clarke, coming to my remembrance, caused me with deep sighs to cry unto God from my heart, to assist me with his holy Spirit, that I might be able patiently and quietly to bear and suffer whatsoever it should please him of his fatherly love to lay on him, to his glory, and the comfort of my dearly beloved brethren, whom I thought now to be in great fear and anguish, lest I would be an accuser of them all; for unto me they all were well known, and all their doings in that matter. But, God be blessed, I was fully bent never to accuse any of them, whatsoever should happen of me.

Before dinner Mr. Cotisford came up to me, and requested me earnestly to tell him where Mr. Garret was, and if I would so do, he promised me straightways to deliver me out of prison. But I told him I could not tell where he was, (no more indeed I could.) Then he departed to dinner, asking me if I would eat any meat? I told him, yea, right gladly. He said he would send me some. When he was gone, his servants asked me divers questions, which I do not now remember, and some of them spake to me fair, and some threatened me, calling me heretic; and so departed, locking the door fast upon me.

Thus far Anthony Dalaber hath prosecuted this story, who, before the finishing, departed in the year 1562, in the diocese of Salisbury; the residue whereof, as we could gather it out of ancient and credible persons, so have we added hereunto the same.

After this, Garret was apprehended or taken by Mr. Cole, the proctor, or his men, going westward, at a place called Hinksey, a little beyond Oxford; and so being brought back again, was committed to ward. That done, he was cited before the commissary, Dr. London, and Dr. Higdon, dean of Frideswides, (now called Christ's-college,) into St. Mary's church, where they sitting in judgment, convicted him, according to their law, as an heretic, as they said; and afterwards compelled him to carry a faggot in open procession from St. Mary's church to Frideswides, and Dalaber likewise with him; Garret having his red hood on his shoulders like a master of arts.—After that they were sent to Osney, there to be kept in prison till further order was taken.

There were suspected besides a great number to be infected with heresy, as they called it, for having such books of God's truth as Mr. Garret sold unto them; as Mr. Clarke, (who died in his chamber, and could not be suffered to receive the communion, being in prison, and saying these words, Crede, et manducasti; Believe that you eat it, and you do eat it;) Mr. Sumner, Mr. Bets, Taverner the musician, Radley, with others of Frideswides-college; of Corpus Christi college, as Udal and Diet; with others of Magdalen-college; one Eden, with others of Gloucester-college; and two black monks, one of St. Austin's, of Canterbury, named Langport, the other of St. Edmund'sbury, monk, named John Salisbury; two white monks of Bernard-college, two canons of St. Mary's-college, (one of them named Robert Farler, afterwards bishop of St. David's, and burned in queen Mary's time;) these two canons, because they had no place in the university with the others, they went on the contrary side of the procession bare-headed, and a beadle before them, to be known from the others. Divers others there were whose names I cannot remember, which were forced and constrained to forsake their colleges, and seek their friends.

Against the procession time there was a great fire made upon the top of Carfaxe, whereinto all such as were in the said procession, either convicted or suspected of heresy, were commanded, in token of repentance and renouncing their errors, every man to cast a book into the fire as they passed by.

After this, Mr. Garret, flying from place to place, escaped their tyranny, until he was again apprehended, and burned with Dr. Barnes; with whom also William Hierome, sometime vicar of Stepney, was likewise drawn into Smithfield, and there together with them patiently endured martyrdom in the fire.

Now let us add also to these the story of Hierome.

The Life and Story of WILLIAM HIEROME, Vicar of Stepney, and Martyr of Christ.

The third company which suffered with Barnes and Garret, was William Hierome, vicar of Stepney. This Hierome being a diligent preacher of God's word, for the comfort and edification of the people, had preached sundry sermons, wherein he laboured as much as time then served, to extirpate and weed out the roots of men's traditions, doctrines, dreams, and fancies. In so doing, it could not be otherwise but he must needs provoke much hatred against him, amongst the adversaries of Christ's gospel.

It so happened that the said Hierome preaching at Paul's on the fourth Sunday in Lent, made there a sermon, wherein he spoke of Hagar and Sarah, declaring what these two signified. In process whereof he shewed further how that Sarah and her child Isaac, and all they that were Isaac's, and born of the free woman Sarah, were freely justified: contrary, they that were born of Hagar, the bond woman, were bound and under the law, and cannot be freely justified. In these words, what was here spoken but what St. Paul himself uttereth and expoundeth in his epistle to the Galatians, ch. iv. ? or what could here be gathered by any reasonable or indifferent hearer, but consonant to sound doctrine ? Now see what rancour and malice, armed with crafty and subtle sophistry, can do. This sermon finished, it was not long but he was charged and cited before the king at Westminster, and there accused for erroneous doctrine.

Furthermore it was objected against him, touching matter against magistrates and laws, made by them ; whereunto he answered again, and affirmed (as he had before preached) that no magistrate of himself could make any law or laws, private, or otherwise, to bind the inferior people, unless it were by the power, authority, and commandment, of his or their princes, to him or them given, but only the prince. And, moreover, to confirm the same, he added, saying, that if the prince make laws consenting to God's laws, we are bound to obey them ; and if he make laws repugnant to the laws of God, and be an evil and wicked prince, yet are we bound humbly to suffer him, and not violently to resist or grudge against him.

Also concerning his sermons, one Dr. Wilson entered into disputation with him, and maintained that good works justified before God, and were necessary and available to salvation. To whom Hierome answered again, That all works, whatsoever they were, were nothing worth, nor any part of salvation of themselves, but only referred to the mercy and love of God, which mercy and love of God directeth the workers thereof, and yet it is at his mercy and goodness to accept them. Which to be true, Dr. Wilson neither could nor did deny.

And thus much concerning the several stories of these three good men. Now, let us see the order of their martyrdom, joining them all together ; what was the cause of their condemnation, and what were their protestations and words at their suffering.

Barnes, Hierome, and Garret, were caused to preach at Easter, at the Spital ; the occasion whereof, as I find it reported by Stephen Gardiner writing against George Joy, I thought good here to discourse more at large.

Stephen Gardiner hearing that the said Barnes, Hierome, and Garret, should preach the Lent following, anno 1541, at Paul's Cross ; to stop the course of their doctrine, sent his chaplain to the bishop of London the Saturday before the first Sunday in Lent, to have a place for him to preach at Paul's. Which to him was granted, and time appointed that he should preach the Sunday following, which should be on the morrow ; which Sunday was appointed before for Barnes to occupy that room. Gardiner, therefore, determining to declare the gospel of that Sunday, containing the devil's three temptations, began amongst other things to note the abuse of scripture amongst some, as the devil abused it to Christ, and so alluding to the temptation of the devil, (wherein he alleged the scripture against Christ, to cast himself downward, and that he should take no hurt,) he reasoned thus :

Now-a-days, quoth he, the devil tempteth the world, and biddeth them to cast themselves backward. There is no forward in the new teaching, but all backward. Now the devil teacheth, come back from fasting, come back from praying, come back from confession, come back from weeping for thy sins, and all is backward ; insomuch that men must now learn to say their pater-noster backward. For where we said, Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors ; now it is, As thou forgavest our debts, so I will forgive my debtors ; and so God must forgive first ; and all, I say, be turned backward, &c.

Amongst other things, moreover, he noted the devil's craft and shift in deceiving man : who envying his felicity, and therefore coveting to have man idle, and void of good works, and to be led in that idleness with a vain hope to live merrily in his pleasure here, and yet to have heaven at the last, hath for that purpose procured our pardon from Rome, wherein heaven was sold for a little money ; and to retail that merchandise, the devil used friars for his ministers. Now they be gone with all their trumpery ; but the devil is not yet gone, &c. And now that the devil perceiveth that it can no longer be borne, (to buy and sell heaven by the friars,) he hath excogitate to offer heaven without works for it, so freely that men shall not need for heaven to work at all, whatsoever opportunity they have to work ; marry, if they will have any higher place in heaven, God will leave no work unrewarded ; but as to be in heaven, needs no work at all, but only belief, only, only, and nothing else, &c.

This sermon of Stephen Winchester finished, Dr. Barnes, who was put off from that Sunday, had his day appointed (which was the third Sunday next following) to make his sermon ; who taking the same text of the gospel which Gardiner had done before, was on the contrary side no less vehement in setting forward the true doctrine, than Winchester had been before in plucking men backward from truth to lies, from religion to superstition, and from Christ to Antichrist.

The king had appointed before certain persons to make report of the sermons. Besides them, there was one who, writing to a friend of his in the court, in the favour of these preachers, declared how well they had all handled the matter, and laid out the truth, that it might spread without let of the world. Wherefore, partly by these reporters, and partly by the negligent looking to this letter which came to the lord Cromwell's hands, Barnes with his other fellows were apprehended, and committed to the Tower.

Thus, then, Barnes, Hierome, and Garret, being committed to the Tower after Easter, there remained till the 30th day of July, which was two days after the death of lord Cromwell. Then ensued process against them by the king's council in the parliament. Whereupon all those three good saints of God, the 30th day of July, not coming to any answer, nor yet knowing any cause of their condemnation, without any public hearing, were brought together from the Tower to Smithfield, where they preparing themselves to the fire, Dr. Barnes began with this protestation following :

"I am come hither to be burned, as an heretic ; and you shall hear my belief, whereby you shall perceive what erroneous opinions I hold. God I take to record, I never to my knowledge taught any erroneous doctrine, but those things only which scripture led me unto ; and that in my sermons I never maintained any error, neither moved nor gave occasion of any insurrection. Although I have been slandered, to preach that our Lady was but a saffron-bag, which I utterly protest before God that I never meant it, nor preached it ; but all my study and diligence hath been utterly to confound and confute all men of that doctrine, as are the Anabaptists, which deny that our Saviour Christ did take any flesh of the blessed Virgin Mary ; which sects I detest and abhor. And in this place there have been burned some of them, whom I never favoured nor maintained ; but with all diligence evermore did I study to set forth the glory of God, the obedience to our sovereign lord the king, and the true and sincere religion of Christ ; and now hearken to my faith :

"I believe in the holy and blessed Trinity, three Persons and one God, that created and made all the world, and that this blessed Trinity sent down the second Person, Jesus Christ, into the womb of the most blessed and purest Virgin Mary. And here bear me record, that I do utterly condemn that abominable and detestable opinion of the Anabaptists, which say that Christ took no flesh of the Virgin. For I believe, that without man's will or power he was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and took flesh of her, and that he suffered hunger, thirst, cold, and other passions of our body, sin excepted, according to the saying of St. Peter, 'He was made in all things like to his brethren, except sin.' And I believe, that this his death and passion was the sufficient ransom for the sin of all the world. And I believe, that through his death he overcame sin, death, and hell, and that there is none other satisfaction unto the Father, but this his death and passion only, and that no work of man did deserve any thing of God, but only his passion, touching our justification; for I know the best work that ever I did is impure and unperfect. (And with this he cast abroad his hands, and desired God to forgive him his trespasses.) For although perchance (said he) you know nothing by me, yet do I confess, that my thoughts and cogitations be innumerable; wherefore I beseech thee, O Lord, not to enter into judgment with me, according to the saying of the prophet David, 'Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord.' And in another place, 'Lord, if thou straitly mark our iniquities, who is able to abide thy judgment?' Wherefore I trust in no good work that ever I did, but only in the death of Christ. I do not doubt but through him to inherit the kingdom of heaven. Take me not here that I speak against good works; for they are to be done, and verily they that do them not shall never come into the kingdom of God. We must do them, because they are commanded us of God, to shew and set forth our profession, not to deserve or merit; for that is only the death of Christ.

"I believe that there is a holy church, and a company of all them that do profess Christ, and that all that have suffered and confessed his name be saints, and that all they do praise and laud God in heaven, more than I or any man's tongue can express; and that always I have spoken reverently, and praised them as much as scripture willed me to do. And that our Lady, I say, was a Virgin immaculate and undefiled, and that she is the most pure Virgin that ever God created, and a vessel elect of God, of whom Christ should be born."

Then said Mr. Sheriff, You have said well of her before. And being afraid that Mr. Sheriff had been or should be grieved with any thing that he should say, he said:

"Mr. Sheriff, if I speak any thing that you will me not, do no more but beckon me with your hand, and I will straightway hold my peace; for I will not be disobedient in any thing, but will obey."

Then there was one that asked him his opinion of praying to saints. Then said he:

"Now of saints you shall hear my opinion. I have said before somewhat I think of them, how that I believe they are in heaven with God, and that they are worthy of all the honour that scripture willeth them to have. But I say, throughout scripture we are not commanded to pray to any saints. Therefore I neither can nor will preach to you that saints ought to be prayed unto; for then should I preach unto you a doctrine of mine own head. Notwithstanding, whether they pray for us, or no, that I refer to God. And if saints do pray for us, then I trust to pray for you within this half hour, Mr. Sheriff, and for every Christian man living in the faith of Christ, and dying in the same as a saint.

Wherefore if the dead may pray for the quick, I will surely pray for you."

Well, have you any thing more to say?—Then spake he to Mr. Sheriff, and said:

"Have you any articles against me for the which I am condemned?" And the sheriff said, No. Then said he, "Is there here any man else that knoweth wherefore I die, or that by my preaching hath taken any error? Let them now speak, and I will make them answer." And no man answered. Then said he, "Well, I am condemned by the law to die, and, as I understand, by an act of parliament; but wherefore, I cannot tell, but belike for heresy, for we are like to burn. But they that have been the occasion of it, I pray God forgive them as I would be forgiven myself. And Dr. Stephen, bishop of Winchester that now is, if he have sought or wrought this my death either by word or deed, I pray God to forgive him, as heartily, as freely, as charitably, and without feigning, as ever Christ forgave them that put him to death."

"And if any of the council, or any other, have sought or wrought it through malice or ignorance, I pray God forgive their ignorance, and illuminate their eyes, that they may see, and ask mercy for it. I beseech you all to pray for the king's grace, as I have done ever since I was in prison, and do now, that God may give him prosperity, and that he may long reign among you; and after him, that godly prince Edward may so reign, that he may finish those things that his father hath begun. I have been reported to be a preacher of sedition and disobedience unto the king's majesty; but here I say to you, that you are all bound by the commandment of God to obey your prince, with all humility, and with all your heart; yea, not so much as in a look to shew yourselves disobedient unto him, and that not only for fear of the sword, but also for conscience sake before God. Yea, and I say further, if the king should command you any thing against God's law, if it be in your power, yet may you not resist him."

Then spake he to the sheriff, and said, "Mr. Sheriff, I require you on God's behalf to have me commended unto the king's grace, and to shew him that I require of his grace these five requests: First, that whereas his grace hath received into his hands all the goods and substance of the abbeyes—"

Then the sheriff desired him to stop there. He answered, "Mr. Sheriff, I warrant you I will speak no harm; for I know it is well done that all such superstition should be clean taken away, and the king's grace hath well done in taking it away. But his grace is made a whole king, and obeyed in his whole realm as a king, (which neither his father, grandfather, neither his ancestors that reigned before him, ever had,) and that through the preaching of us and such other wretches as we are, which always have applied our whole studies, and given ourselves for the setting forth of the same; and this is now our reward. Well, it maketh no matter. Now he reigneth among you, I pray God long he may live and reign among you. Would to God it may please his grace to bestow the said goods, or some of them, to the comfort of his poor subjects, which surely have great need of them."

"The second that I desire his grace, is, that he will see that matrimony may be had in more reverence than it is; and that men for every light cause invented cast not off their wives, and live in adultery and fornication; and that those that be not married, should not abominably live in whoredom, following the filthy lusts of the flesh."

"The third, that the abominable swearers may be punished, and straitly looked upon; for the vengeance of God will come upon them for their mischievous oaths." Then desired he Mr. Pope to have him commended to Mr. Edgar, and to desire him, for the dear blood of Jesus Christ, that he would leave that abominable swearing which he used; for surely, except he did forsake it, he would come to some mischievous end.

“The fourth, that his grace would set forth Christ’s true religion, and seeing he hath begun, go forward and make an end; for many things have been done, but much more is to do; and that it would please his grace to look on God’s word himself, for that it hath been obscured with many traditions invented of our own brains. Now, (said he,) how many petitions have I spoken of? And the people said, Four. “Well, (said he,) even these four be sufficient, which I desire you, that the king’s grace may be certified of; and say, that I most humbly desire him to look earnestly upon them; and that his grace take heed that he be not deceived with false preachers and teachers, and evil counsel; for Christ saith, that such false prophets shall come in lambs’ skins.”

Then desired he all men to forgive him; and if he had said any evil at any time unadvisedly, whereby he had offended any man, or given any occasion of evil, that they would forgive it him, and amend that evil they took of him; and to bear him witness that he detested and abhorred all evil opinions and doctrines against the word of God, and that he died in the faith of Jesus Christ, by whom he doubted not but to be saved. And with those words he desired them all to pray for him; and then he turned him about, and put off his clothes, making him ready to the fire, patiently there to take his death.

The like confession made also Hierome and Garret, professing in like manner their belief, reciting all the articles of the Christian faith, briefly declaring their minds upon every article, as the time would suffer; whereby the people might understand that there was no cause nor error in their faith wherefore justly they ought to be condemned; protesting, moreover, that they denied nothing that was either in the Old or New Testament set forth by their sovereign lord the king, whom they prayed the Lord long to continue amongst them, with his most dear son, prince Edward.

Which done, Hierome added this exhortation in few words following:

“I say unto you, good brethren, that God hath bought us all with no small price, neither with gold nor silver, or other such things of small value, but with his most precious blood. Be not unthankful, therefore, to him again, but do as much as to Christian men belongeth to fulfil his commandments, that is, ‘love your brethren.’ Love hurteth no man, love filleth all things. If God hath sent thee plenty, help thy neighbour that hath need. Give him good counsel. If he lack, consider, if thou wert in necessity, thou wouldest gladly be refreshed. And again, bear your cross with Christ. Consider what reproof, slander, and reproach he suffered of his enemies, and how patiently he suffered all things. Consider, that all that Christ did was of his mere goodness, and not of our deserving; for if we could merit our own salvation, Christ would not have died for us. But, for Adam’s breaking of God’s precepts we had been all lost, if Christ had not redeemed us again.—And like as Adam brake the precepts, and was driven out of paradise; so we, if we break God’s commandments, shall have damnation, if we do not repent and ask mercy. Now, therefore, let all Christians put no trust nor confidence in their works, but in the blood of Christ, to whom I commit my soul to guide, beseeching you all to pray to God for me, and for my brethren here present with me, that our souls, leaving these wretched carcasses, may firmly depart in the true faith of Christ.”

In much like sort Garret also protesting and exhorting the people, after his confession made, ended his protestation in manner as followeth:

“I also detest, abhor, and refuse, all heresies and errors, and if, either by negligence or ignorance, I have taught or maintained any, I am sorry for it, and ask God mercy; or if I have been so vehement or rash in preaching, whereby any person hath taken any offence, error, or evil opinion, I desire him, and all other persons which I have any way offended, forgiveness. Notwithstanding, to my remembrance I never preached wittingly or willingly any thing against God’s holy word, or contrary to the true faith, to the maintenance of errors, heresies, or vicious living; but have always, according to my ability, set forth the honour of God and the right obedience to his laws, and also to those of the king. And if I could have done better, I would. Wherefore, Lord, if I have taken in hand to do that thing which I could not perfectly perform, I desire thy pardon for my bold presumption. And I pray God send the king’s grace good and godly counsel, to his glory, to the king’s honour, and the increase of virtue in this his realm. And thus now I yield my soul up unto Almighty God, trusting and believing that he of his infinite mercy, for his promise made in the blood of his Son, our most merciful Saviour Jesus Christ, will take it, and pardon me all my sins, whereby I have most grievously from my youth offended his majesty; wherefore I ask him mercy, desiring you all to pray with me and for me, that I may patiently suffer this pain, and die steadfastly in true faith, perfect hope, and charity.”

And so, after their prayer made, wherein most effectually they desired the Lord Jesus to be their comfort and consolation in this their affliction, and to establish them with perfect faith, constancy, and patience, through the Holy Ghost, they taking themselves by the hands, and kissing one another, quietly and humbly offered themselves to the hands of the tormentors, and so took their death in a Christian manner, with such patience as might well testify the goodness of their cause, and quiet of their conscience.

Wherein is to be noted how mightily the Lord worketh with his grace and fortitude in the hearts of his servants, especially in such which causelessly suffer with a guiltless conscience for religion’s sake, above others which suffer otherwise for their deserts. For whereas they which suffer as malefactors, are commonly wont to go heavy and pensive to their death; so the other with heavenly alacrity and cheerfulness do abide whatsoever it pleaseth the Lord to lay upon them. Example whereof we have right well to note, not only in these three godly martyrs above-mentioned, but also in the lord Cromwell, who suffered but two days before.

Who first calling for his breakfast, and cheerfully eating the same, and after that passing out of his prison down the hill within the Tower, and meeting by the way lord Hungerford, going likewise to his execution, (who for other matter, here not to be spoken of, was there also imprisoned,) and perceiving him to be all heavy and doleful, with cheerful countenance and comfortable words asking why he was so heavy, he willed him to pluck up his heart, and to be of good comfort: For (said he) there is no cause for you to fear; for if you repent and be heartily sorry for that you have done, there is for you mercy enough with the Lord, who for Christ’s sake will forgive you; and therefore be not dismayed. And though the breakfast which we are going to be sharp, yet, trusting to the mercy of the Lord, we shall have a joyful dinner.

And so went they together to the place of execution, and took their deaths patiently.

The Burning of RICHARD MEKINS, a Lad of Fifteen Years of Age.

Not long after this, Sir William Roch being mayor, Bonner with other commissioners sat at the Guildhall, before whom there was a certain number of citizens warned to appear, and after the commission read, the said parties were called to the book; and when five or six were sworn, one of the said persons being called to the book, Bonner seemed to mislike, and said, "Stay awhile, my masters; I would ye should consider this matter well that we have in hand, which concerneth the glory of God, the honour of the king, and the wealth of the realm; and if there be any here among you that doth not consider the same, it were better that he were hence than here." Then communed the commissioners with Bonner about that man; so that at length he was called to the book and sworn, not altogether with his good will.

When the two juries were sworn, Bonner taketh upon him to give the charge unto the juries, and began with a tale of Anacharsis, by which example he admonished the juries to spare no persons, of what degree soever they were. And at the end of his charge, he brought forth to the bar a boy, whose name was Mekins, declaring how grievously he had offended by speaking certain words against the state, and of the death of Dr. Barnes, and produced in the said court two witnesses, which were there sworn in the face of the court.

So a day was assigned, upon which the juries aforesaid should give up their verdict; at which day both the commissioners and the said jurors met at Guildhall. Then the clerk of the peace called on the juries by their names, and when their appearance was taken, Bonner bade them put in their presentments. Then said the foreman of that jury, whose name was William Robins, My lord, we have found nothing. At which words he fared as one in agony, and said, Nothing! have ye found nothing? what, nothing? By the faith I owe to God (quoth he to the foreman,) I would trust you upon your obligation, but by your oath I will trust you nothing. Then said some of the commissioners, My lord, give them a longer day.—No, quoth he, in London they ever find nothing. I pray you, what say you to Mekins?—My Lord, (quoth the foreman,) we can say nothing to him, for we find the witnesses to disagree: one affirmeth, that he should say the sacrament was nothing but a ceremony, and the other, nothing but a signification.—Why, quoth Bonner, did he not say that Barnes died holy? Then pausing awhile, he bade call the other jury. Put in your verdict, quoth he.—My lord, said one, we have found nothing.—Jesus! quoth he, is not this a strange case!

Then spake one of the same jury, whose name was Ralph Foxley, and said, My lord, when you gave us a charge, we desired to have the parsons and curates of every parish to give us instructions; and it was denied us. Then stood up the recorder, and said, It was true indeed that he had spoken. And therewithal said, This last year were charged two juries, which did many things naughtily and foolishly, and did as much as in them lay to make an uproar among the king's people; and therefore it was thought not meet that they should give information to you.—Nay, nay, quoth Bonner, this was the cause: if the parson or curate should give information according to his knowledge, then what will they say? I must tell my confession to knave-priest, and he shall go by and by and open it.—What! (said my lord-mayor,) there is no man, I trow, that will say so.—Yes, by my troth, quoth Bonner, Knave-priest! Knave-priest! Then said my lord-mayor, somewhat smiling, There be some of them slippery fellows; and as men find them, so will they oft-times report. Bonner, not well contented with those words, said to the jury, My masters, what say you to Mekins? They answered, The witnesses do not agree, therefore we do not allow them. Why, quoth Bonner, this court hath allowed them. Then said one of the jury to the recorder, Is it sufficient for our discharge, if this court do allow them?—Yea, said the recorder, it is sufficient; and then said, Go you aside together awhile, and bring in your verdict.

After the jury had talked together a little while, they returned to the bar again with their indictment, which at Bonner's hand was friendly received; so both they and the other jury were discharged, and bidden to take their ease. Thus ended the court for that day.

Shortly after they sat for life and death.—Mekins being brought to the bar, and the indictment read, Bonner said to him, Mekins, confess the truth, and submit thyself unto the king's law, that thy death may be an example to all other.

This Richard Mekins being a child about the age of fifteen years, as he had heard some other folks talk, so chanced he to speak against the sacrament of the altar; which coming to Bonner's ears, he never left him before he had brought him to the fire. During the time of his imprisonment, neither his poor father nor mother for fear durst aid him with any relief, whereby he there endured great misery. At the time he was brought to the stake, he was taught to speak much good of the bishop of London, and of the great charity he shewed to him, and to defy and detest all heretics and heresies, but especially Dr. Barnes, unto whom he imputed the learning of that heresy, which was the cause of his death. The poor lad would for the sake of his life have gladly said that the twelve apostles had taught it him; such was his childish innocency and fear! But for this deed many spake and said, it was great shame for the bishop, whose part and duty it had been, rather to have laboured to save his life, than to procure that terrible execution; seeing that he was such an ignorant soul, that he knew not what was the meaning of heresy.

The Story of JOHN PORTER, cruelly murdered for reading the Bible in Paul's.

John Porter, in the year 1541, for reading the Bible in Paul's church, was cruelly handled, and that unto death, as you shall hear. Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, (in the days of the lord Cromwell,) being then ambassador at Paris, was a great agent in setting forward the printing of the Bible in that great volume; promising, moreover, that he would for his part have six of those Bibles set up in the church of St. Paul in London. Which also at his coming home he no less performed, according to the king's proclamation set forth for the same.

The Bibles thus standing in Paul's by the commandment of the king, and the appointment of Bonner the bishop, many well-disposed people used much to resort to the hearing thereof, especially when they could get any that had an audible voice to read unto them, misdoubting therein no danger toward them; and no more there was, so long as Cromwell lived. After he was gone, it happened among sundry godly-disposed persons, which frequented there the reading of the aforesaid Bible, that one John Porter used sometimes to be occupied in that godly exercise, to the edifying as well of himself as of others.

This Porter was a fresh young man, and of a big stature, who by diligent reading of the scripture, and by hearing of such sermons as then were preached by them that were the setters forth of God's truth, became very expert. The Bibles then being set up by Bonner's commandment upon divers pillars in Paul's church, fixed to the same with chains, for all men to read in them that would, great multitudes would resort thither to hear this Porter, because he could read well, and had an audible voice. Bonner and his chaplains being grieved withal, (and the world beginning then to frown upon the gospellers,) sent for the aforesaid Porter, and rebuked him very sharply for his reading. But Porter answered him, that he trusted he had done nothing contrary to the law, neither contrary to his advertisements which he had fixed in print over every Bible.

Bonner then laid unto his charge, that he had made expositions upon the text, and gathered great multitudes about him to make tumults. He answered, he trusted that should not be proved by him. But in fine, Bonner sent him to Newgate, where he was miserably fettered in irons, both legs and arms, with a collar of iron about his neck fastened to the wall in the dungeon; being there so cruelly handled, that he was compelled to send for a kinsman of his. Who seeing his kinsman in this miserable ease, entreated Jewet, then keeper of Newgate, that he might be released out of those cruel irons; and so through friendship and money had him up among other prisoners, which lay there for felony and murder: where Porter being amongst them, hearing and seeing their wickedness and blasphemy, exhorted them to amendment of life, and gave unto them such instructions as he had learned from the scriptures. For which his so doing he was complained of, and so carried down and laid in the lower dungeon of all, oppressed with bolts and irons, where, within six or eight days after, he was found dead.

It is signified to us by credible information, that the same night before he was found dead, they that dwelt near to the same place of the prison where Porter lay, did hear him piteously to groan and make a lamentable noise; where some suppose that he was put in certain strait irons which were in the house, called The Devil on the Neck, being after an horrible sort devised, straining and wrenching the neck of a man with his legs together, in such sort as the more he stirreth in it the straiter it presseth him, so that within three or four hours it breaketh and crusheth a man's back and body in pieces. In which devilish torment, whether John Porter was slain or no, it is not certain. But howsoever it was, this is known, that he was found dead in the dungeon, with such groaning and piteous noise heard the night before in the said dungeon as is declared.

A Note of one Thomas Sommers, imprisoned for the Gospel.

Amongst these Londoners thus troubled by the clergy, we will add also another note of a merchant called Thomas Sommers, who died in the Tower of London for confessing of the gospel. Which said Thomas, being a very honest merchant, and wealthy, was sent for by the lord cardinal, and committed to the Tower, for that he had Luther's books, as they termed them, and after a great suit made for him to the said cardinal, his judgment was, that he should ride from the Tower into Cheapside, carrying a new book in his hand, and be hanged with books round about him, with three or four other merchants after the same order, which was done. And when Mr. Sommers should be set on a collier's nag, as the rest of his fellow-prisoners were, a friend of his, called Mr. Copland, brought him a very good gelding, fair dressed with bridle and saddle: and when the bishop's officers came to dress him with books, as they had trimmed the others, and would have made holes in his garment to have thrust the strings of the books therein; "Nay," (said Sommers,) "I have always loved to go handsomely in my apparel;" and taking the books, and opening them, he bound them together by the strings, and cast them about his neck (the leaves being all open) like a collar, and being on horseback, rode foremost through the streets, till they came about the Standard in Cheapside, where a great fire was made to burn their books in, and a pillory set up there for four persons, in token that they had deserved it.

In the mean time, by the way as they should come, it was appointed that one should go before them with a bason; at the noise of which Mr. Sommers' horse was in such a rage, that he which rung the bason being afraid of himself, was fain to go alone a great space before that any horseman followed after.

At length, when they came to the fire, every one of them having a book in his hand, they were commanded to cast their books into the fire. But when Mr. Sommers saw that his New Testament should be burned, he threw it over the fire; which was seen by some of God's enemies, and brought to him again, commanding him to cast it into the fire: which he would not do, but cast it through the fire. Which thing was done three times; but at last a stander-by took it up, and saved it from the burning.

But not long after the said Mr. Sommers was cast again into the Tower by the cardinal, through the cruelty of the bishops and their adherents; who soon after died in the said prison for the testimony of his faith.

Thomas Bernard and James Morton, Martyrs.

About the same time, John Langland, bishop of Lincoln, burned two upon one day, the one named Thomas Bernard, and the other James Morton: the one for teaching the Lord's prayer in English, and the other for keeping the epistle of St. James translated into English.

In Oxford also the same time, or much thereabouts, recanted one Mr. Barber, master of arts, of that university, a man excellently learned. Who being called up to Lambeth before the archbishop, Thomas Cranmer, was in his examination so stout in the cause of the sacrament, and so learnedly defended himself therein, that neither Cranmer himself, nor all they, could well answer to his allegations brought out of Augustine. Wherein he was so prompt and ripe of himself, that the archbishop, with the residue of his company, greatly admired him. Notwithstanding, by compulsion of the time, at last he relented, and returning again to Oxford, was there caused to recant. After which the good man did not prosper long, but wore away.

CONFUSION among the DOCTORS and MASTERS of OXFORD, in St. Mary's Church, at the Recantation of Mr. MALARY, M. A. of Cambridge.

THIS recantation of Mr. Barber aforesaid, in the university of Oxford, bringeth me in remembrance of another recantation likewise, happening not long before in the said university, which I thought here not to overpass; and, namely, for that the same carrieth withal a merry ridiculous spectacle, not unworthy to be remembered, and here to be inserted, somewhat to recreate and refresh by the way the weary mind of the reader, after so many bloody and lamentable stories, executions, recantations, and tragedies above passed. The story is this:—

There was one Mr. Malary, master of arts, of Cambridge, scholar of Christ's-college, who for the like opinions to those above rehearsed, holden contrary to the Catholic determination of the holy mother church of Rome, that is, for the right truth of Christ's gospel, was cited before the bishops, and in the end sent to Oxford, there openly to recant, and to bear his faggot, to the terror of the students of that university. The time and place were appointed, that he should he brought solemnly into St. Mary's church upon a Sunday; where a great number of the head doctors and divines, and others of the university, were together assembled, besides a great multitude of citizens and town-dwellers, which came to behold the sight. Furthermore, because that solemnity should not pass without some effectual sermon, for the holding up of mother church, Dr. Smith, reader then of the divinity lecture, was appointed to make the sermon at this recantation. Briefly; at the preaching of this sermon there was assembled a mighty audience of all sorts and degrees, as well of students as others. Few were absent which loved to hear or see any news, insomuch that there was no place in the whole church which was not fully replenished with the concourse of people.

All things being thus prepared and set in readiness, cometh forth Malary, with his faggot upon his shoulder. Not long after also proceedeth the doctor into the pulpit, to make his sermon, the purpose and argument whercof was wholly upon the sacrament. Which doctor, for the more confirmation and credit to his words, had provided the holy Catholic cake, and the sacrament of the altar, there to hang by a string before him in the pulpit. Thus the doctor, with his god almighty, entering his godly sermon, had scarce proceeded into the midst thereof, (the people giving great silence with all reverence unto his doctrine,) but suddenly was heard into the church the voice of one crying in the street, Fire! Fire! The party which thus cried first in the street was called Henster. The occasion was this: coming from Allhallow's parish, he saw a chimney on fire, and so passing in the street by St. Mary's church, cried, Fire, fire, as the fashion is, meaning no hurt.

This sound of fire being heard in the church, first by them which stood next to the door, so increased and went from one to another, that at length it came unto the ears of the doctors, and at last to the preacher himself: who as soon as they heard the matter, being amazed with sudden fear, and marvelling what the matter should mean, began to look up into the top of the church, and to behold the walls. The residue seeing them look up, looked up also. Then began they in the midst of the audience to cry out with a loud voice, Fire, fire.—Where? saith one.—Where? saith another.—In the church, saith one. The mention of the church was scarcely pronounced, when as in one moment there was a common cry amongst them, The church is on fire, the church is on fire by heretics, &c. And although no man did see any fire at all, yet forsomuch as all men did cry out so, every man thought it true. Then was there such fear and tumult of people, through the whole church, as cannot be described.

And as in a great fire (where fire is indeed) we see many times how one little spark giveth matter of a mighty flame, setting whole stacks and piles on burning; so hereupon a small occasion of one man's word kindled first a general cry then a strong opinion running in every man's head within the church, thinking the church to be on fire, where no fire was at all. Thus it pleased Almighty God to delude these deluders, that is, that these great doctors and wise men of the schools, which think themselves so wise in God's matters as though they could not err, should see by their own senses and judgments, how blinded and infatuated they were in these so small matters and sensible trifles.

Thus this strong imagination of fire being fixed in their heads, as nothing could move them to think contrary but that the church was on fire, so every thing that they saw and heard increased this suspicion. The chief occasion of this suspicion, was the heretic there bearing his faggot, which gave them to imagine, that all other heretics had conspired with him to set the church on fire.

After this, through the rage of the people, and running to and fro, the dust was so raised, that it shewed as it had been the smoke of fire. Which thing, together with the outcry of the people, made all men so afraid, that leaving the sermon, they began altogether to run away. But such was the press of the multitude, running in heaps together, that the more they laboured, the less they could get out. For whilst they ran all headlong to the doors, every man striving to get out first, they thrust one another in such sort, and stuck so fast, that they which were without neither could get into the church again, neither they that were within could get out by any means. So the one door being stopped, they ran to another little wicket on the north side, towards the college called Brazen-nose, thinking so to pass out. But there again was the like or greater throng. So the people clustering and thronging together, it put many in danger, and brought many unto their end, by bruising of their bones or sides. There was yet another door towards the west, which although it was shut and seldom opened, yet now ran they to it with such sway, that the great bar of iron (which is incredible to be spoken) being pulled out and broken by force of men's hands, the door notwithstanding could not be opened for the press or multitude of people.

At last, when they were there past all hope to get out, then were they all exceedingly amazed, and ran up and down, crying out upon the heretics which had conspired their death. The more they ran about and cried out, the more smoke and dust arose in the church, even as though all things had now been on a flaming fire. I think there was never such a tumultuous hurly-burly, rising so of nothing, heard of before, nor so great a fear where was no cause to fear; so that if Democritus, the merry philosopher, sitting in the top of the church, and seeing all things in such safety as they were, had looked down upon the multitude, and beholden so great a number, some howling and weeping, running up and down, and playing the madmen, now hither, now thither, as being tossed to and fro with waves or tempests, trembling, quaking, and raging, without any manifest cause; specially if he had seen those great rabbins and doctors, laden with so many badges or cognizances of wisdom, so foolishly and ridiculously seeking holes and corners to hide themselves in, gasping, breathing, and sweating, and for very horror being almost beside themselves; I think he would have satisfied himself with this one laughter for all his lifetime, or else rather would have laughed his heart out: whilst one said that he plainly heard the noise of the fire, another affirmed that he saw it with his eyes, and another swore that he felt the molten lead dropping down upon his head and shoulders. Such is the force of imagination, when it is once grafted in men's hearts through fear. In all the whole company there was none that behaved himself more modestly than the heretic that was there to do penance; who casting his faggot off from his shoulders upon a monk's head that stood by, kept himself quiet, minding to take such part as the others did.

All the others being careful for themselves, never made an end of running up and down, and crying out. None cried out more earnestly than the doctor that preached, who first of all cried out in the pulpit, saying, "These are the trains and subtleties of the heretics against me: Lord have mercy upon me! Lord have mercy upon me!"

In all this great maze and garboil there was nothing more feared than the melting of the lead, which many affirmed that they felt dropping upon their bodies. Now in this sudden terror and fear, which took from them all reason and counsel, to behold what practices and sundry shifts every man made for himself, it would make not only Democritus and Heraclitus also to laugh, but rather a horse well near to break his halter. But none used themselves more ridiculously, than such as seemed wise men, saying that in one or two peradventure somewhat more quietness of mind appeared. Among whom was one Claymond, president of Corpus Christi college, and a few other aged persons with him, which for their age and weakness darst not thrust themselves into the throng amongst the rest, but knecled down quietly before the high altar, committing themselves and their lives unto the sacrament. The others which were younger and stronger, ran up and down through the press, marvelling at the uncivility of men, and waxed angry with the unmannerly multitude, that would give no room unto the doctors, bachelors, masters, and other graduates, and regent masters. But as the terror and fear was common unto all, so was there no difference made of persons or degrees, every man shifting for himself. The violet cap, or purple gown, did there nothing avail the doctor, neither the master's hood, nor the monk's cowl, was there respected; yea, if the king or queen had been there at that present, and in that perplexity, they had been no better than a common man.

After they had long striven and assayed all manner of ways, and saw no remedy, neither by force, neither by authority, to prevail, they fell to entreating and offering of rewards; one offering twenty pounds, another his scarlet gown, so that any man would pull him out, though it were by the ears.

Some stood close unto the pillars, thinking themselves safe under the vaults of stone from the dropping of the lead. Others, being without money, and unprovided of all shifts, knew not which way to turn them. One, being a president of a certain college, pulling a board out from the pews, covered his head and shoulders therewith against the scalding lead, which they feared much more than the falling of the church.

But what a laughter would it have administered unto Democritus, amongst other things to behold there a certain grand paunched monk, who seeing the doors stopped, and every way closed up, thought by another compendious means to get through a glass window! But here the iron grates stopped him, notwithstanding his greedy mind would needs attempt if he could happily bring his purpose to pass. When he had broken the glass, and was come to the space between the grates where he should creep out, first he thrust in his head with the one shoulder, and it went through well enough; then he laboured to get the other shoulder after, but there was a great labour about that, and long he stuck by the shoulders, with much ado; for what doth not importune labour overcome? Thus far forth he was now gotten; but by what part of his body he did stick fast, I am not certain, neither may I feign, forsomuch as there be yet witnesses which did see these things, which could correct me if I should so do. Notwithstanding, this is most certain, that he did stick fast between the grates, and could neither get out nor in.

Thus this good man, having but short hose, by which way he supposed soonest to escape, by the same he fell into further inconvenience, making of one danger two: for if the fire or lead had fallen on the outside, those parts which did hang out of the window had been in danger; and, contrariwise, if the flame had raged within the church, all his other parts had lien open to the fire. And as this man did stick fast in the window, so did the rest stick as fast in the doors, that sooner they might have been burned, than they could stir or move one foot. Through which press at the last a way was found, that some going over their heads got out.

Here also happened another pageant in a certain monk of Gloucester-college, whereat Calphurnius might well laugh with an open mouth. So it happened, that there was a young lad in this tumult, who seeing the doors fast stopped with the press or multitude, and that he had not way to get out, climbed up upon the door; and there staying upon the top of the door, was forced to tarry still. For to come down into the church again he durst not, for fear of the fire; and to leap down towards the street, he could not without danger of falling. When he had tarried there awhile, he advised himself what to do; neither did occasion want to serve for his purpose. For by chance, amongst them that got over men's heads, he saw a monk coming towards him, which had a great wide cowl hanging at his back. This the boy thought to be a good occasion for him to escape by: when the monk came near unto him, the boy which was on the top of the door came down, and prettily conveyed himself into the monk's cowl, thinking that if the monk did escape, he should also get out with him. To be brief, at the last the monk got out over men's heads, with the boy in his cowl, and for a great while felt no weight or burden.

At the last, when he was somewhat more come to himself, and did shake his shoulders, feeling his cowl heavier than it was accustomed to be, and also hearing the voice of one speaking behind in his cowl, he was more afraid than he was before when he was in the throng, thinking in very deed that the evil spirit, which had set the church on fire, had flown into his cowl. By and by he began to play the exorcist: In the name of God, said he, and all saints, I command thee to declare what thou art that art behind at my back?—To whom the boy answered, I am Bertram's boy; for that was his name. But I, said the monk, adjure thee in the name of the unseparable Trinity, that thou wicked spirit do tell me who thou art, from whence thou comest, and that thou get hence.—I am Bertram's boy, said he; good master, let me go. And with that his cowl began with the weight to crack upon his shoulders. The monk, when he perceived the matter, took the boy out, and discharged his cowl. The boy took to his legs, and ran away as fast as he could.

Among others, one wiser than the rest ran with the church door key, beating upon the stone walls, thinking therewith to break an hole through to escape out.

In the mean time, those that were in the street looking diligently about them, and perceiving all things to be without fear, marvelled at this sudden outrage, and made signs and tokens to them that were in the church, to keep themselves quiet, crying to them that there was no danger.

But forsomuch as no word could be heard by reason of the noise that was within the church, those signs made them much more afraid than they were before, interpreting the matter as though all had been on fire without the church, and for the dropping of the lead and falling of other things, they should rather tarry still within the church, and not venture out. This trouble continued in this manner by the space of certain hours.

The next day, and also all the week following, there was an incredible number of bills set upon the church door, to inquire for things that were lost, in such variety and number, as Democritus might here again have just cause to laugh. "If any man have found a pair of shoes yesterday in St. Mary's church, or knoweth any man that have found them, &c." Another bill was set up, for a gown that was lost. Another entreated to have his cap restored. One lost his purse and girdle with certain money; another his sword. One inquireth for a ring, and one for one thing, another for another. To be short, there was few in this garboil, but that either through negligence lost, or through oblivion left, some thing behind them.

Thus have you hitherto heard a tragical story of a terrible fire which did no hurt.—The description whereof, although it be not so perfectly expressed according to the worthiness of the matter, yet because it was not to be passed with silence, we have superficially set forth; whereby the wise and discreet may sufficiently consider the rest, if any thing else be lacking in setting forth the full narration thereof.

As touching the heretic, because he had not done his sufficient penance there by occasion of this hurly-burly, therefore the next day following he was reclaimed into the church of St. Frideswide, where he supplied the rest that lacked of his plenary penance.

RELIGION REFORMED BY THE KING.

Now as touching the marriage between the king and the lady Howard, it is well known that it endured not long; for in the year next following, 1542, the said lady Katharine was accused to the king of incontinent living, not only before her marriage, with Francis Dereham, but also of spouse-breach, after her marriage, with Thomas Culpepper. For which both the men aforesaid, by act of parliament, were attainted and executed for high treason, and also the lady Katharine, late queen, with the lady Jane Rochford, widow, late wife to George Boleyn, lord Rochford, brother to queen Ann Boleyn, were beheaded for their deserts within the Tower. Ex Hallo et aliis.

After the death and punishment of this lady, his fifth wife, the king calling to remembrance the words of the lord Cromwell, and missing now more and more his old counsellor, and partly also smelling somewhat the ways of Winchester, began a little to set his foot again in the cause of religion. And although he ever bare a special favour to Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, (as you shall hear more hereafter, God willing, in the life of Cranmer,) yet now the more he missed the lord Cromwell, the more he inclined to the archbishop, and also to the right cause of religion. And therefore in the same year, and in the month of October, after the execution of this queen, the king understanding some abuses yet to remain unreformed, namely, about pilgrimages and idolatry, and other things besides, to be corrected within his dominions, directed his letters unto the aforesaid archbishop of Canterbury, for the speedy redress and reformation of the same. The tenor of which letters hereafter fully ensheweth, in these words:

The King's Letters to the Archbishop, for the abolishing of Idolatry.

"Right reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well, letting you to wit, that whereas heretofore upon the zeal and remembrance which we had to our bounden duty towards Almighty God, perceiving sundry superstitions and abuses to be used and embraced by our people, whereby they grievously offended him and his word, we did not only cause the images and bones of such as they resorted and offered unto, with the ornaments of the same, and all such writings and monuments of feigned miracles, wherewith they were illuded, to be taken away in all places of the realm, but also by our injunctions commanded that no offering or setting up of lights or candles should be suffered in any church, but only the blessed sacrament of the altar: it is lately come to our knowledge, that, this our good intent and purpose notwithstanding, the shrines, coverings of shrines, and monuments of those things, do yet remain in sundry places of this realm, much to the slander of our doings, and to the great displeasure of Almighty God, the same being means to allure our subjects to their former hypocrisy and superstition, and also that our injunctions be not kept as appertaineth. For the due and speedy reformation whereof, we have thought meet, by these our letters, expressly to will and command you, that incontinent upon the receipt hereof, you shall not only cause due search to be made in the cathedral church for those things, and if any shrine, covering of shrine, table, monument of miracles, or other pilgrimages, do there continue, to cause it to be so taken away, as there remain no memory of it, but also that you shall take order with all the curates, and other having charge within your diocese, to do the semblable, and to see that our injunctions be duly kept as appertaineth, without failing, as we trust you, and as you will answer to the contrary.—Given under our signet at our town of Hull, the 4th day of October, in the 33d year of our reign."

Furthermore, the next year after this ensuing, which was 1543, in the month of February, followed another proclamation given out by the king's authority, wherein the pope's law, forbidding white meats to be eaten in Lent, was repealed, and the eating of such meats set at liberty, for the behoof of the king's subjects. The copy of which proclamation I thought here good also to be remembered.

A Proclamation concerning eating of White Meats, made the 9th of February, the 34th year of the reign of the King's most Royal Majesty.

"Forasmuch as by divers and sundry occasions, as well herrings, ling, salt-fish, salmon, stock-fish, as other kinds of fish, have been this year scant, and also enhanced in prices above the old rate and common estimation of their value, so that if the king's loving subjects should be enforced only to buy and provide herring and other salt store of fish for the necessary and sufficient sustentation and maintenance of their household and families all this holy time of Lent, according as they have been wont in times past to do, and should not be by some other convenient means relieved therein, the same might and should undoubtedly redound to their importable charge and detriment; and forasmuch as his highness considereth how this kind and manner of fasting, that is to say, to abstain from milk, butter, eggs, cheese, and other white meats, is but a mere positive law of the church, and used by a custom within this realm, and of none other force or necessity, but the same may be upon considerations and grounds altered and dispensed with from time to time, by the public authority of kings and princes, whensoever they shall perceive the same to tend to the hurt and damage of their people: The king's highness, therefore, most graciously considering and tendering the wealth and commodity of his people, hath thought good, for the considerations above rehearsed, to release and dispense with the said law and custom of abstaining from white meats this holy time of Lent, and of his especial grace and mere motion giveth and granteth unto all and singular his subjects within this his realm of England, Wales, Isles, Guisnes, and Hamnes, and in all other his grace's dominions, free liberty, faculty, and license, to eat all manner of white meats, as milk, eggs, butter, cheese, and such like, during the time of this Lent, without any scruple or grudge of conscience, any law, constitution, use, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Wherein nevertheless his highness exhorteth, and in the name of God requireth, all such his faithful subjects, as may, will, or shall enjoy, this his said grant or faculty, that they be in no wise scrupulous or doubtful thereof, nor abuse or turn the same into a fleshly or carnal liberty, but rather endeavour themselves, to their possible powers, with this liberty of eating of white meats, to observe also that fast which God most specially requireth of them, that is to say, to renounce the world and the devil, with all their pomps and works, and also to subdue and repress their carnal affections, and the corrupt works of the flesh, according to their vow and profession made at the font stone; for in these points specially consisteth the very true and perfect abstinence or fasting of a Christian man; thus to endure and continue from year to year, till the king's highness's pleasure shall by his majesty's proclamation be published to the contrary."

The Trouble and Persecution of four Windsor Men, ROBERT TESTWOOD, HENRY FILMER, ANTHONY PEARSON, and JOHN MARBECK, persecuted for Righteousness' sake, and for the Gospel.

Coming now to the story of the four Windsor men, persecuted for the true testimony of God's word, whereof three were sacrificed in fire, the fourth (which was Marbeck) had his pardon. First, I have to shew the origin of their troubles; secondly, the manner and order of their death as they suffered together, which was anno 1544.

The Causes.

In the year of our Lord 1544, there was one Robert Testwood, dwelling in the city of London, who for his knowledge in music had so great a name, that the musicians in Windsor-college thought him a worthy man to have a room among them. Whereupon they informed Dr. Sampson (being then their dean) of him. But forso much as some of the canons had at that time heard of Testwood, how that he smelled of the new learning, as they called it, it would not be consented unto at the first; notwithstanding, with often suit of the aforesaid musicians, made to one Dr. Tate, a room being void, Testwood was sent for to be heard. And being there four or five days among the choir men, he was so well liked both for his voice and cunning, that he was admitted, and after settled in Windsor, with his household, and had in good estimation with the dean and canons a great while: but when they had perceived him by his often talk at their tables (for he could not well dissemble his religion) that he leaned to Luther's sect, they began to dislike him. And so passing forth among them, it was his chance one day to be at dinner with one of the canons, named Dr. Rawson; at which dinner, among all others, was one of king Henry's four chantry priests, named Mr. Ely, an old bachelor of divinity. Which Ely, in his talk at the board, began to rail against laymen who took upon them to meddle with the scriptures, and to be better learned (knowing no more but the English tongue) than they which had been students in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge all the days of their lives.—Then Testwood, perceiving he meant him, could forbear no longer, but said, Mr. Ely, by your patience, I think it to be no hurt for laymen, as I am, to read and to know the scriptures.

Which of you (quoth Ely) that be unlearned knoweth them, or understandeth them? St. Paul saith, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; and in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head." Now, sir, (quoth Ely) what meaneth St. Paul by those coals of fire?—Marry, sir, (quoth Testwood) he meaneth nothing else by them, as I have learned, but burning clarity, that by doing good to our enemies we should thereby win them.—Ah, sirrah, quoth he, you are an old scholar indeed.

After this, they fell into further communication of the pope, whose supremacy was much spoken of at that time, but not known to be so far in question in the parliament house as it was. And in their talk Ely demanded of Testwood, Whether the pope ought to be head of the church or no? Against which, Testwood durst not say his full mind, but reasoned within his bounds a great while. But when they were both well stricken in a heat, Testwood, forgetting himself, chanced to say, That every king, in his own realm and dominion, ought to be the head of the church under Christ. At which words Ely was so chafed, that he rose up from the table in a great fume, calling him heretic, and all that was naught, and so went brawling away, to the great disquieting of all the company that were there.

Then was Testwood very sorry to see the old man take it so grievously. Whereupon after dinner he went and sought Mr. Ely, and found him walking in the body of the church, thinking to have talked with him charitably, and so have been at one again; but ever as he pressed towards him, the other shunned him, and would not come nigh him, but spit at him; saying to others that walked by, Beware of this fellow, for he is the greatest heretic and schismatic that ever came into Windsor.

Now began the matter to brew, for after that Ely had made his complaint to the dean's deputy and other of the canons, they were all against Testwood, purposing surely at the dean's coming home (if all things had chanced even) to have put him to trouble. But see the fortune: it was not twelve days after, ere that the king's supremacy passed in the parliament house. Whereupon the dean (Dr. Sampson) came home suddenly in the night late, and forthwith sent his verger about to all the canons and ministers of the college, from the highest to the lowest, commanding them to be in the chapter house by eight of the clock in the morning. Then Ely consulted with the canons over-night, and thought on the next day to have put Testwood to a great trouble. "But he that layeth a snare for another man (saith Solomon) shall be taken in it himself. And so was Ely. For when the dean, and every man, were come and placed in the chapter-house, and that the dean had commended the ministers of the church for their diligence in tending the choir, exhorting them also to continue in the same; he began, contrary to every man's expectation, to inveigh against the bishop of Rome's supremacy and usurped authority, confounding the same by manifest scriptures and probable reasons, so earnestly, that it was a wonder to hear; and at length declared openly, that by the whole consent of the parliament house, the pope's supremacy was utterly abolished out of this realm of England for ever; and so commanded every man there, upon his allegiance, to call him Pope no more, but Bishop of Rome; and whatsoever he were that would not so do, or did from that day forth maintain or favour his cause by any manner of means, he should not only lose the benefit of that house, but be reputed as an utter enemy to God, and to the king. The canons hearing this, they were all stricken dumb. Yet notwithstanding, Ely's heat was so great, that he would fain have uttered his cankered stomach against Testwood: but the dean, breaking his tale, called him old fool, and took him up so sharply, that he was fain to hold his peace. Then the dean commanded all the pope's pardons, which hanged about the church, to be brought into the Chapter-house, and east into the chimney, and burnt before all their faces; and so departed.

Another Cause of Testwood's Troubles.

As it chanced Testwood one day to walk in the church at afternoon, and beheld the pilgrims, especially of Devonshire and Cornwall, how they came in by companies, with candles and images of wax in their hands, to offer to good king Henry of Windsor, as they called him, it pitied his heart to see such great idolatry committed, and how vainly the people had spent their goods in coming so far to kiss a spurr, and to have an old hat set upon their heads; insomuch that he could not refrain, but seeing a certain company which had made their offering, stand gazing about the church, went unto them, and with all gentleness began to exhort them to leave such false worshipping of dumb creatures, and to learn to worship the true living God aright, putting them in remembrance what those things were which they worshipped, and how God many times had plagued his people for running a whoring to such stoeks and stones, and so would plague them and their posterity, if they would not leave it. After this sort he admonished them so long, till at last his words, as God would, took such place in some of them, that they said they never would go on a pilgrimage more.

Then he went further, and found another sort licking and kissing a white lady made of alabaster, which image was mortised into a wall behind the high altar, and bordered about with a pretty border, which was made like branches with hanging apples and flowers. And when he saw them so superstitiously use the image, as to wipe their hands upon it, and then to stroke them over their heads and faces, as though there had been great virtue in touching the picture, he up with his hand (in which he had a key) and smote a piece of the border, about the image, down, and with the glance of the stroke chanced to break off the image's nose. "Lo, good people, (quoth he,) you see what it is, nothing but earth and dust, and cannot help itself; and how then will you have it to help you? For God's sake, brethren, be no more deceived." And so he got him home to his house; for the rumour was so great, that many came to see the image how it was defaced.

And, amongst all others, came one William Simons, a lawyer, who seeing the image so bewrayed, and to lack her nose, took the matter grievously, and looking down upon the pavement, he espied the image's nose where it lay, which he took up and put in his purse, saying, it should be a dear nose to Testwood one day.

Now were many offended with Testwood; the canons for speaking against their profit, the wax-sellers for hindering their market, and Simons for the image's nose. And more than that, there were of the canons' men that threatened to kill him: whereupon Testwood kept his house, and durst not come forth, minding to send the whole matter in writing, by his wife, to Mr. Cromwell, the king's secretary, who was his special friend.

Other Causes of Testwood's Troubles.

Upon a relic Sunday, as they named it, when every minister after their old custom should have borne a relic in his hand about a proceession, one was brought to Testwood; which relic, as they said, was a rochet of bishop Becket's. And as the sexton would have put the rochet into Testwood's hands, he pushed it from it; and so the rochet was given to another.

In the days of Mr. Franklen, who succeeded Dr. Sampson in the deanery of Windsor, there was on a time set up at the choir door a certain foolish printed paper in metre, all to the praise and commendation of our Lady, ascribing unto her our justification, our salvation, our redemption, the forgiveness of sins, &c. to the great dishonour of Christ. Which paper one of the canons, called Mr. Magnus, as it was reported, caused to be set up in despite of Testwood and his sect. When Testwood saw this paper, he took it down secretly. The next day after was another set up in the same place. Then Testwood coming into the church, and seeing another paper set up, and also the dean coming a little way off, made haste to be at the choir door, while the dean stayed to take holy water; and reaching up his hand as he went, plucked away the paper with him. The dean being come to his stall, called Testwood unto him, and said, That he marvelled greatly how he durst be so bold to take down the paper in his presence. Testwood answered again, That he marvelled much more, that his mastership would suffer such a blasphemous paper to be set up, beseeching him not to be offended with that he had done, for he would stand unto it.

Now Mr. Magnus being sore offended with Testwood for plucking down his papers, to be revenged on him, devised with the dean and the rest of the canons, to send their letters to Dr. Chamber, one of their brethren, and the king's physician, who lay for the most part at the court, to see what he would do against Testwood. Which letters were sent with speed. But whatever the cause was, I cannot tell, their suit came to none effect. Then they determined to let the matter sleep till St. George's feast, which was not far off.

Within fourteen days after this, the lords of the garter (as the custom is yearly to do) came to Windsor to keep St. George's feast, at which feast the duke of Norfolk was president: unto whom the dean and canons made a grievous complaint on Testwood. Who being called before the duke, he shook him, and reviled him, as though he would have sent him to hanging by and by. Yet, nevertheless, Testwood so behaved himself to the duke, that in the end he let him go without any further molesting him.

The Origin of HENRY FILMER's Troubles.

About the year of our Lord 1541, after all the orders of superstitious and begging friars were suppressed and put down, there chanced one Sir Thomas Melster, who had been a friar before, and changed his friar's coat, (but not his friar's heart,) to be vicar of Windsor. This priest on a time made a sermon to his parishioners, in which he declared so many fond and friarish tales, (as that our Lady should hold out her breasts to St. Bernard, and spout her milk into his eyes, with such like festival tales,) that many honest men were offended therewith, and especially this Henry Filmer, then one of the churchwardens; who was so zealous for God's word, that he could not abide to hear the glory of Christ so defaced with superstitious fables. Whereupon he took an honest man or two with him, and went to the priest, with whom he talked so honestly and so charitably, that in the end the priest gave him hearty thanks, and was content at his gentle admonition to reform himself without any more ado; and so departed friendly the one from the other.

Now there was one in the town, called William Simons, a lawyer, who hearing that Filmer had been with the priest, and reproved him for his sermon, took offence, and got him to the vicar, and did so incense him that he slipped quite away from the promise he had made to Filmer, and followed the mind of Simons; who meeting with Filmer afterwards, reviled him, saying, "He would bring him before the bishop, to teach him to be so malapert." Then Filmer, hearing the matter renewed, which he had thought had been repressed, stood against Simons, and said, "That the vicar had preached false and unsound doctrine, and so would he say to the bishop whensoever he came before him." Then Simons slept not the matter, but went to the mayor, and procured of him and his brethren a letter, signified with their own hands, in the priest's favour, as much as could be devised; and so departed himself with his friends to go to the bishop, whose name was Dr. Capon, and to take the priest with them; which was a painful journey for the silly poor man, by reason he had a sore leg.

Now Filmer (who had got to the bishop before the others) declared unto the bishop the talk he had with the priest, and the end thereof; and how the matter being renewed again by Simons, forced him and his company to trouble his lordship therewith. Well, (said the bishop,) ye have done like honest men; come to me soon again, and ye shall know more. And so they departed from the bishop to their inn: and while they were there reposing themselves, Simons with his company came to the town, and (not knowing the other to be come) got them up to the bishop in all post-haste, taking the priest with them.

The bishop, hearing of more Windsor men, demanded what they were; and being informed how it was the vicar of the town, with others more, he caused the vicar to be brought in. To whom he said, Are you the vicar of Windsor?—Yea, forsooth, my lord, (quoth he.) How chanceth it, (quoth the bishop,) that you are complained on? For there have been with me certain honest men of your town, who have delivered up a bill of erroneous doctrine against you. If it be so, I must needs punish you. And then opening the bill, he read it unto them. How say you, (quoth the bishop,) is this true, or no? The vicar could not deny it, but humbly submitted himself to the bishop's correction. Then was his company called in; and when the bishop saw Simons, he knew him well, and said, Wherefore come ye, Mr. Simons?—Pleaseth it your lordship, (quoth he,) we are come to speak in our vicar's cause, which is a man of good conversation and honesty, and doth his duty so well in every point, that no man can find fault with him, except a lewd fellow we have in our town, called Filmer, which is so corrupt with heresy, that he is able to poison a whole country; and truly, my lord, quoth Simons, there is no man that can preach or teach any thing that is good and godly, but he is ready to control it, and to say it is stark nought. Wherefore we shall beseech your lordship he may be punished, to the ensample of others, that our vicar may do his duty quietly, as he hath done before this busy fellow troubled him. And that your lordship shall the better credit my sayings, I have brought with me these honest men of the town: and besides all that, a testimonial from the mayor and his brethren, to confirm the same; and so he held the writing out in his hand.

Then said the bishop, So God help me, Mr. Simons, ye are greatly to blame, and most worthy to be punished of all men, that will so impudently go about to maintain your priest in his error, which hath preached heresy, and hath confessed it; wherefore I may not nor will not see it unpunished. And as for that honest man, Filmer, on whom ye have complained, I tell you plainly he hath in this point shewed himself a great deal more honest man than you. But in hope you will no more bear out your vicar in his evil doing, I will remit all things at this time, saying that he shall the next Sunday recant his sermon openly before all his parishioners in Windsor church. And so the bishop called in Filmer and his company, which waited without, and delivered the priest's recantation unto them, with a great charge to see it truly observed in all points.

For this cause Simons could never brook Filmer, but when he met him at any time after, would hold up his finger, and say, "I will be even with you one day, trust me."

The Origin of ANTHONY PEARSON'S Troubles.

There was a certain priest, named Anthony Pearson, who came often to Windsor, about the year of our Lord 1540, and using the talent that God had given him in preaching, was greatly esteemed among the people, who flocked so much to his sermons which he made both in the town and country, that the great priest of the castle, with other Papists in the town, (especially Simons,) were sore offended, inso-much, that Simons at the last began to make extracts from his sermons, and to mark his auditors; whereof ensued the death of divers, and trouble of many honest men. For about a year and more after, a minister of Satan, called Doctor London, warden of the new college in Oxford, was admitted one of the prebendaries of Windsor; who at his first residence dinner which he made to the clerks, all his whole talk to two gentlemen, strangers at his board, till the table was taken up, was nothing else but of heretics, and what a desolation they would bring the realm unto, if they might be so suffered. And by St. Mary, masters, (quoth he to the clerks at last,) I cannot tell, but there goeth a shrewd report abroad of this house. Some made answer, it was undeserved. I pray God it be, (quoth he.) I am but a stranger, and have but small experience among you; but I have heard it said, before I came hither, that there be some in this house, that will neither have prayer nor fasting.

Then spake Testwood. Truly, sir, (quoth he,) I think that was spoken of malice: for prayer, as your mastership knoweth better than I, is one of the first lessons that Christ taught us.—Yea marry, sir, (quoth he,) but the heretics will have no invocation to saints, which all the old fathers do allow.—What the old fathers do allow (quoth Testwood) I cannot tell; but Christ doth appoint us to go to his Father, and to ask our petitions of him in Christ's name.—Then you will have no mean between you and God, quoth (Dr. London.)—Yes, sir, (quoth Testwood :) our mean is Christ, as St. Paul saith, "There is one Mediator between God and man, even Jesus Christ."—Give us water, (quoth Dr. London.) Which being set on the board, he said grace, and washed; and so falling into other communication with the strangers, the clerks took their leave and departed.

When Dr. London had been at Windsor awhile among his Catholic brethren, and learned what Testwood was, and also of Simons, (who shewed him our Lady's nose, as he called it,) what a sort of heretics were in the town and about the same, and how they increased daily by reason of a naughty priest, called Anthony Pearson, he was so maliciously bent against him, that he gave himself wholly to the devil to do mischief. And to bring his wicked purpose about, he conspired with the aforesaid Simons, how they might compass the matter, first to have all the arch-heretics, as they termed them, in Windsor and thereabout, indicted of heresy, and so to proceed further.

They wrote the names of all such as commonly haunted Anthony Pearson's sermons, and of all such as had the Testament, and favoured the gospel.

Then had they private spies to walk up and down the church, to hearken and hear what men said, and to mark who did not reverence the sacrament at the elevation time, and to bring his name to Dr. London. And of these spies some were chantry priests; among which there was one notable spy, whose name was Sir William Bows.

Thus when they had gathered as much as they could, and made a perfect book thereof, Dr. London, with two more of his Catholic brethren, gave them up to the bishop of Winchester, Stephen Gardiner, with a great complaint against the heretics that were in Windsor, declaring unto him how the town was sore disquieted through their doctrine and evil example. Wherefore they besought his lordship's help, in purging the town and castle of such wicked persons. The bishop hearing their complaint, and seeing their book, praised their doings, and bade them make friends, and go forward, and they should not lack his help. Then they applied to the matter with tooth and nail, sparing neither money nor pains-taking; as Marbeck saith, that he himself heard one of them say, that the suit thereof cost him that year, for his part only, an hundred marks, besides the death of three good geldings.

Now bishop Gardiner, who had conceived a further fetch in his brain than Dr. London had, made Wrisley and other of the council on his side, and spying a time convenient, went to the king, complaining what a sort of heretics his grace had in his realm, and how they were not only crept into every corner of his court, but even into his privy chamber; beseeching therefore his majesty that his laws might be prosecuted. The king, giving credit to the council's words, was content his laws should be executed on such as were offenders. Then had the bishop that he desired, and forthwith procured a commission for a private search to be made in Windsor for books and letters that Anthony Pearson should send abroad; which commission the king granted to take place in the town of Windsor, but not in the castle.

At this time the canons of Exeter (especially Suthran, treasurer of the church, and Dr. Brurewood, the chancellor,) had accused Dr. Haynes, their dean, to the council, for preaching against holy bread and holy water, and that he should say in one of his sermons, (having occasion to speak of matrimony,) that marriage and hanging were destiny; upon which they gathered treason against him, because of the king's marriage.

The bishop of Winchester, at the same time, had also informed the council of Mr. Hobby, how he was a hearer of Anthony Pearson, and a great maintainer of heretics. Whereupon both he and Dr. Haynes were apprehended, and sent to the Fleet. But it was not very long after, ere that by the mediation of friends they were both delivered.

Now, as touching the commission for searching for books, Mr. Ward and Fachel, of Reading, were appointed commissioners, who came to Windsor the Thursday before Palm-Sunday, in the year of our Lord 1543, and began their search about eleven of the clock at night. In which search were apprehended Robert Benet, Henry Filmer, John Marbeck, and Robert Testwood, for certain books and writings found in their houses, and kept in ward till Monday after, and then fetched up to the council, all save Testwood (with whom the bailiffs of the town were charged,) because he lay sore diseased of the gout. The other three being examined before the council, were committed to prison, Filmer and Benet to the bishop of London's gaol, and Marbeck to the Marshalsea; whose examination is here set out, to declare the great goodness of the council, and the cruelty of the bishop.

The first Examination of John Marbeck, before the Council, on the Monday after Palm-Sunday, 1544.

This Marbeck had begun a great work in English, called The Concordance of the Bible: which book, being not half finished, was among his other books taken in the search, and had up to the council. And when he came before them to be examined, the whole work lay before the bishop of Winchester, Stephen Gardiner, at the upper end of the board. Who beholding the poor man awhile, said, Marbeck, dost thou know wherefore thou art sent for?—No, my lord, (quoth he.)—No? (quoth the bishop;) that is a marvellous thing.—Forsooth, my lord, (quoth he,) unless it be for a certain search made of late in Windsor, I cannot tell wherefore it should be.—Then thou knowest the matter well enough, (quoth the bishop;) and taking up a quire of the Concordance in his hand, said, Understandest thou the Latin tongue?—No, my lord, (quoth he,) but simply.—No? (quoth the bishop.) And with that spake Mr. Wrisley, then secretary to the king, He saith, but simply. I cannot tell, (quoth the bishop;) but the book is translated word for word out of the Latin Concordance; and so began to declare to the rest of the council the nature of a Concordance, and how it was first compiled in Latin by the great diligence of the learned men, for the ease of preachers; concluding with this reason, that if such a book should go forth in English, it would destroy the Latin tongue. And so casting down the quire again, he reached another book, which was the book of Isaiah the prophet, and turning to the last chapter, gave the book to Marbeck, and asked who had written the note in the margin? The other looking upon it, said, Forsooth, my lord, I wrote it.—Read it, (quoth the bishop.) Then he read it thus, "Heaven is my seat, and the earth is my footstool."—Nay, (quoth the bishop,) read it as thou hast written it.—Then shall I read it wrong, (quoth he;) for I had written it false.—How hast thou written it? (quoth the bishop.)—I have written it, (quoth he,) thus, "Heaven is my seat, and the earth is not my footstool."—Yea marry, (quoth the bishop,) that was thy meaning.—No, my lord, (quoth he,) it was but an oversight in writing; for, as your lordship seeth, this word not is blotted out.

At this time came other matters into the council, so that Marbeck was had out to the next chamber. And when he had stood there awhile, one of the council, named Sir Anthony Wingfield, captain of the guard, came forth, and calling for Marbeck, committed him to one Belson of the guard, saying unto him on this wise, "Take this man, and have him to the Marshalsea, and tell the keeper that it is the council's pleasure, that he should treat him gently, and if he have any money in his purse (as I think he hath not much,) take you it from him, lest the prisoners do take it; and minister it unto him as he shall have need." And so the messenger departed with Marbeck to the Marshalsea, and did his commission both faithfully and truly, both to the keeper and to the prisoner, as he was commanded.

The Manner of their Condemnation, and how they died.

When the time drew nigh that the king's majesty (who was newly married to that good and virtuous lady, Katharine Parr,) should make his progress abroad, the aforesaid Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, had so compassed his matters, that no man had such influence with the king as he had. In the mean time three or four were caught, that is to say, Anthony Pearson, Henry Filmer, and John Marbeck, and sent to Windsor by the sheriff's men, the Saturday before St. James's day, and laid fast in the town gaol; and Testwood, who had kept his bed, brought out of his house upon crutches, and laid with them; but as for Benet (who should have been the fifth man) his chance was to be sick of the pestilence, and having a great sore upon him, he was left behind in the bishop of London's gaol, whereby he escaped the fire.

Now these men being brought to Windsor, there was a sessions especially procured to be holden the Thursday following, which was St. Anne's day. Against which sessions (by the counsel of Dr. London and Simons) were all the farmers belonging to the college of Windsor warned to appear, because they could not pick out Papists enough in the town to go upon the jury.

When these had taken their places, and the prisoners brought forth before them, then Robert Ockam, occupying for that day the clerk of the peace's room, called Anthony Pearson, according to the manner of the court, and read his indictment, which was this:

First, That he should preach two years before in a place called Wingfield, and there should say, That like as Christ was hanged between two thieves, even so when the priest is at mass, and hath consecrated and lifted him up over his head, there he hangeth between two thieves, except he preach the word of God truly, as he hath taken upon him to do.

Also, that he said to the people in the pulpit, Ye shall not eat the body of Christ, as it did hang upon the cross, gnawing it with your teeth, that the blood run about your lips; you shall eat him this day as ye eat him to-morrow, the next day, and every day; for it refresheth not the body, but the soul.

Also, after that he had preached and commended the scripture, calling it the word of God, he said as followeth, "This is the word, this is the bread, this is the body of Christ.

Also he said, that Christ sitting with his disciples, took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, "Take and eat, this is my body." What is this to us, but to take the scripture of God, and to break it to the people?

To this, Anthony answered and said, I will be tried by God and his holy word, and by the true church of Christ, whether this be heresy or no, whereof ye have indicted me this day. So long as I preached the bishop of Rome and his filthy traditions, I was never troubled; but since I have taken upon me to preach Christ and his gospel, ye have always sought my life. But it maketh no matter, for when you have taken your pleasure of my body, I trust it shall not lie in your power to hurt my soul.—Thou calledst us thieves, (quoth the bishop.)—I say, (quoth Anthony,) ye are not only thieves, but murderers, except ye preach and teach the word of God purely and sincerely to the people; which ye do not, nor ever did, but have allured them to all idolatry, superstition, and hypoerisy, for your own here and glory's sake, through the which ye are become rather bite-sheeps than true bishops, biting and devouring the poor sheep of Christ, like ravening wolves, never satisfied with blood; which God will require at your hands one day, doubt it not.

Then spake Simons, his accuser, standing within the bar, saying, It is pity this fellow had not been burnt long ago, as he deserved.—In faith, quoth Anthony, if you had what you deserved, you were more worthy to stand in this place than I; but I trust in the last day, when we shall both appear, before the tribunal seat of Christ, that then it will be known which of us two hath best deserved this place.—Shall I have so long a day? (quoth Simons, holding up his finger :) nay, then I care not. And so the matter was jested out.

Robert Testwood.

Then was Testwood called, and his indictment read; which was, that he should say in the time that the priest was lifting up the sacrament, What wilt thou lift up so high? what, yet higher. Take heed, let him not fall.

To this Testwood answered, saying, It was but a thing maliciously forged by his enemies to bring him to his death.—Yes, quoth the bishop, thou hast been seen, that when the priest should lift up the sacrament over his head, thou wouldest thou look down upon thy book, or some other way, because thou wouldest not abide to look upon the blessed sacrament.—I beseech you, my lord, (quoth Testwood,) whereon did he look that marked me so well?—Marry, (quoth Bucklayer, the king's attorney,) he could not be better occupied, than to mark such heretics, that so despised the blessed sacrament.

Henry Filmer.

Then Filmer was called, and his indictment read, that he should say, That the sacrament of the altar is nothing else but a similitude and ceremony; and also, if God be in the sacrament of the altar, I have eaten twenty gods in my days.

Here you must understand that these words were gathered of certain communication which should be between Filmer and his brother.—The tale went thus:

This Henry Filmer, coming upon a Sunday from Clewer, his parish church, in the company of one or two of his neighbours, chanced in the way to meet his brother (who was a very poor working man,) and asked him whither he went? To the church, said he. And what to do? (quoth Filmer.) To do, (quoth he,) as other men do. Nay, (quoth Filmer,) you go to hear mass, and to see your god. What if I do so? (quoth he.) If that be god (should Filmer say) I have eaten twenty gods in my days. Turn again, fool, and go home with me, and I will read thee a chapter out of the Bible, that shall be better than all that thou shalt see or hear there.

This tale was no sooner brought to Dr. London by Wm. Simons, Filmer's utter enemy, but he sent for the poor man home to his house, where he cherished him with meat and money, telling him he should never lack so long as he lived; that the silly poor man, thinking to have had a daily friend of Dr. London, was content to do and say whatsoever he and Simons would have him say or do against his own brother. And when Dr. London had thus won the poor man, he retained him as one of his household men, until the court-day was come, and then sent him up to witness this aforesaid tale against his brother.—Which tale Filmer denied utterly, saying, That Dr. London, for a little meat and drink sake, had set him on, and made him say what his pleasure was: wherefore, my lord, (quoth Filmer to the bishop) I beseech your lordship to weigh the matter indifferently, forasmuch as there is no man in all this town that can or will testify with him, that ever he heard any such talk between him and me; and if he can bring forth any that will witness the same with him, I refuse not to die.—But say what he could, it would not prevail.

Then Filmer seeing no remedy, but that his brother's accusation should take place, he said, Ah, brother, what cause hast thou to shew me this unkindness? I have always been a natural brother unto thee and thine, and helped you all, to my power, from time to time, as thou thyself knowest; and is this a brotherly part, thus to reward me now for my kindness? God forgive it thee, my brother, and give thee grace to repent.

Then Filmer, looking over his shoulder, desired some good body to let him see the book of statutes. His wife being at the end of the hall, and hearing her husband call for the book of statutes, ran down to the keeper, and brought up the book, and got it conveyed to her husband. The bishop seeing the book in his hand, started up from the bench in a great fume, demanding who had given the prisoner that book? commanding it to be taken from him, and to make search who had brought it; swearing by the faith of his body he should go to prison. Some said it was his wife, some said the keeper. Like enough, my lord, (quoth Simons,) for he is one of the same sort, and as worthy to be here as the best, if he were rightly served. But whosoever it was, the truth would not be known, and so the bishop sat him down again.

Then said Filmer, O my lord, I am this day judged by a law, and why should I not see the law that I am judged by? The law is, I should have two lawful witnesses; and here is but one, which would not do as he doth, but that he is forced thereunto by the suggestion of mine enemies.—Nay, (quoth Bucklayer, the king's attorney,) thine heresy is so heinous, and abhorreth thine own brother so much, that it forceth him to witness against thee; which is more than two other witnesses.

Thus, as you see, was Filmer brought unjustly to his death by the malice of Simons and Dr. London, who had incited that wretched caitiff, his brother, to be their minister to work his confusion. But God, who is a just revenger of all falsehoods and wrongs, would not suffer that wretch long to live upon earth; but the next year following, he being taken up for a labourer to go to Bullein, had not been there three days, ere that (in exonerating of nature) a gun took him and tore him all to pieces. And so were these words of Solomon fulfilled, "A false witness shall not remain unpunished."

John Marbeck.

Then was Marbeck called, and his indictment read; which was, that he should say, that the holy mass, when the priest doth consecrate the body of our Lord, is polluted, deformed, sinful, and open robbery of the glory of God, from the which a Christian heart ought both to abhor and flee. And the elevation of the sacrament is the similitude of setting up of images, of the calves in the temple builded by Jeroboam; and that it is more abomination than the sacrifices done by the Jews in Jeroboam's temple to those calves. And that certain and sure it is, that Christ himself is made, in the mass, man's laughing-stock.

To this he answered and said, That these words whereof they indicted him, were not his, but the words of a learned man called John Calvin, drawn out of a certain epistle which the said Calvin had made, which epistle he had but only written out, and that long before the six articles came forth; so that now he was discharged of that offence by the king's general pardon, desiring that he might enjoy the benefit thereof.

Then was the jury called, which were all farmers belonging to the college of Windsor, whereof few or none had ever seen those men before upon whose life and death they went. Wherefore the prisoners counting the farmers as partial, desired to have the townsmen, or such as did know them, and had seen their daily conversations, in the place of the farmers, or else to be equally joined with them; but that would not be, for the matter was otherwise foreseen and determined.

Now when the jury had taken their oath and all, Bucklayer, the king's attorney, began to speak; and first he alleged many reasons against Anthony Pearson, to prove him an heretic. Which when Anthony would have disproved, the bishop said, Let him alone, sir; he speaketh for the king. And so went Bucklayer forth with his matter, making every man's cause as heinous to the hearers as he could devise. And when he had done, and said what he would, then Sir Humphrey Foster spake to the quest in the favour of Marbeck, on this wise: Masters, (quoth he,) you see there is no man here that accuseth or layeth any thing to the charge of this poor man, Marbeck, saying he hath writ certain things of other men's sayings, with his own hand, whereof he is discharged by the king's general pardon; therefore you ought to have a conscience therein. Then started up Fachel at the lower end of the bench, and said, What can we tell whether they were written before the pardon, or after? They may as well be written since as afore, for any thing we know.—These words of Fachel, as every man said, were the cause of Marbeck's casting that day.

Then went the jury up to the chamber over the place where the judges sat, and in the mean time went all the knights and gentlemen abroad, saving the bishop, Sir Win. Essex, and Fachel, which three sat still upon the bench till all was done. And when the jury had been together above in the chamber about the space of a quarter of an hour, up goeth Simons (of his own brain) unto them, and tarried there a pretty while, and came down again. After that came one of the jury down to the bishop, and talked with him and the other twain a good while: whereby many conjectured that the jury could not agree of Marbeck. But whether it was so or no, it was not long after his going up again, ere that they came down again to give their verdict; and being required according to the form of the law to say their minds, one called Hide, speaking as the mouth of the rest, said they were all guilty.

Then the judges beholding the prisoners a good while, (some with watery eyes,) made courtesy who should give judgment. Fachel requiring the bishop to do it, he said, He might not. The others also being required, said, They would not. Then said Fachel, It must be done; one must do it; and if no man will, then will I. And so Fachel, being lowest of all the bench, gave judgment.

Then Marbeck, being the last upon whom sentence was given, cried unto the bishop, saying, Ah, my lord, you told me otherwise, when I was before you and the other two bishops. You said then, that I was in better case than any of my fellows; and is your saying come to this? Ah, my lord, you have deceived me. Then the bishop, casting up his hand, said, He could not do withal.

Now the prisoners being condemned and had away, prepared themselves to die on the morrow, comforting one another in the death and passion of their master Christ, who had led the way before them, trusting that the same Lord, which had made them worthy to suffer so far for his sake, would not now withdraw his strength from them, but give them steadfast faith, and power to overcome those fiery torments, and of his free mercy and goodness, without their deserts, for his promise sake, receive their souls.

Thus lay they all the night long, till very dead sleep took them, calling to God for his aid and strength, and praying for their persecutors, which of blind zeal and ignorance had done they wist not what, that God of his merciful goodness would forgive them, and turn their hearts to the love and knowledge of his blessed and holy word. Yea, such heavenly talk was amongst them that night, that the hearers watching the prison without, whereof the sheriff himself was one, with divers gentlemen more, were constrained to shed plenty of tears, as they themselves confessed.

On the morrow, which was Friday, as the prisoners were all preparing themselves to go to suffer, word was brought them that they should not die that day. The cause was this: The bishop of Sarum, and they among them, had sent a letter by one of the sheriff's gentlemen, called Mr. Frost, to the bishop of Winchester, (the court being then at Oaking,) in the favour of Marbeck. At the sight of which letter the bishop straightway went to the king, and obtained his pardon.

Which being granted, he caused a warrant to be made out of hand for the sheriff's discharge, delivered the same to the messenger, who with speed returned with great joy, for the love he bare to the party, bringing good news to the town of Marbeck's pardon; whereat many rejoiced.

The Saturday in the morning that the prisoners should go to execution, came into the prison two of the canons of the college, the one called Dr. Blithe, and the other Mr. Arch, which two were sent to be their confessors. Mr. Arch asked them if they would be confessed? and they said, Yea. Then he demanded if they would receive the sacrament? Yea, (said they,) with all our hearts. I am glad (quoth Arch) to hear you say so; but the law is, that it may not be ministered to any that are condemned of heresy; but it is enough for you that ye desire it.

And so he had them up to the hall to hear their confessions, because the prison was full of people. Dr. Blithe took Anthony Pearson to him to confess, and Mr. Arch the other two. But howsoever the matter went between the doctor and Anthony, he tarried not long with him, but came down again, saying, He would no more of his doctrine. Do you call him Dr. Blithe? (quoth Anthony:) He may be called Dr. Blind, for his learning, as far as I see. And soon after the other two came down also. Then Anthony, seeing much people in the prison, began to say the Lord's prayer; whereof he made a marvellous godly declaration, wherein he continued till the officers came to fetch him away, and so made an end. And taking their leave of Marbeck, their prison-fellow, they praised God for his deliverance, wishing to him the increase of godliness and virtue, and last of all besought him heartily to help them with his prayers unto God, to make them strong in their afflictions; and so kissing him one after another, they departed.

Now as the prisoners passed through the people in the streets, they desired all the faithful people to pray for them, and to stand fast in the truth of the gospel, and not to be moved at their afflictions; for it was the happiest thing that ever came to them. And ever as Dr. Blithe and Arch, who rode on each side the prisoners, would persuade them to turn to their holy church: Away, would Anthony cry, away with your Romish doctrine, and all your trumpery, for we will no more of it.

And so going forth, they came to the place of execution, where Anthony Pearson with a cheerful countenance embraced the post in his arms, and kissing it, said, Now welcome mine own sweet wife: for this day shall thou and I be married together in the love and peace of God.

And being all three bound to the post, a certain young man of Filmer's acquaintance brought him a pot of drink, asking if he would drink? Yea, (quoth Filmer,) I thank you. And now, my brother, (quoth he,) I shall desire you, in the name of the living Lord, to stand fast in the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which you have received. And so taking the pot at his hand, asked his brother Anthony if he would drink. Yea, brother Filmer, (quoth he,) I pledge you in the Lord.

And when he had drunk, he gave the pot to Anthony, and Anthony likewise gave it to Testwood. When Anthony and Testwood had both drunken, and given the pot from them, Filmer, rejoicing in the Lord, said, Be merry, my brethren, and lift up your hands unto God, for, after this sharp breakfast, I trust we shall have a good dinner in the kingdom of Christ our Lord and Redeemer. At which words Testwood lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven, desired the Lord above to receive his spirit. And Anthony Pearson, pulling the straw unto him, laid a good deal thereof upon the top of his head, saying, This is God's hat; now am I dressed like a true soldier of Christ, by whose merits only I trust this day to enter into his joy.

And so yielded they up their souls to the Father of heaven, in the faith of his dear Son Jesus Christ, with such humility and steadfastness, that many which saw their patient suffering, confessed that they could have found in their hearts to have died with them.

An Account of the Second Apprehension, and Martyrdom, of ADAM DAMLIP.

Adam Damlip, otherwise called George Bucker, was cited before the bishop at Lambeth, and afterwards secretly admonished, and having money given him by his friends to avoid, and not to appear again before the bishops; after he had sent his allegations in writing unto them, departed unto the west-country, and there continued teaching a school a certain space, about a year or two. After that, the good man was again apprehended by the miserable inquisition of the six articles, and brought up to London, where he was by Stephen Gardiner commanded into the Marshalsea, and there lay the space of other two years, or thereabout.

During the imprisonment of this George in the Marshalsea, John Marbeck also was committed unto the same prison, which was the morrow after Palm-Sunday. The manner of that time so required, that at Easter every person must needs come to confession. Whereupon Marbeck, with the rest of the prisoners there, was enforced to come upon Easter-day to Sir George aforesaid, to be confessed, who was then confessor to the whole house. By this occasion, John Marbeck, which had never seen him before, entering into conference with him, perceived what he was, what he had been, what troubles he sustained, how long he had lain there in prison, by whom and wherefore; who declared, moreover, his mind to Marbeck, to the effect that followeth: And now, because (said he) I think they have forgotten me, I am fully minded to make my humble suit to the bishop of Winchester, in an epistle declaring therein mine obedience, humble submission, and earnest desire to come to examination. I know the worst: I can but lose my present life, which I had rather do, than here to remain, and not to be suffered to use my talents to God's glory. Wherefore, God willing, I will surely put it in proof.

This Damlip, for honesty and godly behaviour was beloved of all the whole house, but especially of the keeper himself, whose name was Massy, whom he always called Master; and being suffered to go at liberty within the house whither he would, he did much good among the common and rascal sort of prisoners, in rebuking vice and sin, and kept them in such good order and awe, that the keeper thought himself to have a great treasure of him. And no less also Marbeck himself confesseth, to have found great comfort by him. For notwithstanding the strait precept given by the bishop of Winchester, that no man should come to him, nor be to speak with any man, yet the said Adam many times would find the means to come and comfort him.

Now when he had drawn out his epistle, he delivered the same to his master the keeper, upon Saturday in the morning, which was about the second week before Whitsunday following, desiring him to deliver it at the court to the bishop of Winchester. The keeper said he would, and so did. The bishop, what quick speed he made for his despatch I know not; but thus it fell out, as ye shall hear.

The keeper came home at night very late, and when the prisoners (who had tarried supper for his coming) saw him so sad and heavy, they deemed something to be amiss. At last the keeper casting up his eyes upon Sir George, said, O George, I can tell thee tidings.—What is that, master? (quoth he.) Upon Monday next thou and I must go to Calais.—To Calais, master? What to do?—I know not, (quoth the keeper;) and pulled out of his purse a piece of wax with a little label of parchment hanging thereat, which seemed to be a precept. And when Sir George saw it, he said, Well, well, master, now I know what the matter is.—What? (quoth the keeper.)—Truly, master, I shall die in Calais.—Nay, (quoth the keeper,) I trust it to be not so.—Yes, yes, master, it is most true, and I praise God for his goodness therein.

And so the keeper and they went together to supper, with heavy cheer, for Sir George, as they there called him. Who notwithstanding was merry himself, and did eat his meat as well as ever he did in all his life; insomuch, that some of the board said unto him, that they marvelled how he could eat his meat so well, knowing he was so near his death. Ah, masters, (quoth he,) do you think that I have been God's prisoner so long in the Marshalsea, and have not yet learned to die? Yes, yes, and I doubt not but God will strengthen me therein.

And so upon Monday, early in the morning before day, the keeper, with three others of the knight-marshal's servants, setting out of London, conveyed the said Adam Damlip to Calais upon the Ascension-even, and there committed him to the mayor's prison. Upon which day, John Butler, the commissary aforesaid, and Sir Daniel, the curate of St. Peter's, were also committed to the same prison, and commandment given for no man to speak with Butler.

Upon Saturday next was the day of execution for Damlip. The cause which first they laid to his charge was for heresy. But because by an act of parliament all such offences done before a certain day were pardoned, (through which act he could not be burdened with any thing that he had preached or taught before,) yet for the receiving of a French crown of cardinal Pope, he was condemned of treason, and in Calais cruelly put to death, being hanged, drawn, and quartered.

The day before his execution, came unto him one Mr. Mote, then parson of our Lady-church in Calais, saying, Your four quarters shall be hanged at the four parts of the town.—And where shall my head be? said Damlip. Upon the lantern-gate, said Mote. Then Damlip answered, Then shall I not need to provide for my burial. At his death, Sir R. Ellerker, knight, then knight-marshal there, would not suffer the innocent and godly man to declare either his faith, or the cause he died for; but said to the executioner, Despatch the knave, have done. For Sir W. Mote, appointed there to preach, declared to the people how he had been a sower of seditious doctrine; and although he was for that pardoned by the general pardon, yet he was condemned for being a traitor against the king.

To which when Adam Damlip would have replied, and purged himself, the aforesaid Sir R. Ellerker would not suffer him to speak a word, but commanded him to be had away. And so most meekly, patiently, and joyfully, the blessed and innocent martyr took his death, Sir R. Ellerker saying, That he would not away before he saw the traitor's heart out. But shortly after, the said Sir Ralph Ellerker, in a skirmish between the French and us at Bulleine, was among others slain. Whose only death sufficed not his enemies; but after they had stripped him stark naked, they cut off his privy members, and cut the heart out of his body, and so left him a terrible example to all bloody and merciless men. For no cause was known why they shewed such indignation against the said Sir Ralph Ellerker, more than against the rest.

The Story of a poor labouring Man in Calais.

By the credible information and writing of some of Calais, which were then in trouble, it is reported of a certain poor labouring man of Calais, that after the preaching of Adam Damlip, being in a certain company, he said that he would never believe that a priest could make the Lord's body at his pleasure. Whereupon he was then accused, and also condemned by one Harvey, commissary there. Which Harvey, in time of his judgment, inveighing against him with opprobrious words, said, that he was an heretic, and should die a vile death. The poor man answering for himself again, said, that he was no heretic, but was in the faith of Christ; and whereas thou sayest (said he) that I shall die a vile death, thou thyself shalt die a viler death, and that shortly. And so it came to pass; for within half a year after, the said Harvey was hanged, drawn, and quartered, for treason, in the said town of Calais.

History of one DODD, a Scotchman, burnt in Calais.

After the burning of this poor man, there was also another certain scholar, counted to be a Scottish-man, named Dodd, who coming out of Germany, was there taken with certain German books about him: and being examined thereupon, and standing firmly to the truth that he had learned, was therefore condemned to death, and there burned in the said town of Calais, within the space of a year or thereabout after the other godly martyr above mentioned.

KERBY and ROGER CLARKE, of Suffolk, Martyrs.

Coming now to the year of our Lord 1546, (first passing over the priest, whose name was Sary, who was hanged in the porter's lodge of Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and that, as it is supposed, not without the consent of the said bishop and the secret conspiracy of that bloody generation; to pass over also one Henry, with his servant, burned at Colchester;) I will now proceed to the story of Kerby and Roger Clarke, of Mendelsham, who were apprehended at Ipswich, anno 1546, the Saturday before Gang-Monday, and brought before the lord Wentworth, with other commissioners, appointed there to sit upon their examinations, judgments, and causes.

In the mean time, Kerby and Roger being in the gaoler's house, named John Bird, an honest and good man, (who had checks divers time at the bar, that he was more meet to be kept than to be a keeper,) came in Mr. Robert Wingfield, son and heir of Humphrey Wingfield, knight, with Mr. Bruess, of Wenneham: who then having conference with Kerby,

Mr. Wingfield said to Kerby, Remember, the fire is hot; take heed of thine enterprise, that thou take no more upon thee than thou shalt be able to perform. The terror is great, the pain will be extreme, and life is sweet. Better it were by time to stick to mercy, while there is hope of life, than rashly to begin, and then to shrink; with such like words of persuasion. To whom he answered again, Ah, Mr. Wingfield, be at my burning, and you shall say, There standeth a Christian soldier in the fire: for I know that fire and water, sword, and all other things, are in the hands of God, and he will suffer no more to be laid upon us than he will give strength to bear.—Ah, Kerby! (said Mr. Wingfield,) if thou be at that point I will bid thee farewell: for I promise thee I am not so strong that I am able to burn. And so both the gentlemen saying that they would pray for them, shook hands with them, and so departed.

Now first touching the behaviour of Kerby and Roger when they came to the judgment-seat: the lord Wentworth, with all the rest of the justices there ready, the commissary also, by virtue of the statute ex officio, sitting next to the lord Wentworth but one between; Kerby and Roger lifted up their eyes and hands to heaven with great devotion in all men's eyes, making their prayers secretly to God for a space of time, whilst they might say the Lord's prayer five or six times.

That done, their articles were declared unto them with all the circumstances of the law: and then it was demanded, and required of them, Whether they believed, that after the words spoken by a priest (as Christ spake them to his apostles) there were not the very body and blood of Christ, flesh, blood, and bone, as he was born of the Virgin Mary, and no bread after?

Unto which words they answered and said, No, they did not so believe; but that they did believe the sacrament which Christ Jesus did institute at his last supper, on Maunday-Thursday at night, to his disciples, was only to put all men in remembrance of his precious death and blood-shedding for the remission of sins, and that there was neither flesh nor blood to be eaten with the teeth, but bread and wine; and yet more than bread and wine, for that it is consecrated to an holy use. Then with much persuasions, both with fair means and threats besides, (if it would have served,) were these two poor men hardly laid to; but most at the hands of Foster, an inferior justice, not being learned in such knowledge. But these two continued both faithful and constant, choosing rather to die than to live, and so continued unto the end.

Then sentence was given upon them both: Kerby to be burned in the said town on the next Saturday, and Roger to be burned at Bury the Gang-Monday after. Kerby, when his judgment was given by the lord Wentworth, with most humble reverence holding up his hands, and bowing himself devoutly, said, Praised be Almighty God! and so stood still without any more words.

Then did the lord Wentworth talk secretly, putting his hand behind another justice that sat between them. The said Roger perceiving that, said with a loud voice, Speak out, my lord, and if you have any thing contrary to your conscience, ask God mercy, and we for our parts do forgive you; and speak not in secret, for ye shall come before a Judge, and then make answer openly, even before him that shall judge all men.

The lord Wentworth, (somewhat blushing, and changing his countenance, through remorse, as it was thought,) said, I did speak nothing of you, nor have I done any thing unto you, but as the law is.

Then was Kerby and Roger sent forth; Kerby to prison there, and Roger to St. Edmund'sbury. The one of the two bursting out with a loud voice, (Roger it is supposed,) thus spake with a vehemeny: Fight (said he) for your god, for he hath not long to continue.

The next day, which was Saturday, about ten of the clock, Kerby was brought to the market-place, where a stake was ready, wood, broom, and straw, and put off his clothes unto his shirt, having a night-cap upon his head, and so was fastened to the stake with irons, there being in the gallery the lord Wentworth, with the most part of all the justices of those quarters, where they might see his execution, how every thing should be done, and also might hear what Kerby did say; and a great number of people, about two thousand by estimation. There was also standing in the gallery by the lord Wentworth, Dr. Rugham, who was before a monk of Bury, and sexton of the house, having on a surplice and a stole about his neck. Then silence was proclaimed, and the doctor began to disable himself, as not meet to declare the holy scriptures, being unprovided because the time was so short, but that he hoped in God's assistance it should come well to pass.

All this while Kerby was trimming with irons and faggots, broom, and straw, as one that should be married with new garments, nothing changing cheer nor countenance, but with a most meek spirit glorified God; which was wonderful to behold. Then Mr. Doctor at last entered into the sixth chapter of St. John. Who in handling that matter, so oft as he alleged the scriptures, and applied them rightly, Kerby told the people that he said true, and bade the people believe him. But when he did otherwise, he told him again, You say not true; believe him not, good people. Whereupon, as the voice of the people was, they judged Dr. Rugham a false prophet. So when Mr. Doctor had ended his collation, he said unto Kerby, Thou good man, dost not thou believe that the blessed sacrament of the altar is the very flesh and blood of Christ, and no bread, even as he was born of the Virgin Mary? Kerby answering boldly, said, I do not so believe.—How dost thou believe? said the doctor. Kerby said, I do believe that in the sacrament that Jesus Christ instituted at his last supper on Maunday-Thursday to his disciples, (which ought of us likewise to be done,) is his death and passion, and his blood-shedding for the redemption of the world, to be remembered; and (as I said before) yet bread, and more than bread, for that it is consecrated to an holy use. Then the doctor spake not one word more to Kerby after.

Then said the under-sheriff to Kerby, Hast thou any thing more to say?—Yea, sir, (said he,) if you will give me leave. Say on, said the sheriff.

Then Kerby, taking his night-cap from his head, put it under his arm, as though it should have done him service again; but remembering himself, he cast it from him, and lifting up his hands, he said the hymn Te Deum, and the Belief, with other prayers, in the English tongue. The lord Wentworth, whilst Kerby was thus doing, did shroud himself behind one of the posts of the gallery, and wept, and so did many others. Then said Kerby, I have done; you may execute your office, good Mr. Sheriff. Then was fire set to the wood, and with a loud voice he called unto God, knocking on his breast, and holding up his hands so long as his remembrance would serve; and so ended his life, the people giving shouts, and praising God with great admiration of his constancy, being so simple and unlettered.

On the Gang-Monday, anno 1546, about ten of the clock, Roger Clarke, of Mendelsham, was brought out of prison, and went on foot to the gate called South-gate, in Bury, and by the way the proceession met with them; but he went on, and would not bow eap nor knee, but with most vehement words rebuked that idolatry and superstition, the officers being much offended. And without the gate, where was the place of execution, the stake being ready, and the wood lying by, he came and kneeled down, and said Magnificat in the English tongue, making as it were a paraphrase upon the same, wherein he declared how that the blessed Virgin Mary, who might as well rejoice in pureness as any other, yet humbled herself to our Saviour. And what sayest thou, John Baptist, (said he,) the greatest of all men's children? "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." And thus with a loud voice he cried unto the people, while he was in fastening unto the stake, and then the fire was set to him, where he suffered pains unmercifully; for the wood was green, and would not burn, so that he was choked with smoke; and moreover, being set in a pitch-barrel, with some pitch stieking still by the sides, he was therewith sore pained, till he had got his feet out of the barrel. And at length one standing by took a faggot-stiek, and striking at the ring of iron about his neck, so pushed him, and struek him belike upon the head, that he shrunk down on the one side into the fire, and so was dissolved.

About the latter end of this year, 1545, in the month of November, after that the king had subdued the Scots, and afterward, joining with the emperor, had invaded France, and had got from them the town of Boulogne, he summoned his high court of parliament. In which was granted unto him, besides other subsidies of money, all colleges, chantries, free chapels, hospitals, fraternities, brotherhoods, guilds, and perpetuities of stipendiary priests, to be disposed of at his will and pleasure.

This was a ground of great grievance to the prelates and clergy of Rome, who seek, as it seemeth, altogether after the riches, pomp, and honour of this world; and maintaining the same under pretence of religion, do in very deed subvert religion: under that title of the church, they bring into the church manifest errors and intolerable absurdities; who pretending to be fathers of the church, if they transgressed but in manners or negligence of government, they might be borne withal for peace and concord's sake; and here modesty, civility, quietness, unity, and charity, might have place amongst modest natures. But now they obscure the glory of the Son of God, which in no cause ought to be suffered; they extinguish the light and grace of the gospel; they eloge men's consciences; they set up idolatry, and maintain idols; they bring in false invocation, and restrain lawful matrimony, whereby groweth filthy pollution, adultery, and whoredom, in the church, unspeakable; they corrupt the sacraments; they wrest the scripture to worldly purposes; they kill and persecute God's people. Briefly, their doctrine is damnable, their laws impious, their doings detestable. And yet, after all this, they erept craftily into the hearts of princes, under the title of the church, and colour of concord; making kings and princes believe, that all are hereties and schismatics, which will not be subject to their ordinary power. Now, Almighty God, who is a jealous God, and not suffering the glory of his Son to be defaced, nor his truth to be trodden under foot, stirreth up again the hearts of his people to understand his truth, and to defend his cause.—Whereupon of those two parts, as two mighty flints thus smiting together, eameth out the sparkle of this division, which by no wise can be quenched, but that one part must needs yield and give over. There is no neutrality nor mediation of peace, nor exhortation to agreement, that will serve between these two contrary doctrines, but either the pope's errors must give place to God's word, or else the verity of God must give place unto them.

When these chantries and colleges thus by act of parliament were given into the king's hands, as is above remembered, which was about the month of December, anno 1545, the next Lent following Dr. Crome preaching in the Mercers'-chapel, among other reasons and persuasions to rouse the people from the vain opinion of purgatory, reasoned thus:—That if trentals and chantry masses could avail the souls in purgatory, then did the parliament not well in giving away monasteries, colleges, and chantries, which served principally to that purpose. But if the parliament did well (as no man could deny) in dissolving them, and bestowing the same upon the king, then is it a plain ease, that such chantries and private masses do nothing to confer and relieve them in purgatory.

This dilemma of Dr. Crome, no doubt, was insoluble: but notwithstanding, the charitable prelates, for all the king's late exhortation unto charity, were so charitable unto him, that on Easter next they brought him coram nobis, when they so handled him, that they made him to recant. And if he had not, they would have dissolved him and his argument in burning fire, so burning hot was their charity; according as they burned Anne Askew, and her fellows, in the month of July the year following. Whose tragical story and cruel handling now you shall hear.

To satisfy your expectation, good people, (said she,) this was my first examination in the year of our Lord 1545, and in the month of March.

First, Christopher Dare examined me at Saddler's-hall, being one of the quest, and asked if I did not believe that the sacrament hanging over the altar was the very body of Christ really? Then I demanded this question of him, Wherefore was St. Stephen stoned to death? And he said, he could not tell. Then I answered, that no more would I assail his vain question.

Secondly, He said, that there was a woman which did testify, that I should read how God was not in temples made with hands. Then I shewed him the seventh and seventeenth chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, what Stephen and Paul had said therein. Whereupon he asked me how I took those sentences? I answered, I would not throw pearls amongst swine, for acorns were good enough.

Thirdly, He asked me wherefore I said, I had rather to read five lines in the Bible, than to hear five masses in the temple! I confessed that I said no less; not for the dispraise of either the epistle or the gospel, but because the one did greatly edify me, and the other nothing at all; as St. Paul doth witness in the 14th chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, where he saith, "If the trumpet giveth an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself to the battle?"

Fourthly, He laid unto my charge, that I should say, if an ill priest ministered, it was the devil, and not God. My answer was, that I never spake any such thing; but this was my saying, That whosoever he were that ministered unto me, his ill conditions could not hurt my faith, but in spirit I received nevertheless the body and blood of Christ.

Fifthly, He asked me what I said concerning confession? I answered him, My meaning, which was, as St. James saith, that men should confess their faults to each other, and pray for one another.

Sixthly, He asked me what I said to the king's book? And I answered him, that I could say nothing to it, because I never saw it.

Seventhly, He asked me if I had the Spirit of God in me? I answered, I had not; I was but a reprobate or cast-away. Then he said he had sent for a priest to examine me, which was here at hand.

The priest asked me what I said to the sacrament of the altar? and required much to know my meaning therein. But I desired him again to hold me excused concerning that matter; none other answer would I make him, because I perceived him to be a Papist.

Eightly, He asked me, if I did not think that private masses did help the souls departed! I said, it was great idolatry to believe more in them, than in the death which Christ died for us.

Then they had me thence unto my lord mayor; and he examined me, as they had before, and I answered him directly in all things as I answered the quest before. Besides this, my lord mayor laid one thing to my charge, which was never spoken of me, but of them; and that was, Whether a mouse eating the host, received God or no? This question did I never ask, but indeed they asked it of me; whereunto I made them no answer, but smiled.

Then the bishop's chancellor rebuked me, and said, that I was much to blame for uttering the scriptures; for St. Paul, he said, forbade women to speak or to talk of the word of God. I answered him, that I knew Paul's meaning as well as he, which is in 1 Cor. xiv. that a woman ought not to speak in the congregation by the way of teaching. And then I asked him how many women he had seen go into the pulpit and preach? He said he never saw any. Then I said, he ought to find no fault in poor women, except they had offended the law.

Then the lord mayor commanded me to ward. I asked him if sureties would not serve me? and he made me short answer, that he would take none.

Then was I had to the Compter, and there remained eleven days, no friend admitted to speak with me. But in the mean time there was a priest sent unto me; which said that he was commanded of the bishop to examine me, and to give me good counsel; which he did not. But first he asked me for what cause I was put in the Compter? and I told him I could not tell. Then he said, it was great pity that I should be there without cause, and said, that he was very sorry for me.

Secondly, He said, it was told him that I should deny the sacrament of the altar. And I answered again, That I have said, I have said.

Thirdly, He asked me, if I were content to be shriven? I told him, so that I might have one of these three, that is to say, Dr. Crome, Sir Guillam, or Huntington, I was contented, because I knew them to be men of wisdom; as for you, or any other, I will not dispraise, because I know you not. Then said he, I would not have you think but that I, or any other that shall be brought you, shall be as honest as they: for if we were not, you may be sure the king would not suffer us to preach. Then I answered with the saying of Solomon, "By communing with the wise I may learn wisdom, but by talking with a fool I shall take scath," Prov. i.

Fourthly, He asked if the host should fall, and a beast did eat it, whether the beast did receive God or no? I answered, Seeing that you have taken the pains to ask the question, I desire you also to solve it yourself: for I will not do it, because I perceive you come to tempt me. And he said, it was against the order of schools, that he which asked the question should answer it. I told him I was but a woman, and knew not the course of schools.

Fifthly, He asked me, if I intended to receive the sacrament at Easter, or no? I answered, that else I were no Christian woman; and thereat I did rejoice that the time was so near at hand. And then he departed thence with many fair words.

The 23d day of March, my cousin Britain came into the Compter unto me, and asked me whether I might be put to bail, or no?—Then went he immediately unto my lord mayor, desiring him to be so good unto me, that I might be bailed. My lord answered him, and said, that he would be glad to do the best that in him lay. Howbeit he could not bail me, without the consent of a spiritual officer; requiring him to go and speak with the chancellor of London. For, he said, like as he could not commit me to prison without the consent of a spiritual officer, no more could he bail me without the consent of the same.

So upon that he went to the chancellor, requiring of him as he did before of my lord mayor. He answered him, that the matter was so heinous, that he durst not of himself do it, without my lord of London were made privy therunto. But he said he would speak unto my lord in it; and bade him repair unto him the next morrow, and he should well know my lord's pleasure. And upon the morrow after, he came thither, and spake both with the chancellor and with the bishop of London. The bishop declared unto him, that he was very well contented that I should come forth to communication, and appointed me to appear before him the next day, at three of the clock at afternoon.

On the morrow after, the bishop of London sent for me at one of the clock, his hour being appointed at three; and as I came before him, he said he was very sorry for my trouble, and desired to know my opinions in such matters as were laid against me. He required me also in any wise boldly to utter the secrets of my heart, bidding me not to fear in any point, for whatsoever I did say in his house, no man should hurt me for it. I answered, Forsomuch as your lordship appointed three of the clock, and my friends will not come till that hour, I desire you to pardon me of giving answer till they come. Anon after he went into his gallery with Mr. Spilman, and willed him in any wise that he should exhort me to utter all that I thought. In the mean while he commanded his archdeacon to commune with me: who said unto me, Mistress, wherefore are you accused and thus troubled here before the bishop? To whom I answered again, and said, Sir, ask I pray you my accusers, for I know not as yet. Then took he my book out of my hand, and said, Such books as this have brought you to the trouble that you are in. Beware, (said he,) beware, for he that made this book, and was the author thereof, was an heretic, I warrant you, and burned in Smithfield. And then I asked him, if he were certain and sure, that it was true that he had spoken. And he said, he knew well the book was of John Frith's making. Then I asked him, if he were not ashamed to judge of the book before he saw it within, or yet knew the truth thereof. I said also, that such unadvised hasty judgment is a token apparent of a very slender wit. Then I opened the book, and shewed it him. He said he thought it had been another, for he could find no fault therein. Then I desired him no more to be so unadvisedly rash and swift in judgment, till he thoroughly knew the truth; and so he departed from me. Immediately after came my cousin Britain in, with divers others, as Mr. Hall of Gray's-inn, and such other like. Then my lord of London persnaded my cousin Britain, as he had done oft before, which was, that I should utter the bottom of my heart.—My lord said after that unto me, that he would I should credit the counsel of such as were my friends and well-willers in this behalf, which was, that I should utter all things that burdened my conscience: for he ensured me, that I should not need to stand in doubt to say any thing.

Then brought he forth this unsavoury similitude, That if a man had a wound, no wise chirurgeon would minister help unto it before he had seen it uncovered. In like case, saith he, can I give you no good counsel, unless I know where-with your conscience is burdened. I answered, that my conscience was clear in all things, and to lay a plaster unto the whole skin, it might appear much folly.

Then you drive me, saith he, to lay to your charge your own report, which is this: you did say, He that doth receive the sacrament by the hands of an ill priest, or a sinner, receiveth the devil, and not God. To that I answered, that I never spake such words. But, as I said before both to the quest and to my lord mayor, so say I now again, that the wickedness of the priests should not hurt me, but in spirit and faith I received no less than the body and blood of Christ. Then said the bishop unto me, What saying is this, in spirit? I will not take you at the advantage. Then I answered, My lord, without faith and spirit I cannot receive him worthily.

Then he said unto me, You said, that the sacrament remaining in the pix was but bread. I answered, that I never said so, but indeed the quest asked me such a question, whereunto I would not answer, I said, till such a time as they have solved me this question of mine, Wherefore Stephen was stoned to death? They said they knew not. Then said I again, no more would I tell them what it was.

Then said my lord unto me, that I had alleged a certain text of the scripture: I answered, that I alleged none other but St. Paul's own saying to the Athenians, in the 18th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, "That God dwelleth not in temples made with hands." Then asked he me, what my faith and belief was in that matter? I answered him, I believe as the scripture doth teach me.

Then he inquired of me, What if the scripture doth say, that it is the body of Christ? I believe, said I, as the scripture doth teach me. Then asked he again, What if the scripture doth say, that it is not the body of Christ? My answer was still, I believe as the scripture informeth me. And upon this argument he tarried a great while, to have driven me to make him an answer to his mind. Howbeit, I would not, but concluded this with him, that I believe therein, and in all other things, as Christ and his apostles did leave them.

Then he asked me, why I had so few words? And I answered, God hath given me the gift of knowledge, but not of utterance; and Solomon saith, "That a woman of few words is the gift of God," Prov. xix.

Fifthly, My lord laid unto my charge, that I should say that the mass was superstitious, wicked, and no better than idolatry. I answered him, No, I said not so. Howbeit, I say, the quest did ask me whether private masses did relieve souls departed, or no? Unto whom then I answered, O Lord, what idolatry is this, that we should rather believe in private masses, than in the healthsome death of the dear Son of God! Then said my lord again, What an answer is that! Though it be but mean, said I, yet it is good enough for the question.

Then my lord of London said, he was informed that one should ask of me if I would receive the sacrament at Easter, and I made a mock of it.

Then I desired that mine accuser might come forth; which my lord would not. But he said again unto me, I sent one to give you good counsel, and at the first word you called him Papist. That I denied not, for I perceived he was no less; yet made I him none answer unto it.

Then he rebuked me, and said, that I should report that there were bent against me threescore priests at Lincoln. Indeed, (quoth I,) I said so. For my friends told me, if I did come to Lincoln, the priests would assault me, and put me to great trouble, as thereof they had made their boast: and when I heard it, I went thither indeed, not being afraid, because I knew my matter to be good. Moreover, I remained there nine days, to see what would be said unto me. And as I was in the minster reading upon the Bible, they resorted unto me by two and two, by five and by six, minding to have spoken unto me; yet went they their ways again without words speaking.

Then my lord asked, if there was not one that did speak unto me? I told him, yes, that there was one of them at the last which did speak to me indeed. And my lord then asked what he said? And I told him his words were of small effect, so that I did not now remember them. Then said my lord, There are many that read and know the scripture, and yet follow it not, nor live thereafter. I said again, My lord, I would wish that all men knew my conversation and living in all points; for I am sure myself this hour, that there are none able to prove any dishonesty by me. If you know that any can do it, I pray you bring them forth. Then my lord went away, and said, he would entitle somewhat of my meaning; and so he wrote a long confession. But what it was, I have not in my memory; for he would not suffer me to have the copy thereof. Only do I remember this small portion of it:

"Be it known, (saith he,) of all men, that I, Anne Askew, do confess this to be my faith and belief, notwithstanding many reports made before to the contrary. I believe that they which are houseled at the hands of a priest, whether his conversation be good or not, do receive the body and blood of Christ in substance really. Also I do believe, that after the consecration, whether it be received or reserved, it is no less than the very body and blood of Christ in substance. Finally, I do believe in this and in all other sacraments of holy church in all points, according to the old Catholic faith of the same. In witness whereof, I, the said Anne, have subscribed my name."

There was somewhat more in it, which because I had not the copy, I cannot now remember. Then he read it to me, and asked me if I did agree to it? And I said again, I believe so much thereof as the holy scripture doth agree unto; wherefore I desire you, that you will add that thereunto.

Then he answered, that I should not teach him what he should write. With that he went forth into his great chamber, and read the same bill before the audience; which inveigled and willed me to set to my hand, saying also, that I had favour shewed me.

Then my lord sat down, and brought me the writing to set thereunto my hand, and I wrote after this manner: I, Anne Askew, do believe all manner of things contained in the faith of the Catholic church.

Then because I did add unto it the Catholic church, he flang into his chamber in a great fury. With that my cousin Britain followed, desiring him for God's sake to be a good lord unto me. He answered, that I was a woman, and that he was nothing deceived in me. Then my cousin Britain desired him to take me as a woman, and not to set my weak woman's wit to his lordship's great wisdom.

Then went in unto him Dr. Weston, and said that the cause why I did write there the Catholic church, was, that I understood not the church written afore. So with much ado they perswaded my lord to come out again, and to take my name, with the names of my sureties, which were my cousin Britain and Mr. Spilman of Gray's-inn.

This being done, we thought that I should have been put to bail immediately, according to the order of the law. Howbeit he would not suffer it, but committed me from thence to prison again until the next morrow, and then he willed me to appear in the Guildhall; and so I did. Notwithstanding, they would not put me to bail there neither, but read the bishop's writing unto me, as before, and so commanded me again to prison. Then were my sureties appointed to come before them on the next morrow in Paul's church; which did so indeed. Notwithstanding, they would once again have broken off with them, because they would not be bound also for another woman at their pleasure, whom they knew not, nor yet what matter was laid unto her charge.—Notwithstanding, at the last, after much ado, and reasoning to and fro, they took a bond of them of recognizance for my forthcoming: and thus I was at the last delivered.

Written by me, ANNE ASKEW.

The latter Apprehension of the worthy Martyr of God, Mrs. Anne Askew, anno 1546, and Sum of her Examination before the King's Council at Greenwich.

She writes as follows to a friend:

Your request as concerning my prison-fellows I am not able to satisfy, because I heard not their examinations. But the effect of mine was this: I being before the council, was asked of Mr. Kyme. I answered, that my lord-chancellor knew already my mind in that matter. They with that answer were not contented, but said it was the king's pleasure that I should open the matter unto them. I answered them plainly, I would not do so; but if it were the king's pleasure to hear me, I would shew him the truth. Then they said, it was not meet for the king to be troubled with me. I answered, that Solomon was reckoned the wisest king that ever lived, yet misliked he not to hear two poor common women; much more his grace a simple woman and his faithful subject. So in conclusion I made them none other answer in that matter. Then my lord-chancellor asked of me my opinion of the sacrament? My answer was this: I believe that so oft as I in a Christian congregation do receive the bread in remembrance of Christ's death, and with thanksgiving, according to his holy institution, I receive therewith the fruits also of his most glorious passion. The bishop of Winchester bade me make a direct answer. I said, I would not sing a new song of the Lord in a strange land. Then the bishop said, I spake in parables. I answered, it was best for him, for if I shew the open truth, (quoth I,) ye will not accept it. Then he said, I was a parrot.* I told him again, I was ready to suffer all things at his hands, not only his rebukes, but all that should follow besides, yea, and all that gladly.

Then had I divers rebukes of the council, because I would not express my mind in all things as they would have me. But they were not in the mean time unanswered for all that, which now to rehearse were too much, for I was with them there about five hours. Then the clerk of the council conveyed me from thence to my lady Garnish.

The next day I was brought again before the council. Then would they needs know of me what I said to the sacrament? I answered, that I had already said what I could say. Then after divers words they bade me go by. Then came my lord Lisle, my lord of Essex, and the bishop of Winchester, requiring me earnestly that I should confess the sacrament to be flesh, blood, and bone. Then said I to my lord Parre and my lord Lisle, that it was a great shame for them to counsel contrary to their knowledge. Whereunto in few words they did say, that they would gladly all things were well.

Then the bishop said, he would speak with me familiarly. I said, So did Judas when he unfriendly betrayed Christ. Then desired the bishop to speak with me alone. But that I refused. He asked me why? I said, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every matter should stand, after Christ's and Paul's doctrine, Matt. xviii. 2 Cor. xiii.

Then my lord-chancellor began to examine me again of the sacrament. Then I asked him how long he would halt on both sides? Then would he needs know where I found that: I said, in the scripture, 1 Kings xviii. Then he went his way. Then the bishop said, I should be burnt. I answered, that I had searched all the scriptures, yet could I never find that either Christ or his apostles put any creature to death. Well, well, said I, God will laugh your threatenings to scorn, Psal. ii. Then was I commanded to stand aside.

Then they made me a bill of the sacrament, willing me to set my hand thereunto; but I would not. Then on the Sunday I was sore sick, thinking no less than to die; therefore I desired to speak with Mr. Latimer, but they would not permit it. Then was I sent to Newgate in my extremity of sickness; for in all my life afore I was never in such pain.—Thus the Lord strengthens us in the truth. Pray, pray, pray.

The Confession of me, Anne Askew, for the time I was in Newgate, concerning my Belief.

I find in the scripture (said he) that Christ took the bread, and gave it to his disciples, saying, "Take, eat, this is my body which shall be broken for you; meaning in substance his own very body, the bread being thereof an only sign or sacrament. For after like manner of speaking, he said he would break down the temple, and in three days build it up again, signifying his own body by the temple, as St. John declareth it, John ii. and not the stony temple itself. So that the bread is but a remembrance of his death, or a sacrament of thanksgiving for it, whereby we are knit unto him by a communion of Christian love; although there be many that cannot perceive the true meaning thereof, for the vail that Moses put over his face before the children of Israel, that they should not see the clearness thereof, Exod. xxiv. and 2 Cor. iii. I perceive the same vail remaineth to this day. But when God shall take it away, then shall these blind men see. For it is plainly expressed in the history of Bel, in the Bible, that God dwelleth in nothing material. "O king, (said Daniel,) be not deceived, for God will be in nothing that is made with hands of men," Daniel xiv. Oh, what stiff-necked people are these, that will always resist the Holy Ghost! But as their fathers have done, so do they, because they have stony hearts.

Written by me, ANNE ASKEW, that neither wisheth death, nor feareth his might, and as merry as one that is bound towards heaven.

The Sum of the Condemnation of me, Anne Askew, at the Guildhall.

They said to me there, that I was an heretic, and condemned by the law, if I would stand in mine opinion. I answered, that I was no heretic, neither yet deserved I any death by the law of God. But as concerning the faith which I uttered and wrote to the council, I would not (I said) deny it, because I knew it true. Then would they needs know if I would deny the sacrament to be Christ's body and blood? I said, Yea: for the same Son of God that was born of the Virgin Mary, is now glorious in heaven, and will come again from thence at the latter day, like as he went up, Acts i. And as for what ye call your god, it is a piece of bread: for a more proof thereof, mark it when you list, let it but lie in the box three months, and it will be mouldy, and so turn to nothing that is good. Whereupon I am persuaded that it cannot be God.

After that, they willed me to have a priest. And then I smiled. Then they asked me if it were not good? I said, I would confess my faults unto God, for I was sure that he would hear me with favour. And so we were condemned.

Then would they needs know, whether the bread in the box were God, or no? I said, "God is a Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and truth," John iv. Then they demanded, Will you plainly deny Christ to be in the sacrament? I answered, that I believe faithfully the eternal Son of God not to dwell there; in witness whereof I recited again the history of Bel, and the nineteenth chapter of Daniel, the seventh and seventeenth of the Acts, and the four-and-twentieth of Matthew: concluding thus, I neither wish death, nor yet fear his might; God have the praise thereof with thanks.

The Effect of my Examination and Handling since my Departure from Newgate.

On Tuesday I was sent from Newgate to the sign of the Crown, where Mr. Rich and the bishop of London, with all their power and flattering words, went about to persuade me from God; but I did not esteem their glozing pretences.

Then came there to me Nicholas Shaxton, and counselled me to recant, as he had done. I said to him, that it had been good for him never to have been born; with many other like words.

Then Mr. Rich sent me to the Tower, where I remained till three o'clock.

Then came Rich and one of the council, charging me upon my obedience to shew unto them if I knew any man or woman of my sect. My answer was, that I knew none. Then they asked me of my lady of Suffolk, my lady of Sussex, my lady of Hertford, my lady Denny, and my lady Fitzwilliams. To whom I answered, if I should pronounce any thing against them, that I were not able to prove it. Then said they unto me, that the king was informed that I could name, if I would, a great number of my sect. I answered, that the king was as well deceived in that behalf, as he was dissembled with by them in other matters.

Then commanded they me to shew how I was maintained in the Compter, and who willed me to stick to my opinion? I said, that there was no creature that did strengthen me therein; and as for the help that I had in the Compter, it was by the means of my maid. For as she went abroad in the streets, she made moan to the 'prentices, and they by her did send me money; but who they were I never knew.

Then they said, that there were divers gentlewomen that gave me money. I said, I knew not their names. Then they said, that there were divers ladies that had sent me money. I answered, that there was a man in a blue coat which delivered me ten shillings, and said, that my lady of Hertford sent it me; and another in a violet coat gave me eight shillings, and said my lady Denny sent it me: whether it were true or no I cannot tell; for I am not sure who sent it me, but as the maid did say. Then they said, there were of the council that did maintain me. And I said, No.

Then they did put me on the rack, because I confessed no ladies or gentlewomen to be of my opinion, and thereon they kept me a long time: and because I lay still and did not cry, my lord chancellor and Mr. Rich took pains to rack me with their own hands till I was nigh dead.

Then the lieutenant caused me to be loosed from the rack. Incontinently I swooned, and then they recovered me again. After that I sat two long hours, reasoning with my lord chancellor, upon the bare floor; where he with many flattering words persuaded me to leave my opinion. But my Lord God (I thank his everlasting goodness) gave me grace to persevere, and will do, I hope, to the very end.

Then was I brought to an house, and laid in a bed, with as weary and painful bones as ever had patient Job; I thank my Lord God therefore. Then my lord chancellor sent me word, if I would leave my opinions, I should want nothing; if I would not, I should forthwith to Newgate, and so be burned. I sent him word again, that I would rather die than break my faith.

Thus the Lord open the eyes of their blind hearts, that the truth may take place. Farewell, dear friend, and pray, pray, pray.

Touching the order of her racking in the Tower, thus it was: first she was led down into a dungeon, where Sir Anthony Knevet, the lieutenant, commanded his gaoler to pinch her with the rack. Which being done so much as he thought sufficient, he went about to take her down, supposing that he had done enough. But Wrisley, the chancellor, not contented that she was loosed so soon, confessing nothing, commanded the lieutenant to strain her on the rack again; which because he denied to do, tendering the weakness of the woman, he was therefore grievously threatened by the said Wrisley, saying that he would signify his disobedience unto the king: and so consequently upon the same, he and Mr. Rich, throwing off their gowns, would needs play the tormentors themselves; first asking her if she were with child? To whom she answering again, said, Ye shall not need to spare for that, but do your wills upon me. And so quietly and patiently praying unto the Lord, she abode their tyranny, till her bones and joints were almost plucked asunder, in such sort, that she was carried away in a chair.—When the racking was past, Wrisley and his fellow took horse toward the court.

In the mean time, while they were making their way by land, the good lieutenant soon taking boat, sped him to the court in all haste, to speak with the king before the other; and so did. Who there making his humble suit to the king, desired his pardon, and shewed him the whole matter as it stood, and of the racking of Mrs. Askew, and how he was threatened by the lord-chancellor, because at his commandment, not knowing his highness's pleasure, he refused to rack her, which he for compassion could not find in his heart to do; and therefore humbly desired his highness's pardon. Which when the king had understood, he seemed not very well to like of their so extreme handling of the woman, and also granted to the lieutenant his pardon, willing him to return and see to his charge.

Great expectation was in the mean season among the wardens and officers of the Tower, waiting for his return. Whom when they saw come so cheerfully, declaring unto them how he had sped with the king, they were not a little joyous, and gave thanks to God therefore.

Anne Askew's Answer unto John Lacels' Letter.

O friend, most dearly-beloved in God, I marvel not a little what should move you to judge in me so slender a faith as to fear death, which is the end of all misery. In the Lord I desire you not to believe of me such weakness. For I doubt it not, but God will perform his work in me like as he hath begun. I understand the council is not a little displeased, that it should be reported abroad that I was racked in the Tower. They say now, that what they did there was but to fear me; whereby I perceive they are ashamed of their uncomely doings, and fear much lest the king's majesty should have information thereof, wherefore they would no man to noise it. Well, their cruelty God forgive them.

Your heart in Christ Jesus. Farewell, and pray.

The Answer of Anne Askew, against the false Surmises of her Recantation.

I have read the process which is reported, of them that know not the truth, to be my recantation. But, as the Lord liveth, I never meant thing less than to recant. Notwithstanding this, I confess, that in my first troubles I was examined of the bishop of London about the sacrament. Yet had they no grant of my mouth but this, That I believed therein as the word of God did bind me to believe. More had they never of me. Then he made a copy, which is now in print, and required me to set thereunto my hand. But I refused it. Then my two sureties did will me in no wise to stick thereat, for it was no great matters, they said.

Then with much ado, at the last I wrote thus: I, Anne Askew, do believe this, if God's word do agree to the same, and the true Catholie Church. Then the bishop being in great displeasure with me, because I made doubts in my writing, commanded me to prison, where I was awhile, but afterwards by the means of friends I came out again. Here is the truth of that matter. And as concerning the thing that ye covet most to know, resort to the sixth of John, and be ruled always thereby. Thus fare ye well.

ANNE ASKEW.

The Prayer of Anne Askew.

O Lord, I have more enemies now than there be hairs on my head; yet, Lord, let them never overcome me with vain words, but fight thou, Lord, in my stead; for on thee east I my care. With all the spite they can imagine, they fall upon me, which am thy poor creature. Yet, sweet Lord, let me not set by them which are against me; for in thee is my whole delight. And, Lord, I heartily desire of thee, that thou wilt of thy most merciful goodness forgive them that violence which they do and have done unto me. Open also thou their blind hearts, that they may hereafter do that thing in thy sight, which is only acceptable before thee, and to set forth thy verity aright, without all vain fantasy of sinful men. So be it, O Lord, so be it.

By me, ANNE ASKEW.

Hitherto we have spoken of this good woman's condemnation; now it remaineth that we say something concerning her martyrdom. After she had been so tormented, that she could neither live long in so great distress, neither yet by her adversaries be suffered to die in secret; the day of her execution being appointed, she was brought into Smithfield in a chair, because she could not go on her feet, by means of her great torments. When she was brought to the stake, she was tied by the middle with a chain, that held up her body. When all things were thus prepared to the fire, Dr. Shaxton, who was then appointed to preach, began his sermon. Anne Askew, hearing and answering again unto him, where he said well, confirmed the same; where he said amiss, there, said she, he misseth, and speaketh without the book.

The sermon being finished, the other martyrs, (John Lucels, John Adams, and Nicholas Belenian,) standing there tied a, three several stakes, ready to their martyrdom, began their prayers. The multitude and concourse of the people were exceeding, the place where they stood being railed about to keep out the press. Upon the bench, under St. Bartholomew's church, sat Wrisley, chancellor of England, the old duke of Norfolk, the old earl of Bedford, the lord mayor, with divers other more. Before the fire should be set unto them, one of the bench hearing that they had gunpowder about them, and being afraid lest the faggots by the strength of the gunpowder would come flying about their ears, began to be afraid: but the earl of Bedford, declaring unto him how the gunpowder was not laid under the faggots, but only about their bodies to rid them out of their pain, which having vent, there was no danger to them of the faggots, so diminished that fear.

Then Wrisley, lord chancellor, sent to Anne Askew letters, offering to her the king's pardon, if she would recant. Who refusing once to look upon them, made this answer again, That she came not thither to deny her Lord and Master. Then were the letters likewise offered unto the other, who in like manner following the constancy of the woman, denied not only to receive them, but also to look on them. Whereupon the lord mayor commanding fire to be put to them, cried with a loud voice, Fiat justitia.

And thus the good Anne Askew, with these blessed martyrs, being troubled so many manner of ways, and having passed through so many torments, having now ended the long course of her agonies, being compassed in with flames of fire, as a blessed sacrifice unto God, she slept in the Lord, anno 1546, leaving behind her a singular example of Christian constancy for all men to follow.

A brief Narration of the Trouble of Sir GEORGE BLAGE.

Here should also something be said of Sir George Blage, one of the king's privy chamber, who being falsely accused by Sir Hugh Caverley, knight, and Mr. Littleton, was sent for by Wrisley, lord-chancellor, the Sunday before Anne Askew suffered, and the next day was carried to Newgate, and from thence to Guildhall, where he was condemned the same day, and appointed to be burned the Wednesday following.

The words which his accusers laid unto him were, What if a mouse should eat the bread? then by my consent they should hang up the mouse. Whereas indeed these words he never spake, as to his life's end he protested. But the truth, as he said, was this, That they craftily, to undermine him, walking with him in Paul's church after a sermon of Dr. Crome, asked if he were at the sermon? He said, Yea.—I heard say, saith Mr. Littleton, that he said in his sermon, That the mass profiteth neither for the quick nor the dead.—No! saith Mr. Blage; wherefore then? belike for a gentleman when he rideth on hunting, to keep his horse from stumbling. And so they departing, immediately after he was apprehended, as is shewed, and condemned to be burned. When this was heard among them of the privy chamber, the king hearing them whispering together, (which he could never abide,) commanded them to tell him the matter. Whereupon the matter being opened, and suit made to the king, especially by the good earl of Bedford, then lord privy seal; the king being sore offended with their doings, that they would come so near him, and even into his privy chamber, without his knowledge, sent for Wrisley, commanding him soon to draw out his pardon himself; and so he was set at liberty. Who coming after to the king's presence, Ah, my pig! saith the king to him, (for so he was wont to call him.) Yea, said he, if your majesty had not been better to me than your bishops were, your pig had been roasted ere this time.

But to let this matter of Sir George Blage pass, we will now reduce our story again to Anne Askew and her fellow-martyrs, who the same week were burned, and could find no pardon.

Then the Catholic fathers, when they had brought this Christian woman, with the residue, (as above hath been declared,) unto their rest, they being now in their triumph, like as the Pharisees when they had brought Christ to his grave, devised with themselves how to keep him down still, and to over-tread truth for ever. Whereupon consulting with certain of the council, they made out a strait and hard proclamation, authorized by the king's name, for the abolishing of the scripture, and all such English books which might give any sight to the setting forth of God's true word, and grace of the gospel. The copy and tenor of which proclamation is this, as followeth

A Proclamation for the abolishing of English Books, after the Death of Anne Askew, set forth by the King, anno 1546, the eighth day of July.

"The king's most excellent majesty, understanding how, under the pretence of expounding and declaring the truth of God's scripture, divers lewd and evil-disposed persons have taken upon them to utter and sow abroad, by books imprinted in the English tongue, sundry pernicious and detestable errors and heresies, not only contrary to the laws of this realm, but also repugnant to the true sense of God's law and his word, by reason whereof certain men of late, to the destruction of their own bodies and souls, and to the evil example of others, have attempted arrogantly and maliciously to impugn the truth, and therewith trouble the sober, quiet, and godly religion, united and established under the king's majesty in this his realm; his highness minding to foresee the dangers that might ensue of the said books, is enforced to use his general prohibition, commandment, and proclamation, as followeth:

"First, That from henceforth, no man, woman, or person, of what estate, condition, or degree soever he or they be, shall, after the last day of August next ensuing, receive, have, take, or keep, in his or their possession, the text of the New Testament of Tindal's or Coverdale's translation in English, nor any other than is permitted by the act of parliament made in the session of the parliament holden at Westminster in the four-and-thirtieth and five-and-thirtieth year of his majesty's most noble reign; nor after the said day shall receive, have, take, or keep, in his or their possession, any manner of books printed or written in the English tongue, which be or shall be set forth in the names of Frith, Tindal, Wickliffe, Joy, Roy, Basil, Bale, Barnes, Coverdale, Turner, Tracy, or by any of them, or any other book or books, containing matter contrary to the said act made in the year thirty-four or thirty-five, but shall, before the last day of August next coming, deliver the same English book, or books, to his master in that household, if he be a servant, or dwell under any other, and the master or ruler of the house, and such other as dwell at large, shall deliver all such books of these sorts as they have, or shall come to their hands, delivered as afore or otherwise, to the mayor, bailiff, or chief constable, of the town where they dwell, to be by them delivered over openly within forty days next following after the said delivery to the sheriff of the shire, or to the bishop's chancellor, or commissary of the same diocese, to the intent the said bishop, chancellor, commissary, and sheriff, and every of them, may cause them incontinently to be openly burned: which thing the king's majesty's pleasure is, that every of them shall see executed in most effectual sort, and of their doings thereof make certificate to the king's majesty's most honourable council, before the first day of October next coming.

"And to the intent that no man shall mistrust any danger of such penal statutes as be passed in this behalf, for the keeping of the said books, the king's majesty is most graciously contented by this proclamation to pardon that offence to the said time appointed by this proclamation for the delivery of the said books; and commandeth that no bishop, chancellor, commissary, mayor, bailiff, sheriff, or constable, shall be curious to mark who bringeth forth such books, but only order and burn them openly, as is in this proclamation ordered. And if any man, after the last day of August next coming, shall have any of the said books in his keeping, or be proved and convicted by sufficient witness before four of the king's most honourable council, to have hidden them, or used them, or any copy of any of them, or any part of them, whereby it should appear that he willingly hath offended the true meaning of this proclamation, the same shall not only suffer imprisonment and punishment of his body at the king's majesty's will and pleasure, but also shall make such fine and ransom to his highness for the same, as by his majesty, or four of his grace's said council, shall be determined, &c.

"Finally, His majesty straitly chargeth and commandeth, that no person or persons, of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be, from the day of this proclamation, presume to bring any manner of English books concerning any manner of Christian religion, printed in the parts beyond the seas, into this realm, to sell, give, or distribute, any English book printed in outward parts, or the copy of any such book, or any part thereof, to any person, dwelling within this his grace's realm, or any other his majesty's dominions, unless the same shall be specially licensed so to do by his highness's express grant to be obtained in writing for the same, upon the pains before limited, and therewithal to incur his majesty's extreme indignation."

Thus it has always been the common practice of the pope's church, to extinguish, condemn, and abolish, all good books and wholesome treatises of learned men, under a false pretence of errors and heresies, examples of which abundantly appear in this history.

If princes have always their council about them, that is but a common thing. If sometimes they have evil counsel ministered, that I take to be the fault rather of such as are about them, than of princes themselves. So long as queen Anne, Thomas Cromwell, bishop Cranmer, master doctor Butts, with such like, were about him, and could prevail with him, what organ of Christ's glory did more good in the church than he? as is apparent by such monuments, instruments, and acts, set forth by him, in setting up the Bible in the church, in exploding the pope with his vile pardons, in removing divers superstitious ceremonies, in bringing into order the inordinate orders of friars and sects, in putting chantry priests to their pensions, in permitting white meats in Lent, in destroying pilgrimage worship, in abrogating idle and superfluous holydays, both by act public, and also by private letters sent to Bonner tending to this effect. The following is one of this kind:

BY THE KING.

"Right reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas considering the manifold inconveniences which have ensued, and daily do ensue, to our subjects, by the great superfluity of holidays, we have, by the assents and consents of all you the bishops and other notable personages of the clergy of this our realm, in full congregation and assembly had for that purpose, abrogated and abolished such as be neither canonical, nor meet to be suffered in a commonwealth, for the manifold inconveniences which do ensue of the same, as is rehearsed; and to the intent our determination therein may be duly observed and accomplished, we have thought convenient to command you, immediately upon the receipt hereof, to address your commandments in our name to all the curates, religious houses, and colleges, within your diocese, with a copy of the act made for the abrogation of the holy days aforesaid, a transumpt whereof ye shall receive herewith, commanding them and every of them, in no wise, either in the church or otherwise, to indict or speak of any of the said days and feasts abolished, whereby the people might take occasion either to murmur or to contemn the order taken therein, and to continue in their accustomed idleness, the same notwithstanding; but to pass over the same with such secret silence, as they may have like abrogation by disuse, as they have already by our authority in convocation. And forasmuch as the time of harvest now approacheth, our pleasure is, ye shall with such diligence and dexterity put this matter in execution, as it may immediately take place for the benefit of our subjects at this time accordingly, without failing, as ye will answer unto us for the contrary.

"Given under our signet, at our monastery of Chertsey, the 11th day of August, 1546."

Thus while good counsel was about him, and could be heard, he did much good. So again when sinister and wicked counsel under subtle and crafty pretences had gotten once the foot in, thrusting truth and verity out of the prince's ears, how much religion and all good things went prosperously forward, before, so much on the contrary side all revolted backward again. Whereupon proceeded this proclamation above-mentioned, concerning the abolishing and burning of English books. Which proclamation bearing the name of the king's majesty, but being the very deed of the popish bishops, no doubt had done much hurt in the church among the godly sort, bringing them either into great danger, or else keeping them in much blindness, had not the shortness of the king's days stopped the malignant purposes of the aforesaid prelates, causing the king to leave that by death unto the people, which by his life he would not grant. For within four months after (the proclamation coming out in August) he deceased in the beginning of January, in the eight-and-thirtieth year of his reign, anno 1547, leaving behind him three children, who succeeded him in his kingdom, viz. king Edward, queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE PERSECUTION IN SCOTLAND,

With the Names and Causes of such blessed MARTYRS, which in the same Country suffered for the Truth, after the time of Patrick Hamelton.

HAVING finished the time and race of king Henry VIII. it remaineth now, according to my promise, here to place so much as doth come to our hands touching the persecution in Scotland, and of the blessed martyrs of Christ which in that country likewise suffered for the true religion of Christ, under popish laws.

To proceed therefore in the history of these Scotland matters, the order of time would require next to mention Sir John Borthwicke, knight, commonly called Captain Borthwicke; who being accused of heresy, as the Papists call it, and cited, anno 1540, and not appearing, and escaping out into other countries, was condemned for the same, being absent, by the sentence of David Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, and other prelates of Scotland, and all his goods confiscated, and his picture at last burned in the open market-place. Here follows the sentence pronounced against him, after he had made his escape.

The Sentence of Condemnation against Sir JOHN BORTHWIKE, knight, by the Cardinal, Bishops, and Abbots, in Scotland, anno 1540.

The common report is, that Sir John Borthwicke is holden, reputed, and accounted of very many as an heretic, and principal heretic, which holdeth evil opinions of the Catholic faith.

Where we, David, by the title of St. Stephen, in Mount Celio, prelate and cardinal of the holy church of Rome, archbishop of St. Andrew's, primate of the whole kingdom of Scotland, and sworn legate of the apostolic see, sitting after the manner of judges in our tribunal seat, the most holy gospel of God being laid before us, that our judgment might proceed from the face of God, and our eyes might behold and look upon equity and justice, having only God and the verity and truth of the Catholic faith before our eyes, his holy name being first called upon; having, as is before said, hereupon holden a council of wise men, as well divines as lawyers; We pronounce, declare, decree, determine, and give sentence, that the said Sir John Borthwicke, called Captain Borthwicke, being suspected, infamed, and accused of errors and heresies, and wicked doctrines manifoldly condemned, and by lawful proofs against him in every of the premises had, being convict and lawfully cited and called, not appearing, but as a fugitive, runaway, and absent, even as though he were present, to be an heretic; and is, and hath been convict as an heretic; and as a convict heretic and heresiarch to be punished and chastened with due punishment, and afterward to be delivered and left unto the secular power. Moreover, we confiscate and make forfeit, and by these presents declare and agree to be confiscated and made forfeit, all and singular his goods, moveables and immoveables, howsoever and by whatsoever title they be begotten, and in what place or part soever they be, and all his offices whatsoever he hath hitherto had, reserving notwithstanding the dowry and such part and portion of his goods, as by the law, custom, and right of this realm, unto persons confiscate ought to appertain. Also we decree, that the picture of the said John Borthwicke being formed, made, and painted, to his likeness, be carried through this our city to our cathedral church, and afterward to the market-cross of the same city, and there, in token of malediction and curse, and to the terror and example of others, and for a perpetual remembrance of his obstinacy and condemnation, to be burned. Likewise we declare and decree, that notwithstanding, if the said John Borthwicke be hereafter apprehended and taken, he shall suffer such like punishment due by order of law unto heretics, without any hope of grace or mercy to be obtained in that behalf. Also we plainly admonish and warn, by the tenor of these presents, all and singular faithful Christians, both men and women, of what dignity, state, degree, order, condition, or pre-eminence soever they be, or with whatsoever dignity or honour, ecclesiastical or temporal, they be honoured, that from this day forward, they do not receive or harbour the said Sir John Borthwike, commonly called Captain Borthwike, being accused, convict, and declared an heretic and arch-heretic, into their houses, hospitals, castles, cities, towns, villages, or other cottages, whatsoever they be, or by any manner of means admit him thereunto, either by helping him with meat, drink, or victuals, or any other thing, whatsoever it be, they do shew unto him any manner of humanity, help, comfort, or solace, under the pain and penalty of greater and further excommunication, confiscation, and forfeitures; and if it happen that they be found culpable or faulty in the premises, that they shall be accused therefore as the favourers, receivers, defenders, maintainers, and abettors, of heretics, and shall be punished therefore according to the order of law, and with such pain and punishment as shall be due unto men in such behalf.

And now to prosecute such others as followed, beginning first in order with Thomas Forret, and his fellows; their story is this:

MARTYRS, Thomas Forret, Priest, Friar John Kelowe, Friar Benarage, Duncan Sympon, Priest, Robert Forester, Gentleman, with three or four other Men of Striveling.

Not long after the burning of David Stratton and Mr. Gurley, in the days of David Beaton, bishop, and cardinal of St. Andrew's, and George Treichon, bishop of Dunkelden; a canon of St. Colmes Inche, and vicar of Dolone, called dean Thomas Forret, preached every Sunday to his parishioners out of the epistle or gospel, as it fell for the time; which then was a great novelty in Scotland to see any man preach, except a black friar or a gray friar: and therefore the friars envied him, and accused him to the bishop of Dunkelden (in whose diocese he remained) as an heretic, and one that shewed the mysteries of the scripture to the vulgar people in English, to make the clergy detestable in the sight of the people.

The bishop of Dunkelden, moved by the friar's instigation, called the said dean Thomas, and said to him, My joy, dean Thomas, I love you well, and therefore I must give you my counsel, how you shall rule and guide yourself. To whom Thomas said, I thank your lordship heartily. Then the bishop began his counsel after this manner:

My joy, dean Thomas, I am informed that you preach the epistle or gospel every Sunday to your parishioners, and that you take not the cow, nor the uppermost cloth, from your parishioners, which thing is very prejudicial to the churchmen; and therefore, my joy, dean Thomas, I would you took your cow and your uppermost cloth, as other churchmen do, or else it is too much to preach every Sunday; for in so doing you may make the people think that we should preach likewise. But it is enough for you, when you find any good epistle, or good gospel, that setteth forth the liberty of the holy church, to preach that, and let the rest be.

Thomas answered, My lord, I think that none of my parishioners will complain, that I take not the cow, nor the uppermost cloth, but will gladly give me the same, together with any other thing that they have, and I will give and communicate with them any thing that I have; and so, my lord, we agree right well, and there is no discord among us. And where your lordship saith, it is too much to preach every Sunday; indeed I think it is too little, and also would wish that your lordship did the like.

Nay, nay, dean Thomas, (saith my lord,) let that be, for we are not ordained to preach.

Then said Thomas, Where your lordship biddeth me preach when I find any good epistle, or good gospel; truly, my lord, I have read the New Testament and the Old, and all the epistles and gospels, and among them all I could never find an evil epistle, or an evil gospel: but if your lordship will shew me the good epistle and the good gospel, and the evil epistle and the evil gospel, then I shall preach the good, and omit the evil.

Then spake my lord stoutly, and said, I thank God that I never knew what the Old and New Testament was, (and of these words rose a proverb, which is common in Scotland, Ye are like the bishop of Dunkelden, that knew neither new nor old law;) therefore, dean Thomas, I will know nothing but my portuise and my pontifical. Go your way, and let be all these fantasies, for if you persevere in these erroneous opinions, ye will repent it when you may not mend it.

Thomas said, I trust my cause be just in the presence of God, and therefore I pass not much what do follow thereupon. And so my lord and he parted at that time.

And soon after a summons was directed from the cardinal of St. Andrew's, and the said bishop of Dunkelden, upon the said dean Thomas Forret; upon two black friars, called friar John Kelowe, and another called Benarage, and upon one priest of Striveling, called Duncan Sympon, and one gentleman, called Robert Forester, in Striveling, with other three or four with them; who, at the day of their appearance after their summoning, were condemned to the death, without any place for recantation; because, as was alleged, they were heresiarchs, or chief heretics and teachers of heresies, and especially because many of them were at the bridal and marriage of a priest, who was vicar of Twybody, beside Striveling, and did eat flesh in Lent at the said bridal. And so they were all together burnt upon the Castle-hill at Edinburgh.

First, there was a certain act of parliament made in the government of the lord Hamelton, earl of Arran and governor of Scotland, giving privilege to all men of the realm of Scotland, to read the scriptures in their mother tongue and language, secluding, nevertheless, all reasoning, conference, and convocation of people to hear the scripture read or expounded. Which liberty of private reading being granted by public proclamation, lacked not its own fruit, so that in sundry parts of Scotland thereby were opened the eyes of the people to see the truth, and abhor the papistical abominations.

At this time there was a sermon made by friar Spense, in St. Johnston, alias Perth, affirming prayer made to saints to be so necessary, that without it there could be no hope of salvation. Which blasphemous doctrine a burges of the said town, called Robert Lambe, could not abide, but accused him in open audience of erroneous doctrine, and abjured him in God's name to utter the truth. The which the friar, being stricken with fear, promised to do; but the trouble, tumult, and stir of the people so increased, that the friar could have no audience: and yet the said Robert, with great danger of his life, escaped the hands of the multitude, namely, of the women, who, contrary to nature, exercised great cruelty against him.

At this time, in the year of our Lord 1543, the enemies of the truth procured John Chartmou, who favoured the truth, and was provost of the said city and town of Perth, to be deposed from his office by the said governor's authority, and a papist, called Mr. Alexander Marbeck, to be chosen in his room, that they might bring the more easily their wicked and ungodly enterprise to an end.

After the deposing of the former provost, and election of the other, in the month of January, the year aforesaid, on St. Paul's day, came to St. Johnston, the governor, the cardinal, the earl of Argyle, justice sir John Campbell of Laude, knight, and justice Defort, the lord Borthwike, the bishops of Dunblane and Orkney, with certain other of the nobility. And although there were many accused for the crime of heresy, as they term it, yet these persons only were apprehended upon the said St. Paul's day: Robert Lambe, William Anderson, James Hunter, James Raveleson, James Founleson, and Helen Stirke, his wife, and were east that night into the Spay Tower of the said city, the morrow after to abide judgment.

Upon the morrow, when they appeared, and were brought forth to judgment in the town, was laid in general to all their charge the violating of the act of parliament before expressed, and their conference and assemblies in hearing and expounding of scripture, against the tenor of the said act. Robert Lambe was accused in special for interrupting of the friar in the pulpit; which he not only confessed, but also affirmed constantly, that it was the duty of no man, which understood and knew the truth, to hear the same impugned without contradiction; and therefore sundry which were there present in judgment, who bid the knowledge of the truth, should bear the burden in God's presence for consenting to the same.

Then the said Robert, with William Anderson and James Raveleson, were accused for hanging up the image of St. Francis in a eord, nailing of ram's horns to his head, and a cow's rump to his tail, and for eating of a goose on All-hallow-even.

James Hunter, being a simple man and without learning, and a fletcher by occupation, so that he could be charged with no great knowledge in doctrine, yet, because he often used that suspected company of the rest, he was accused.

The woman, Helen Stirke, was accused for that in her child-bed she was not accustomed to call upon the name of the Virgin Mary, being exhorted thereto by her neighbours, but only upon God, for Jesus Christ's sake; and because she said in like manner, that if she herself had been in the time of the Virgin Mary, God might have looked to her humility and base estate, as he did to the Virgin's, in making her the mother of Christ; thereby meaning that there were no merits in the Virgin, which procured her that honour to be made the mother of Christ, and to be preferred before other women; but God's only free mercy exalted her to that estate. Which words were counted most execrable in the face of all the clergy, and of the whole multitude.

James Raveleson aforesaid, building a house, set upon the round of his fourth stair the three-crowned diadem of Peter, carved of tree, which the cardinal took as done in mockery of his cardinal's hat; and this procured no favour to the said James at their hands.

These forenamed persons, upon the morrow after St. Paul's day, were condemned and judged to death, and that by an assize, for violating, as was alleged, the act of parliament, in reasoning and conferring upon scriptures, for eating flesh upon days forbidden, for interrupting the holy friar in the pulpit, for dishonouring of images, and blaspheming of the Virgin Mary, as they alleged.

After sentence given, their hands were bound, and the men cruelly treated. Which thing the woman beholding, desired likewise to be bound by the sergeants with her husband for Christ's sake.

There was great intercession made by the town in the mean season for the life of these persons aforesaid, to the governor, who of himself was willing so to have done, that they might have been delivered. But the governor was so subject to the appetite of the cruel priests, that he could not do that which he would; yea, they menaced to assist his enemies, and to depose him, except he assisted their cruelty.

There were certain priests in the city, who did eat and drink before in these honest men's houses, to whom the priests were much bounden. These priests were earnestly desired to entreat for their hosts at the cardinal's hands: but they altogether refused, desiring rather their death than preservation. So cruel were these beasts, from the lowest to the highest.

Then after were they carried by a great band of armed men (for they feared rebellion in the town except they had their men of war) to the place of execution, which was common to all thieves, and that to make their cause appear more odious to the people.

Robert Lambe at the gallows' foot made his exhortation to the people, desiring them to fear God, and leave the leaven of papistical abominations; and manifestly there prophesied of the ruin and plague which came upon the cardinal thereafter. So every one comforting another, and assuring themselves that they should sup together in the kingdom of heaven that night, they commended themselves to God, and died firmly in the Lord.

The woman desired earnestly to die with her husband, but she was not suffered; yet following him to the place of execution, she gave him comfort, exhorting him to perseverance and patience for Christ's sake, and parting from him with a kiss, said on this manner, "Husband, rejoice! for we have lived together many joyful days; but this day, in which we must die, ought to be most joyful unto us both, because we must have joy for ever: therefore I will not bid you good night, for we shall suddenly meet with joy in the kingdom of heaven."

The woman after that was taken to a place to be drowned; and although she had a child sucking on her breast, yet this did not move the unmerciful hearts of the enemies. So after she had commended her children to the neighbours of the town for God's sake, and the sucking child was given to the nurse, she sealed up the truth by her death.

The Condemnation of Mr. GEORGE WISEHEART, Gentleman, who suffered Martyrdom for the Faith of Christ Jesus, at St. Andrew's, in Scotland, anno 1546, with the Articles objected against him, and his Answers to the same.

With most tender affection and unfeigned heart consider, gentle reader, the uncharitable manner of the accusation of Mr. George Wiseheart, made by the bloody enemies of Christ's faith. Note also the articles whereof he was accused, by order digested, and his meek answers, so far as he had leave and leisure to speak. Finally, ponder with no dissembling spirit the furious rage and tragical cruelty of the malignant church, in persecuting of this blessed man of God; and of the contrary, his humble, patient, and most godly answers made to them suddenly without all fear, not having respect to their boisterous threats, but charitably and without stop answering, not moving his countenance, nor changing his visage, as in his accusation hereafter following manifestly shall appear.

But before I enter into his articles, I thought it not impertinent to say something concerning the life and conversation of this godly man, according as of late it came to my hands, and was certified in writing by a certain scholar of his, named Emery Tylney, whose words of testimonial are the following :

"About the year of our Lord 1543, there was in the university of Cambridge, one Mr. George Wiseheart, commonly called Mr. George, of Bennet's college, who was a man of tall stature, polled-headed, and on the same a round French cap of the best ; judged to be of melancholy complexion by his physiognomy, black-haired, long-bearded, comely of personage, well spoken after his country of Scotland ; courteous, lowly, lovely, glad to teach, desirous to learn, and was well travelled : having on him for his habit or clothing never but a mantle, or frize gown, to the shoes, a black Milan fustian doublet, and plain black hosen, coarse new canvass for his shirts, and white falling bands and cuffs at his hands. All the which apparel he gave to the poor, some weekly, some monthly, some quarterly, as he liked, saving his French cap, which he kept the whole year of my being with him.

"He was a man modest, temperate, fearing God, hating covetousness ; for his charity had never end, night, noon, nor day ; he forbore one meal in three, one day in four for the most part, except something to comfort nature. He lay hard upon a puff of straw, and coarse new canvass sheets ; which when he changed, he gave away. He had commonly by his bed-side a tub of water, in the which (his people being in bed, the candle put out, and all quiet) he used to bathe himself, as I being very young, being assured, often heard him, and in one light night discerned him : he loved me tenderly, and I him, for my age, as effectually. He taught with great modesty and gravity, so that some of his people thought him severe, and would have slain him, but the Lord was his defence. And he, after due correction for their malice, by good exhortation amended them, and went his way. O that the Lord had left him to me, his poor boy, that he might have finished that he had begun ! For in his religion he was as you see here in the rest of his life ; when he went into Scotland with divers of the nobility, that came for a treaty to king Henry VIII. His learning was no less sufficient than his desire ; always prest and ready to do good in that he was able, both in the house privately, and in the school publicly, professing and reading divers authors.

"If I should declare his love to me, and all men, his charity to the poor, in giving, relieving, caring, helping, providing, yea, infinitely studying how to do good unto all, and hurt to none, I should sooner want words than just cause to commend him.

"All this I testify with my whole heart, and truth, of this godly man. He that made all, governeth all, and shall judge all, knoweth that I speak the truth, that the simple may be satisfied, the arrogant confounded, and the hypoerite disclosed.

"EMERY TYLNEY."

Opinions maintained by the said George :

Faith alone justifies without works.

By good works faith is manifested.

The celebration of mass is the mystery of iniquity.

To the said Mr. George, being in captivity in the castle of St. Andrew's, the dean of the same town was sent by the commandment of the cardinal and his wicked council, and there summoned the said Mr. George, that he should upon the morning following appear before the judge, then and there to give account of his seditious and heretical doctrine.

To whom Mr. George answered, What needeth my lord cardinal to summon me to answer for my doctrine openly before him, under whose power and dominion I am thus straitly bound with irons ? May not my lord compel me to answer of his extort power ? or, believeth he that I am unprovided to render account of my doctrine ? To manifest yourselves what men ye are, it is well done that ye keep your old ceremonies and constitutions made by men.

Upon the next morning, the lord cardinal caused his servants to address themselves in their most warlike array, with jack, knapskal, splent, spear, and axe, more seeming for the war, than for the preaching of the true word of God.

And when these armed champions, marching in warlike order, had conveyed the bishops into the abbey church, they sent for Mr. George, who was conveyed into the said church by the captain of the castle, accompanied with an hundred men dressed in manner aforesaid ; like a lamb led they him to sacrifice. As he entered into the abbey church door, there was a poor man lying, vexed with great infirmities, asking of his alms, to whom he flung his purse. And when he came before the lord cardinal, by and by the sub-prior of the abbey, called dean John Winryme, stood up in the pulpit, and made a sermon to all the congregation there then assembled, taking his matter out of the 13th chapter of Matthew ; whose sermon was divided into four principal parts.

The first part was a brief and short declaration of the evangelist.

The second part, of the interpretation of the good seed. And because he called the word of God the good seed, and heresy the evil seed, he declared what heresy was, and how it should be known ; which he defined in this manner : Heresy is a false opinion defended with pertinacy, clearly repugning the word of God.

The third part of the sermon was, the cause of heresy within that realm, and all other realms. The cause of heresy (quoth he) is the ignorance of them which have the cures of men's souls : to whom it necessarily belongeth to have the true understanding of the word of God, that they may be able to win again the false doctors of heresies, with the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God ; and not only to win again, but also to overcome them, as saith Paul, "A bishop must be faultless, as it becometh the minister of God, not stubborn, nor angry, no drunkard, no fighter, not given to filthy lucre, but harbarous, one that loveth goodness, sober-minded, righteous, holy, temperate, and such as cleaveth unto the true word of doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholesome learning, and to reprove that which they say against him."

The fourth part of his sermon was, how heresies should be known. Heresies (quoth he) be known after this manner : As the goldsmith knoweth the fine gold from the unperfect by the touchstone, so likewise may we know heresy by the undoubted touchstone, that is, the true, sincere, and undefiled word of God. At the last he added, That heretics should be put down in this present life. To which proposition the gospel appeared to repugn, which he treated of, "Let them go unto the harvest ;" the harvest is the end of the world. Nevertheless, he affirmed that they should be put down by the civil magistrate and law.—And when he ended his sermon, incontinently they caused Mr. George to ascend into the pulpit, there to hear his accusation and articles. And right against them stood by one of the fel flock, a monster, John Lauder, laden full of cursings written in paper. Of which he took out a roll, both long and also full of cursings, threats, maledictions, and words of devilish spite and malice, saying to the innocent Mr. George so many cruel and abominable words, and he hit him so spitefully with the pope's thunder, that the ignorant people dreaded lest the earth then would have swallowed him up quick. Notwithstanding, he stood still with great patience, hearing their sayings, not once moving or changing his countenance.

When this man had read through all his lying menacings, his face running down with sweat, and frothing at his mouth like a boar, he spit at Mr. George's face, saying, What answerest thou to these sayings, thou runagate, traitor, thief, which we have duly proved by sufficient witness against thee? Mr. George hearing this, kneeled down upon his knees in the pulpit, making his prayer to God. When he had ended his prayer, sweetly and christianly he answered to them all in this manner:

Mr. George's Answer.

Many horrible sayings unto me, a Christian man, many words abominable to hear, ye have spoken here this day, which not only to teach, but also to think, I thought ever great abomination. Wherefore I pray your discretions quietly to hear me, that ye may know what were my sayings, and the manner of my doctrine.

First, since the time I came into this realm I taught nothing but the ten commandments of God, the twelve articles of the faith, and the prayer of the Lord, in the mother tongue. Moreover, in Dundee I taught the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans. And I shall shew your discretions faithfully, what fashion and manner I used when I taught, without any human dread; so that your discretions give your ears benevolent and attent.

Suddenly then with an high voice cried the accuser, Thou heretic, runagate, traitor, and thief, it was not lawful for thee to preach. Thou hast taken the power at thine own hand, without any authority of the church. We forethink that thou hast been a preacher so long. Then all the whole congregation of the prelates, with their accomplices, said these words: If we give him license to preach, he is so crafty, and in the holy scripture so exercised, that he will persuade the people to his opinion, and raise them against us.

Mr. George, seeing their malicious and wicked intent, appealed from the lord cardinal to the lord governor, as to an indifferent and equal judge. To whom the accuser, John Lauder aforesaid, with hoggish voice, answered, Is not my lord cardinal the second person within this realm, chancellor of Scotland, archbishop of St. Andrew's, bishop of Meropis, commendator of Aberbrothok, legatus natns, legatus a latere? And so reciting as many titles of his unworthy honours as would have laden an ass: Is not he (quoth John Lauder) an equal judge apparently unto thee? Whom other desirest thou to be thy judge?

To whom this humble man answering, said, I refuse not my lord cardinal, but I desire the word of God to be my judge, and the temporal estate, with some of your lordships, mine auditors, because I am here my lord governor's prisoner. Whereupon the scornful people that stood by mocked him; and without all delay they would have given sentence upon Mr. George, and that without further process, had not certain men there counselled the cardinal to read again the articles, and to hear his answers thereupon, that the people might not complain of his wrongful condemnation.

And, shortly to declare, these were the articles following, with his answers as far as they would give him leave to speak; for when he intended to mitigate their leasings, and shew the manner of his doctrine, by and by they stopped his mouth with another article.—

1. Thou false heretic, runagate, traitor, and thief, deceiver of the people, thou despisest the holy church, and in like case contemnest my lord governor's authority. And this we know for surety, that when thou preachedst in Dundee, and wast charged by my lord governor's authority to desist, nevertheless thou wouldest not obey, but perseveredst in the same; and therefore the bishop of Brothen cursed thee, and delivered thee into the devil's hands, and gave thee in commandment that thou shouldest preach no more; that notwithstanding thou didst continue obstinate.

"My lords, I have read in the Acts of the Apostles, that it is not lawful to desist from the preaching of the gospel for the threats of men. Therefore it is written, 'We shall rather obey God than man.' I have also read in the prophet Malachi, 'I shall curse your blessings, and bless your cursings;' believing firmly, that the Lord will turn your cursings into blessings."

2. Thou false heretic didst say, That the priest, standing at the altar saying mass, was like a fox wagging his tail in July.

"My lords, I said not so; these were my sayings: The moving of the body outward, without the inward moving of the heart, is nought else but the playing of an ape, and not the true serving of God. For God is a secret searcher of men's hearts: therefore who will truly adore and honour God, he must in spirit and verity honour him." Then the accuser stopped his mouth with another article.

3. Thou false heretic preachedst against the sacraments, saying, That there were not seven sacraments.

"My lords, if it be your pleasures, I never taught of the number of the sacraments, whether they were seven or eleven. So many as are instituted by Christ, and shewed to us by the evangelist, I profess openly. Except it be the word of God, I dare affirm nothing."

4. Thou false heretic hast openly taught, That auricular confession is not a blessed sacrament. And thou sayest, That we should only confess us to God, and to no priest.

"My lords, I say, that auricular confession, seeing that it hath no promise of the evangelist, therefore it cannot be a sacrament. Of the confession to be made to God, there are many testimonies in scripture, as when David saith, 'I thought I would acknowledge mine iniquity against myself unto the Lord, and he forgave the punishment of my sin,' Psa. xxxii. Here confession signifieth the secret knowledge of our sins before God. When I exhorted the people in this manner, I reprov'd no manner of confession. And further, St. James saith, 'Acknowledge your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that you may be healed.'"

When that he had said these words, the bishops and their accomplices cried, and grinned with their teeth, saying, See ye not what colours he hath in his speaking, that he may beguile us, and seduce us to his opinion?

5. Thou heretic didst say openly, That it was necessary to every man to know and understand his baptism, and what it was; contrary to general councils, and the estate of the holy church.

"My lords, I believe there be none so unwise here, that will make merchandise with a Frenchman, or any other unknown stranger, except he know and understand first the condition or promise made by the Frenchman or stranger: so likewise I would that we understood what thing we pro-misc in the name of the infant unto God in baptism ; for this cause I believe ye have confirmation."

Then said Mr. Bleiter, chaplain, He hath the devil within him, and the spirit of error. Then answered him a child, saying, The devil cannot speak such words as yonder man doth speak.

6. Thou heretic, traitor, thief, thou saidst, That the sacrament of the altar was but a piece of bread baked upon the ashes, and no other thing else ; and all that is there done is but a superstitious rite, against the commandment of God.

"As concerning the sacrament of the altar, my lords, I never taught any thing against the scripture ; the which I shall, by God's grace, make manifest this day, I being ready therefore to suffer death.

"The lawful use of the sacrament is most acceptable unto God ; but the great abuse of it is very detestable unto him. But what occasion they have to say such words of me, I shall shortly shew your lordships. I once chanced to meet with a Jew, when I was sailing upon the water of Rhene. I did inquire of him what was the cause of his pertinacy, that he did not believe that the true Messias was come, considering that they had seen all the prophecies which were spoken of him to be fulfilled. Moreover, the prophecies taken away, and the sceptre of Judah, and by many other testimonies of the scripture, I vanquished him that Messias was come, the which they called Jesus of Nazareth. This Jew answered again unto me, When Messias cometh he shall restore all things, and he shall not abrogate the law which was given to our forefathers, as ye do : for why ? we see the poor almost perish through hunger amongst you ; yet you are not moved with pity towards them : but among us Jews, though we be poor, there are no beggars found. Secondly, it is forbidden by the law to feign any kind of imagery of things in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the sea under the earth, but one God only is to be honoured : but your sanctuaries and churches are full of idols. Thirdly, a piece of bread baked upon the ashes, ye adore and worship, and say that is your God.

"I have rehearsed here but the saying of the Jew, which I never affirmed to be true."

Then the bishops shook their heads, and spitted on the earth, and would not hear any thing further concerning this matter.

7. Thou false heretic didst say, That extreme unction was not a sacrament.

"My lords, forsooth I never taught any thing of extreme unction in my doctrine, whether it were a sacrament or no."

8. Thou false heretic saidst, That holy water is not so good as wash, and such like. Thou condemnest conjuring, and saidst, Holy church's cursings avail not.

"My lords, as for holy water, what strength it is of, I taught never in my doctrine ; conjurings and exorcisms, if they were conformable to the word of God, I would commend them ; but inasmuch as they are not conformable to the commandment and word of God, I reprove them."

9. Thou false heretic and renegade hast said, That every layman is a priest, and such like. Thou saidst, That the pope hath no more power than any other man.

"My lords, I taught nothing but the word of God ; I remember that I have read in some places in St. John and St. Peter, of the which the one said, He hath made us kings and priests. The other saith, He hath made us a kingly priesthood, (Apoc. 1. and 5. 1 Pct. 2.) Wherefore I have affirmed, that any man being cunning in the word of God, and the true faith of Jesus Christ, hath this power given him from God, and not by the power or violence of men, but by the virtue of the word of God, the which word is called the power of God, as witnesseth St. Paul evidently enough. And again I say, that any unlearned man, not exercised in the word of God, nor yet constant in his faith, whatsoever estate or order he be of, I say he hath no power to bind or loose, seeing he wanteth the instrument by the which he bindeth or looseth, that is to say, the word of God."

After that he had said these words, all the bishops laughed and mocked him. When that he beheld their laughing, "Laugh ye, (saith he,) my lords ? Though that these sayings appear scornful and worthy of derision to your lordships, nevertheless they are very weighty to me, and of a great value, because they stand not only upon myself, but also the honour and glory of God."

In the mean time, many godly men beholding the madness and great cruelty of the bishops, and the invincible patience of Mr. George, did greatly mourn and lament.

10. Thou false heretic saidst, That a man hath no free will, but is like to the Stoics ; which say, that it is not in man's will to do any thing, but that all concupiscence and desire cometh by God, whatsoever kind it be of.

"My lords, I said not so, truly ; I say, that as many as believe in Christ firmly, unto them is given liberty, conformable to the saying of St. John, 'If the Son make you free, then shall ye verily be free.' Of the contrary, as many as believe not in Christ Jesus, they are bond-servants of sin ; 'He that sinneth is bound to sin.'"

11. Thou false heretic saidst, It is as lawful to eat flesh upon the Friday as on Sunday.

"May it please your lordships, I have read in the epistles of St. Paul, that who is clean, unto him all things are clean ; on the contrary, to the filthy all things are unclean. A faithful man, clean and holy, sanctifieth by the word the creature of God ; but the creature maketh no man acceptable unto God. So that a creature may not sanctify any impure and unfaithful man ; but to the faithful man all things are sanctified by the word of God and prayer."

After these sayings of Mr. George, then said all the bishops, with all their accomplices, What needeth us any witness against him ? hath he not openly here spoken blasphemy ?

12. Thou false heretic dost say, That we should not pray to saints, but to God only.—Say whether thou hast said this, or no ; say shortly.

"My lords, (said he,) there are two things worthy of note. The one is certain, the other uncertain. It is found plainly and certain in scripture, that we should worship and honour one God, according to the saying of the first commandment, 'Thou shalt only worship and honour thy Lord God with all thy heart.' But as for praying to and honouring of saints, there is great doubt among many, whether they hear or no invocation made unto them. Therefore I exhorted all men equally in my doctrine, that they should leave the unsure way, and follow that way which was taught us by our master Christ. He is our only Mediator, and maketh intercession for us to God his Father. He is the door by the which we must enter in. He that entereth not in by this door, but climbeth another way, is a thief and a murderer. He is the verity and life. He that goeth out of this way, there is no doubt but he shall fall into the mire ; yea, verily, is fallen into it already. This is the fashion of my doctrine, the which I have ever followed. Verily, that which I have heard and read in the word of God, I taught openly, and in no corners. And now ye shall witness the same, if your lordships will hear me. Except it stand by the word of God, I dare not be so bold to affirm any thing."

13. Thou false heretic hast preached plainly, saying, That there is no purgatory, and that it is a feigned thing any man after this life to be punished in purgatory.

"My lords, as I have oftentimes said heretofore, without express witness and testimony of the scripture I dare affirm nothing. I have oft and divers times read over the Bible, and yet such a term found I never, nor yet any place of scripture applicable thereunto. Therefore I was ashamed ever to teach of that thing which I could not find in the scripture." Then said he to Mr. John Lauder, his accuser, "If you have any testimony of the scripture, by the which you may prove any such place, shew it now before this auditory." But he had not a word to say for himself.

14. Thou false heretic hast taught plainly against the vows of monks, friars, nuns, and priests, saying, That whosoever was bound to such like vows, they vowed themselves to the estate of damnation. Moreover, That it was lawful for priests to marry wives, and not to live single.

"Of sooth, my lords, I have read in the evangelist, that there are three kinds of chaste men: some are eunuchs from their mother's womb; some are eunuchs by men; and some have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. Verily I say, these men are blessed, by the scripture of God. But as many as have not the gift of chastity, nor yet for the evangelist have overcome the concupiscence of the flesh, and have vowed chastity; ye have experience, although I should hold my peace, to what inconvenience they have vowed themselves."

When he had said these words, they were all dumb, thinking better to have ten concubines than one married wife.

15. Thou false heretic and runagate saidst, Thou wilt not obey our general nor provincial councils.

"My lords, what your general councils are, I know not: I was never exercised in them, but to the pure word of God I gave my labours. Read here your general councils, or else give me a book wherein they are contained, that I may read them. If they agree with the word of God, I will not disagree."

Then the ravening wolves turned into a rage, and said, Wherefore let we him speak any further? Read forth the rest of the articles, and stay not upon them. Among these cruel tigers there was one false hypocrite, a seducer of the people, called John Graifind Scot, standing behind John Lauder's back, hastening him to read the rest of the articles, and not to tarry upon his witty and godly answers: for we may not abide them, (quoth he,) no more than the devil may abide the sign of the cross when it is named.

16. Thou heretic saidst, That it is in vain to build to the honour of God costly churches, seeing that God remaineth not in the churches, made with men's hands, nor yet can God be in so little space as betwixt the priest's hands.

"My lords, Solomon saith, If that the heaven of heavens cannot comprehend thee, how much less this house that I have builded? And Job consenteth to the same, Seeing that he is higher than the heavens, therefore what canst thou build unto him? he is deeper than hell, then how shalt thou know him? he is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea. So that God cannot be comprehended in one place, because that he is infinite. These sayings notwithstanding, I never said that churches should be destroyed, but of the contrary I affirm ever, that churches should be sustained and upholden, that the people should be congregated into them, there to hear of God. And, moreover, wheresoever is true preaching of the word of God, and the lawful use of the sacraments, undoubtedly there is God himself. So that both these sayings are true together: God cannot be com-prehended in any place; and wheresoever two or three are gathered together in his name, there is he present in the midst of them." Then said he to his accuser, "If you think any otherwise than I say, shew forth your reasons before this auditory." But he was dumb, and proceeded in his articles.

17. Thou false heretic contemnest fasting, and saidst, Thou shouldest not fast.

"My lords, I find that fasting is commended in the scripture; therefore I were a slanderer of the gospel, if I contemned fasting. And not so only, but I have learned by experience, that fasting is good for the health of the body: but God knoweth who fasteth the true fast."

18. Thou false heretic hast preached openly, saying, "That the soul of man shall sleep till the latter day of judgment, and shall not obtain life immortal until that day."

"God, full of mercy and goodness, forgive them that say such things of me: I know surely by the word of God, that he which hath begun to have the faith of Jesus Christ, and believeth firmly in him, the soul of that man shall never sleep, but ever shall live an immortal life. The which life from day to day is renewed in grace; nor yet shall ever perish, or have an end, but, ever immortal, shall live with Christ. To the which life all that believe in him shall come, and rest in eternal glory, Amen."

When the bishops, with their accomplices, had accused this innocent man in manner and form aforesaid, they immediately condemned him to be burned as an heretic, not having respect to his godly answers and true reasons which he alleged, nor yet to their own consciences, thinking verily that they should do to God good sacrifice, conformable to the saying of St. John, "They shall excommunicate you: yea, and the time shall come, that he which killeth you shall think that he hath done to God good service."

The Prayer of Mr. George Wiseheart.

"O immortal God, how long shalt thou suffer the ungodly to exercise their fury upon thy servants which do further thy word in this world, seeing they desire to be contrary, that is, to choke and destroy the true doctrine and verity, by the which thou hast shewed thyself unto the world, which was all drowned in blindness and misknowledge of thy name! O Lord, we know surely that thy true servants must needs suffer, for thy name's sake, persecution, affliction, and troubles, in this present life, which is but a shadow, as thou hast shewed to us by thy prophets and apostles. But yet we desire thee heartily, that thou conserve, defend, and help, thy congregation, which thou hast chosen before the beginning of the world; and give them thy grace to hear thy word, and to be thy true servants in this present life."

Then by and by they caused the common people to go away, whose desire was always to hear that innocent man speak. Then the sons of darkness pronounced their sentence definitive, not having respect to the judgment of God. And when all this was done and said, the cardinal caused his warders to pass again with the meek lamb into the castle, until such time as the fire was made ready. When he was come into the castle, then there came two gray fiends, friar Scot and his mate, saying, Sir, ye must make your confession unto us. He answered and said, I will make no confession unto you; go, fetch me yonder man that preached this day, and I will make my confession unto him. Then they sent for the sub-prior of the abbey, who came to him with all diligence. But what he said in this confession I cannot shew.

When the fire was made ready, and the gallows, at the west part of the castle, near to the priory, the lord cardinal, dreading that Mr. George should have been taken away by his friends, commanded to bend all the ordnance of the castle right against that part, and commanded all his gunners to be ready and stand beside their guns, until such time as he were burned. All this being done, they bound Mr. George's hands behind his back, and led him forth with their soldiers from the castle, to the place of execution. As he came forth of the castle gate, there met him certain beggars, asking him alms for God's sake: to whom he answered, I want my hands wherewith I should give you alms; but the merciful Lord, of his benignity and abundance of grace, that feedeth all men, vouchsafe to give you necessities, both unto your bodies and souls. Then afterwards met him two false fiends, (I should say friars,) saying, Mr. George, pray to our Lady, that she may be mediatrix for you to her Son. To whom he answered meekly, Cease, tempt me not, my brethren. After this he was led to the fire with a rope about his neck, and a chain of iron about his middle.

When he came to the fire, he sat down upon his knees, and rose again, and thrice he said these words, "O thou Saviour of the world, have mercy on me! Father of heaven, I commend my spirit into thy holy hands!" When he had made this prayer, he turned him to the people, and said these words:

"I beseech you, Christian brethren and sisters, that ye be not offended in the word of God, for the affliction and torments which ye see already prepared for me; but I exhort you that you love the word of God, and suffer patiently and with a comfortable heart, for the word's sake, which is your undoubted salvation and everlasting comfort.

"Moreover, I pray you shew my brethren and sisters, which have heard me oft before, that they cease not nor leave off the word of God which I taught unto them, after the grace given to me, for any persecutions or troubles in this world, which last not; and shew unto them, that my doctrine was no old wife's fables, after the constitutions made by men. And if I had taught men's doctrine, I had gotten great thanks by men; but for the word's sake and true evangelist, which was given to me by the grace of God, I suffer this day by men, not sorrowfully, but with a glad heart and mind. For this cause I was sent, that I should suffer this fire for Christ's sake. Consider and behold my visage, ye shall not see me change my colour. This grim fire I fear not. And so I pray you to do, if that any persecution come unto you for the word's sake, and not to fear them that slay the body, and afterward have no power to slay the soul. Some have said of me, that I taught that the souls of men should sleep until the last day: but I know surely, and my faith is such, that my soul shall sup with my Saviour Christ this night, ere it be six hours: for whom I suffer this."

Then he prayed for them which accused him, saying, "I beseech thee, Father of heaven, to forgive them that have of any ignorance, or else have of any evil mind, forged any lies upon me; I forgive them with all my heart. I beseech Christ to forgive them that have condemned me to death this day ignorantly."

And last of all he said to the people, "I beseech you, brethren and sisters, to exhort your prelates to the learning of the word of God, that they at the last may be ashamed to do evil, and learn to do good. And if they will not convert themselves from their wicked error, there shall hastily come upon them the wrath of God, which they shall not eschew."

Many faithful words said he in the mean time, taking no heed or care of the cruel torments which were then prepared for him.

And at last of all the hangman that was his tormentor sat down upon his knees, and said, Sir, I pray you forgive me, for I am not guilty of your death. To whom he answered, Come hither to me. When that he was come to him, he kissed his cheek, and said, "Lo, here is a token that I forgive thee. My heart, do thine office." And by and by he was put upon the gibbet, and hanged, and there burned to powder. When the people beheld the great tormenting, they could not withhold from piteous mourning and complaining of the slaughter of this innocent lamb.

A Note of the just Punishment of God upon the cruel Cardinal, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, named Beaton.

It was not long after the martyrdom of the blessed man of God, Mr. George Wisheheart aforesaid, who was put to death by David Beaton, the bloody archbishop and cardinal of Scotland, as is above specified, anno 1546, the first day of March, but the said David Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, by the just revenge of God's mighty judgment, was slain within his own castle of St. Andrew's, by the hands of one Lech, and other gentlemen, who, by the Lord stirred up, brake in suddenly into his castle upon him, and in his bed murdered him the said year, the last day of May, crying out, "Alas, alas, slay me not, I am a priest!" And so like a butcher he lived, and by a butcher he died, and lay seven months or more unburied, and at last like a carrion buried in a dunghill, anno 1546.

After this David Beaton succeeded John Hamelton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, anno 1549; who, to the intent that he might in no ways appear inferior to his predecessor, in augmenting the number of the holy martyrs of God, in the next year following called a certain poor man to judgment, whose name was Adam Wallace. The order and manner of whose story here followeth.

The Story and Martyrdom of ADAM WALLACE, in Scotland.

There was set upon a scaffold made hard to the chancery wall of the black friars' church in Edinburgh, on seats made thereupon, the lord governor. Above him at his back sat Mr. Gawin Hamelton, dean of Glasgow, representing the metropolitan pastor thereof. Upon a seat on his right hand sat the archbishop of St. Andrew's. At his back and side somewhat stood the official of Louthaine. Next to the bishop of St. Andrew's, the bishop of Dunblane, the bishop of Murray, the abbot of Dunfermling, the abbot of Glenluce, with other churchmen of lower estimation, as the official of St. Andrew's, and other doctors of that city. And at the other end of the seat sat Mr. Uchiltrie. On his left hand sat the earl of Argyle, justice, with his deputy, Sir John Campbel, of Lunday, at his feet. Next him the earl of Huntley. Then the earl of Angus, the bishop of Galloway, the prior of St. Andrew's, the bishop of Orkney, the lord Forbes, dean John Wiuryme, sub-prior of St. Andrew's; and behind the seats stood the whole senate, the clerk of the register, &c.

At the further end of the chancery wall in the pulpit was placed Mr. John Lauder, parson of Marbottle, accuser, clad in a surplice and red hood, and a great congregation of the whole people in the body of the church, standing on the ground.

After that Sir John Ker, prebendary of St. Giles' church, was accused, convicted, and condemned, for the false making and giving forth of a sentence of divorce, whereby he falsely divorced and parted a man and his lawful wife in the name of the dean of Rosealrige and certain other judges appointed by the holy father the pope. He granted the falsehood, and that never any such thing was done indeed, nor yet meant nor moved by the aforesaid judges; and was agreed to be banished the realms of Scotland and England for his life-time, and to lose his right hand, if he were found or apprehended thereafter, and in the mean time to leave his benefices for ever, and they to be vacant.

After that, was brought in Adam Wallace, a simple poor man in appearance, conveyed by John of Cunnocke, servant to the bishop of St. Andrew's, and set in the midst of the scaffold, who was commanded to look to the accuser; who asked him what was his name? he answered, Adam Wallace. The accuser said he had another name; which he granted, and said he was commonly called Feane. Then asked he where he was born? Within two miles of Fayle, said he, in Kyle. Then said the accuser, I repent that ever such a poor man as you should put these noble lords to so great incumbrance this day by your vain speaking. And I must speak (returned he) as God giveth me grace; and I believe I have said no evil to hurt any body. Would God (said the accuser) ye had never spoken; but you are brought forth for so horrible crimes of heresy, as never were imagined nor heard of in this country before, and shall be sufficiently proved, that ye cannot deny it: and I forethink that it should be heard, for hurting of weak consciences. Now I will ye thee no more, and thou shalt hear the points that thou art accused of.

Adam Wallace, alias Feane, thou art openly delated and accused for preaching, saying, and teaching, of the blasphemies and abominable heresies under written. In the first thou hast said and taught, that the bread and wine on the altar, after the words of consecration, are not the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

He turned to the lord governor, and lords aforesaid, saying, I never said nor taught any thing but what I found in this book and writ, (having there a Bible at his belt, in French, Dutch, and English,) which is the word of God; and if you will be content that the Lord God and his word be judge to me, and this his holy writ, here it is; and where I have said wrong, I shall take that punishment you shall put to me: for I never said any thing concerning this that I am accused of, but that which I found in this writ.

What didst thou say? said the accuser. I said, (quoth he,) that after our Lord Jesus Christ had eaten the paschal lamb in his latter supper with his apostles, and fulfilled the ceremonies of the old law, he instituted a new sacrament in remembrance of his death then to come. He took bread, he blessed, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take ye, eat ye, this is my body which shall be broken and given for you. And likewise the cup he blessed, and bade them drink all thereof, for that was the cup of the new testament which should be shed for the forgiving of many. How oft ye do this, do it in my remembrance."

Then said the bishop of St. Andrew's, and the official of Louthaine, with the dean of Glasgow, and many other prelates, We know this well enough. The earl of Huntley said, Thou answerest not to that which is laid to thee; say either nay or yea thereto. He answered, If ye will admit God, and his word, spoken by the mouth of his blessed Son Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, ye will admit that which I have said; for I have said and taught nothing but what the word, which is the trial and touchstone, saith; which ought to be judge to me, and to all the world.

Why, (quoth the earl of Huntley,) hast thou not a judge good enough? and trowest thou that we know not God and his word? Answer to what is spoken to thee. And then they made the accuser speak the same thing over again.

He answered, I never said more than the writ saith, nor yet more than I said before. For I know well by St. Paul when he saith, "Whosoever eateth this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, receiveth to himself damnation." And therefore, when I taught (which was but seldom, and to them only which required and desired me,) I said, That if the sacrament of the altar were truly ministered, and used as the Son of the living God did institute it, where that was done there was God himself by his divine power, by the which he is over all.

The bishop of Orkney asked him, Believest thou not that the bread and wine in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of the consecration, is the very body of God, flesh, blood, and bone?

He answered, I wot not what that word consecration meaneth. I have not much Latin, but I believe that the Son of God was conceived of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary, and hath a natural body, with hands, feet, and other members, and in the same body he walked up and down in the world, preached, and taught; he suffered death under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, and that by his godly power he raised that same body again the third day; and the same body ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father, which shall come again to judge both the quick and the dead. And that this body is a natural body with hands and feet, and cannot be in two places at once, he sheweth well himself; for the which everlasting thanks be to him that maketh this matter clear: when the woman brake that ointment on him, answering to some of his disciples which grudged thereat, he said, "The poor shall you always have with you, but me ye shall not have always." Meaning of his natural body. And likewise at his ascension said he to the same disciples that were fleshly, and would ever have had him remaining with them corporally, "It is needful for you that I pass away, for if I pass not away, the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, shall not come to you;" (meaning that his natural body beloved to be taken away from them;) "but be stout, and be of good cheer, for I am with you unto the world's end.

And that the eating of his very flesh profiteth not, may well be known by his words which he spake in the sixth of John, where after that he had said, "Except ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, ye shall not have life in you;" they murmuring thereat, he reproved them for their gross and fleshly taking of his words, and said, "What will ye think when ye see the Son of man ascend to the place that he came from? It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing," to be eaten as they took it; and even so take ye it.

It is an horrible heresy, said the bishop of Orkney. When he began to speak again, and bade the lord governor to judge if he had right by the writ, then the accuser cried, To the second article. Then was he bidden to hear the accuser, who propounded the second article, and said, Thou saidst likewise, and openly didst teach, that the mass is very idolatry, and abominable in the sight of God.

He answered and said, I have read the Bible and word of God in three tongues, and have understood them so far as God gave me grace, and yet never read I that word, mass, in it all; but I found, said he, that the thing that was highest and most in estimation among men, and not in the word of God, was idolatry, and abominable in the sight of God.

Then said the accuser, Thou hast said and openly taught, That the God which we worship, is but bread, sown of corn, growing of the earth, baked of men's hands, and nothing else.

He answered, I worship the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three Persons in one Godhead, which made and fashioned the heaven and earth, and all that is therein; but I know not which god you worship; and if you will shew me whom you worship, I will shew you what he is, as I can by my judgment.

Believest thou not (said the accuser) that the sacrament of the altar, after the words of the consecration betwixt the priest's hands, is the very body and blood of the Son of God, and God himself?

What the body of God is, said he, and what kind of body he hath, I have shewed you, so far as I have found in the scripture.

Then said the accuser, Thou hast preached, said, and openly taught, divers and sundry other great errors and abominable heresies against all the seven sacraments, which for shortness of time I overpass. Whether dost thou grant thy aforesaid articles that thou art accused of, or no? and thou shalt bear them shortly. And then repeated the accuser the three articles aforesaid shortly over, and asked him whether he granted or denied them?

He answered that which before he had said of his answers, and that he said nothing but agreeing to the holy word as he understood, so God judge him, and his own conscience accuse him, and thereby would he abide unto the time he were better instructed by scripture, and the contrary proved, even to the death: and he said to the lord governor and other lords, If you condemn me for holding by God's word, my innocent blood shall be required at your hands, when ye shall be brought before the judgment-seat of Christ, who is mighty to defend my innocent cause, before whom ye shall not deny it, nor yet be able to resist his wrath, to whom I refer the vengeance, as it is written, "Vengeance is mine, and I will reward."

Then gave they forth sentence, and condemned him by the laws, and so left him to the secular power, in the hands of Sir John Campbel, justice deputy, who delivered him to the provost of Edinburgh, to be burnt on the Castle hill; who made him to be put in the uppermost house in the town, with irons about his legs and neck, and gave charge to Sir Hugh Terry to keep the key of the said house, an ignorant minister and imp of Satan and of the bishops; who by direction sent to the poor man two gray friars, to instruct him; with whom he would enter into no communing. Soon after that, were sent in two black friars, an English friar, and another subtle sophister, called Arbirotomy; with which English friar he would have reasoned and declared his faith by the scriptures. Who answered, that he had no commission to enter into disputation with him; and so departed and left him.

Then was sent to him a wise man, and not ungodly in the understanding of the truth, the dean of Rosealrige, who gave him Christian consolation, among the which he exhorted him to believe the reality of the sacrament after the consecration. But he would consent to nothing that had not evidence in the holy scripture; and so passed over that night in singing, and lauding God, having learned the Psalter of David without book, to his consolation: for they had before spoiled him of his Bible, which always, till after he was condemned, was with him wherever he went. After that Sir Hugh knew that he had certain books to read and comfort his spirit, he came in a rage and took the same from him, leaving him desolate of all consolation, and gave him divers ungodly and injurious provocations to have perverted him, a poor innocent, from the patience and hope he had in Christ his Saviour; but God suffered him not to be moved therewith, as plainly appeared to the hearers and seers for the time.

So all the next morning abode this poor man in irons, and provision was commanded to be made for his burning against the next day. Which day the lord governor, and all the principal lords, both spiritual and temporal, departed from Edinburgh to their other business.

After they were departed, came the dean of Rosealrige to him again, and reasoned with him, after his wit. Who answered as before, He would say nothing concerning his faith, but as the scripture testifieth, yea, though an angel came from heaven to persuade him to the same; saving that he confessed himself to have received good consolation of the said dean in other behalf, as becometh a Christian.

Then after came in the said Terry again, and examined him after his old manner, and said he would cause the devils to come forth of him ere even. To whom he answered, You should rather be a godly man, to give me consolation in my ease. When I knew you were come, I prayed God I might resist your temptations: which, I thank him, he hath made me able to do; therefore, I pray you, let me alone in peace.

Then he asked of one of the officers that stood by, Is your fire making ready? Who told him, it was. He answered, As it pleaseth God, I am ready soon or late, as it shall please him. And then he spake to one faithful in that company, and bade him commend him to all the faithful, being sure to meet together with them in heaven. From that time to his coming to the fire, spake no man with him.

At his coming, the provost with great menacing words forbade him to speak to any man, or any to him, as belike he had commandment of his superiors. Coming from the town to the Castle-hill, the common people said, God have mercy upon him: And on you too, said he. Being beside the fire, he lifted up his eyes to heaven twice or thrice, and said to the people, Let it not offend you that I suffer death this day for the truth's sake; for the disciple is not greater than his Master. Then was the provost angry that he spake. Then looked he to heaven again, and said, They will not let me speak. The cord being about his neck, the fire was lighted, and so departed he joyfully to God, anno 1550.

The SCHISM that arose in SCOTLAND about the PATER NOSTER.

After that Richard Marshall, doctor of divinity, and prior of the black friars at the New-castle in England, had declared in his preaching at St. Andrew's in Scotland, that the Lord's Prayer (commonly called the Pater Noster) should be said only to God, and not to saints, neither to any other creature; the doctors of the university of St. Andrew's, together with the gray friars, who had long ago taught the people to pray the Pater Noster to saints, had great indignation that their old doctrine should be opposed, and stirred up a gray friar, called friar Toittis, to preach again to the people, that they should and might pray the Pater Noster to saints. Who finding no part of the scripture to found his purpose upon, yet came to the pulpit the first of November, being the feast of All-hallows, anno 1551, and took the text of the gospel for that day read in their mass, written in the fifth chapter of Matthew, containing these words, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for to them pertaineth the kingdom of heaven."

This feeble foundation being laid, the friar began to reason most impertinently, that the Lord's Prayer might be offered to saints, because every petition thereof appertaineth to them. For if we meet an old man in the street (said he,) we will say to him, Good day, father; and therefore much more may we call the saints our fathers; and because we grant also that they be in heaven, we may say to each, "Our father which art in heaven." Our father God hath made their names holy; therefore ought we, as followers of God, to hold their names holy, and so we may say to any of the saints, "Our father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name." And for the same cause, said the friar, as they are in the kingdom of heaven, so that kingdom is theirs by possession; and so praying for the kingdom of heaven, we may say to them, and every one of them, "Thy kingdom come." And except their will had been the very will of God, they had never come to that kingdom: and therefore seeing their will is God's will, we may say to every one of them, "Thy will be done."

But when the friar came to the fourth petition, touching our daily bread, he began to be astonished and ashamed, so that he did sweat abundantly, partly because his sophistry began to fail him, not finding such a colour for that part as for the other which went before, and partly because he spake against his own knowledge and conscience; and so he was compelled to confess that it was not in the saints' power to give us our daily bread, but that they should pray to God for us (said he) that we may obtain our daily bread by their intercession: and so glozed he the rest to the end. Not being yet content with this detestable doctrine, he affirmed most blasphemously, that St. Paul's napkin, and St. Peter's shadow, did miracles; and that the virtue of Elisha's cloak divided the waters; attributing nothing to the power of God; with many other errors horrible to be heard.

Upon this followed a dangerous schism in the church of Scotland: for not only the clergy, but the whole people, were divided among themselves, one defending the truth, and another the Papistry, in such sort that there rose a proverb, "To whom say you your Pater Noster?" And although the Papists had the upper hand as then, whose words were almost holden for law, (so great was the blindness of that age,) yet God so inspired the hearts of the common people, that so many as could get the understanding of the bare words of the Lord's Prayer in English (which was then said in Latin) utterly detested that opinion, holding that it should in no wise be said to saints. So that the craftsmen and the servants in their booths, when the friar came, exploded him with shame enough, crying, "Friar Pater Noster! Friar Pater Noster?" Who at last being convicted in his own conscience, and ashamed of his former sermon, was compelled to leave the town of St. Andrew's.

In the mean time of this noise, there were two pasquins set on the abbey church; the one in Latin, bearing these words:

*Doctores nostri de Collegio
Concludunt idem cum Lucifero.
Quod sancti sunt similes altissimo:
Et se tuentur gravatorio
De mandato officialis,
Ad instantiam fiscalis,
Gaw et Harvey non varii
In premissis connotarii.*

Mr. D. Gaw and Mr. T. Harvey were two of the procurators.

The following in English, bearing these words:

Great doctors of theology, of more than fourscore years,
With the old jolly Lupoyes and all the bald Gray Friars;
Each would be called a Rabbi and eke Magister noster,
And wot not yet to whom they say their pious Pater Noster

Shortly, the Christians were so much offended, and the Papists on the other side so proud and obstinate, that it was necessary, to eschew great inconveniences, that the clergy at last should be assembled to dispute and conclude the whole matter, that the lay-people might be put out of doubt. Which being done, and the university agreed, who-soever had been present might have heard much subtle sophistry. For some of the Popish doctors affirmed that it should be said to God formaliter, in due form; and to saints materialiter, by way of respect. Others ultimate, ultimately; et non ultimate, and others not ultimately. Others said it should be said to God principaliter, principally; and to saints minus principaliter, less principally. Others, that it should be said to God primarie, primarily; and to saints secundarie, secondarily. Others, that it should be said to God capiendo stricte, in the strictest sense; and to saints capiendo large, in a general sense. Which vain distinctions being heard and considered by the people, they that were simple remained in greater doubtfulness than they were in before: so that an aged man, a servant to the sub-prior of St. Andrew's, called the sub-prior's Thome, being demanded to whom he said his Pater Noster? he answered, To God only. Then they asked again, what should be said to the saints? he answered, "Give them Aves and Creeds now in the devil's name, for that may suffice them well enough, that they may not spoil God of his right." Others, making their vaunts of the doctors, said, That because Christ, who made the Pater Noster, never came into the isle of Britain, and so understood not the English tongue; therefore it was that the doctors concluded it should be said in Latin! Such were thy guides, O Israel, in times of popish darkness!

This perturbation yet depending, it was thought good to call a provincial council to decide the matter. Which being assembled at Edinburgh, the Papists having no reason on their sides, defended their parts with lies, alleging that the university of Paris had concluded that the Lord's Prayer should be said to saints. But because that could not be proved, and that they could not prevail by reason, they used their will in place of reason, backed with spiteful and injurious talk. As friar Scot, being asked by one, to whom he should say the Pater Noster, he answered, "Say it to the devil, knave." So the council perceiving that they could profit nothing by reasoning and debating, were compelled to pass to voting.

But then they that were called churchmen were found divided among themselves. For some bishops, with the doctors and friars, consented that the Pater Noster should be said to saints; but the bishops of St. Andrew's, Caithness, and Athens, with other more learned men, refused utterly to subscribe to the same. Finally, with consent of both parties, commission was given by the holy church to dean John Winryme, then sub-prior of St. Andrew's, to declare to the people how and after what manner they should pray the Lord's Prayer. Who, accepting of the commission, declared that it should be said to God only,—and thus settled this knotty point of theology!

Martyrdom of the blessed servant of God, WALTER MILLE.

Among the rest of the martyrs of Scotland, the marvellous constancy of Walter Mille should not be passed over in silence; out of whose ashes sprang thousands of his opinion and religion in Scotland, who altogether chose rather to die than to be any longer over-trodden by the tyranny of the aforesaid cruel, ignorant, and beastly bishops, abbots, monks, and friars; and so began the congregation of Scotland to debate the true religion of Christ against the Frenchmen and Papists, who sought always to depress the same; for it began soon after the martyrdom of Walter Mille, of which the form hereafter followeth.

In the year of our Lord 1558, in the time of Mary, duchess of Loughaway, queen regent of Scotland, and the said John Hamelton being bishop of St. Andrew's and primate of Scotland, this Walter Mille (who in his youth had been a Papist) after that he had been in Germany, and had heard the doctrine of the gospel, returned again into Scotland, and setting aside all Papistry and compelled chastity, married a wife; which thing caused him by the bishops of Scotland to be suspected of heresy; and after long watching him, he was taken by two popish priests, one called Sir George Traquhen, and the other Sir Hugh Turry, servants to the said bishop for the time, within the town of Dysart, in Fife, and brought to St. Andrew's, and imprisoned in the castle. He being in prison, the Papists earnestly travelled and laboured to have seduced him, and threatened him with death and corporal torments, to the intent they might cause him to recant and forsake the truth. But seeing they could profit nothing, and that he remained still firm and constant, they laboured to persuade him by fair promises, and offered unto him a monk's portion for life, in the abbey of Dunfermeling, so that he would deny the things he had taught, and grant that they were heresy; but he, continuing in the truth even unto the end, despised their threatenings and fair promises.

Then assembled together the bishops of St. Andrew's, Murray, Breehin, Craithness, and Atheins, the abbots of Dunfermeling, Landors, Balindrinot, and Towpers, with doctors of theology of St. Andrew's, as John Greson, black friar, and dean John Wiuryme, sub-prior of St. Andrew's, William Transton, provost of the old college, with divers others, as sundry friars, black and gray.

These being assembled, and having consulted together, he was taken out of prison, and brought to the metropolitan church, where he was put in a pulpit before the bishops to be accused, the 20th day of April. Being brought into the church, and climbing up into the pulpit, they seeing him so weak and feeble of person, partly by age and travel, and partly by evil treatment, that without help he could not climb up, they were out of hope to have heard him for weakness of voice. But when he began to speak, he made the church ring and sound again, with so great courage and stoutness, that the Christians which were present were no less rejoiced than the adversaries were confounded and ashamed. He being in the pulpit, and on his knees at prayer, Sir Andrew Oliphant, one of the bishops' priests, commanded him to arise and to answer to his articles; saying on this manner, Sir Walter Mille, arise and answer to the articles, for you hold my lord here over long. To whom Walter, after he had finished his prayer, answered, saying, We ought to obey God more than men; I serve one more mighty, even the omnipotent Lord: and where ye call me Sir Walter, call me Walter, and not Sir Walter. I have been over long one of the pope's knights. Now say what thou hast to say.

These were the Articles whereof he was accused, with his Answers unto the same.

Oliphant. What think you of priests' marriage?

Mille. I hold it a blessed band: for Christ himself maintained it, and approved the same, and also made it free to all men; but you think it not free to you, ye abhor it, and in the mean time take other men's wives and daughters, and will not keep the band that God hath made. Ye vow chastity, and break the same. St. Paul had rather marry than burn; the which I have done, for God never forbade marriage to any man, of what state or degree soever he were.

Oliphant. Thou sayest there be not seven sacraments.

Mille. Give me the Lord's supper and baptism, and take you the rest, and part them among you. For if there be seven, why have you omitted one of them, to wit, marriage, and give yourselves to slanderous and ungodly whoredom?

Oliph. Thou art against the blessed sacrament of the altar, and sayest that the mass is wrong, and is idolatry.

Mille. A lord or a king sendeth and calleth many to a dinner, and when the dinner is in readiness, he causeth to ring a bell, and the men come to the hall, and sit down to be partakers of the dinner; but the lord turning his back unto them, eateth all himself, and mocketh them: So do ye.

Oliph. Thou deniest the sacrament of the altar to be the very body of Christ really in flesh and blood.

Mille. The scripture of God is not to be taken carnally, but spiritually, and standeth in faith only; and as for the mass, it is wrong: for Christ was once offered on the cross for man's trespass, and will never be offered again, for then he ended all sacrifice.

Oliph. Thou deniest the office of a bishop.

Mille. I affirm that they, whom ye call bishops, do no bishops' works, nor use the office of bishops, as Paul biddest, writing to Timothy; but live after their own sensual pleasure, and take no care of the flock, nor yet regard they the word of God, but desire to be honoured, and called My lords.

Oliph. Thou speakest against pilgrimage, and calledst it a pilgrimage to whoredom.

Mille. I affirm and say, that it is not commanded in the scripture; and that there is no greater whoredom in any place than at your pilgrimages, except it be in common brothels.

Oliph. Thou preachedst secretly and privately in houses, and openly in the fields.

Mille. Yea, man; and I have preached on the sea also, sailing in a ship.

Oliph. Wilt thou recant thy erroneous opinions? If thou wilt not, I will pronounce sentence against thee.

Mille. I am accused of my life; I know I must die once, and therefore, as Christ said to Judas, "What thou doest, do quickly." Ye shall know that I will not recant the truth, for I am corn, I am no chaff; I will not be blown away with the wind, nor burst with the flail; but I will abide both.

Then Sir Andrew Oliphant pronounced sentence against him, that he should be delivered to the temporal judge, and punished as an heretic; which was, to be burnt. Notwithstanding, his boldness and constancy moved so the hearts of many, that the bishop's steward of his regality, provost of the town, called Patrick Learmond, refused to be his temporal judge, to whom it appertained, if the cause had been just. Also, the bishop's chamberlain being therewith charged, would in no wise take upon him so ungodly an office.—Yea, the whole town was so offended with his unjust condemnation, that the bishop's servants could not get for their money so much as one cord to tie him to the stake, or a tar-barrel to burn him, but were constrained to cut the cords of their master's own pavilion to serve their turn. Nevertheless, one servant of the bishop's, more ignorant and cruel than the rest, called Alexander Simmerwail, undertaking the office of a temporal judge in that part, conveyed him to the fire, where, against all natural reason of man, his boldness and hardness did more and more increase, so that the Spirit of God working miraculously in him, made it manifest to the people that his cause and articles were most just, and he was an innocent sufferer.

Now, when all things were ready for his death, and he conveyed with armed men to the fire, Oliphant bade him pass to the stake; and he said, Nay, but wilt thou put me up with thy hand, and take part of my death, thou shalt see me pass up gladly; for by the law of God I am forbidden to put hands upon myself. Then Oliphant put him up with his hand, and he ascended gladly, saying, "I will draw nigh unto the altar of God;" and desired that he might have space to speak to the people; which Oliphant and others of the burners denied, saying, that he had spoken over-much; for the bishops were altogether offended that the matter was so long continued. Then some of the young men committed both the burners and the bishops their masters to the devil, saying, that they believed they should lament that day; and desired the said Walter to speak what he pleased.

And so, after he made his humble supplication to God on his knees, he arose, and standing upon the coals, said on this wise: "Dear friends, the cause why I suffer this day, is not for any crime laid to my charge, (albeit I be a miserable sinner before God,) but only for the defence of the faith of Jesus Christ, set forth in the Old and New Testament unto us; for which, as the faithful martyrs have offered themselves gladly before, being assured, after the death of their bodies, of eternal felicity; so this day I praise God that he hath called me of his mercy among the rest of his servants to seal up his truth with my life: which, as I have received it of him, so willingly I offer it to his glory. Therefore, as you will escape the eternal death, be no more seduced with the lies of priests, monks, friars, priors, abbots, bishops, and the rest of the sect of Antichrist, but depend only upon Jesus Christ and his mercy, that ye may be delivered from condemnation."

All that while there was great mourning and lamentation of the multitude: for they perceiving his patience, stoutness, and boldness, constancy and hardness, were not only moved, but their hearts also were so inflamed, that he was the last martyr that died in Scotland for religion. After his prayer, he was hoisted up upon the stake, and being in the fire, he said, "Lord, have mercy upon me! Pray, people, while there is time." And so he departed in the faith.

EPITAPHIUM.

*Non nostra impietas aut actæ crimina vitæ
Armarunt hostes in mea fata truces:
Sola fides Christi sacris signata libellis,
Quæ vitæ causa est, est mihi causa necis.*

After this, by the just judgment of God, in the same place where Walter Mille was burnt, the images of the great church of the abbey, which excelled both in number and costliness, were burnt in the time of the Reformation.

And thus much concerning such matters as happened, and such martyrs as suffered, in the realm of Scotland, for the faith of Jesus Christ, and testimony of his truth.

PERSECUTION IN KENT.

IN revolving the registers of William Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, I find moreover, besides these above comprehended in the time and reign of king Henry, the names of divers others, whereof some suffered martyrdom for the like testimony of God's word, and some recanted, which although here they do come a little out of order, and should have been placed before in the beginning of king Henry's reign, yet rather than they should utterly be omitted, I thought here to give them a place, though somewhat out of time; yet not altogether, I trust, without fruit unto the reader, being no less worthy to be registered and preserved from oblivion, than others of their fellows before them.

A Table of certain true Servants of God, and Martyrs, which were burned in the diocese of Canterbury, under William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, anno 1511.

William Carder, of Tenterden, weaver; Agnes Grebil, of Tenterden, wife of John Grebil, the elder, and mother to John and Christopher Grebil, (who, with her own husband, accused her to death, being then threescore years of age;) Robert Harrison, of Halden, of the age of sixty years; John Browne, of Ashford; and Edward Walker, of Maidstone, cutler.

The articles whereupon these five blessed martyrs were accused, and condemned by the judges and witnesses, were these, as follow:

1. For holding that the sacrament of the altar was not the very body of Christ.
2. That auricular confession was not to be made to a priest.
3. That no power is given of God to priests, to minister sacraments, say mass, or other divine service, more than to laymen.
4. That the solemnization of matrimony is not necessary to the salvation of souls, neither was instituted of God, (for a sacrament they meant.)
5. That the sacrament of extreme unction is not available nor necessary to the soul's health.
6. That the images of the cross, of the crucifix, of the blessed Virgin, and other saints, are not to be worshipped; and that they which worship them, do commit idolatry.
7. That pilgrimages to holy places, and holy relics, are not necessary nor meritorious.
8. That invocation is not to be made to saints, but only to God.
9. That holy bread and holy water have no more virtue after their consecration than before.
10. That they have believed, taught, and holden, all and every of the same damnable opinions before, as they did at that present.
11. That where they now have confessed their errors, they would not have so done, but only for fear of manifest proofs brought against them; or else but for fear to be convicted by them they would never have confessed the same of their own accord.
12. That they have commended and talked of the said damnable errors heretofore with divers other persons, and have had books concerning the same.

The order and form of process used against these five Martyrs; and, first, of WILLIAM CARDER, anno 1511.

William Carder being cited before William Warham, archbishop, and his chancellor, Cuthbert Toustal, Dr. Sylvester, Dr. Welles, Clement Brown, with others more, the notaries being William Potking and David Cowper, the articles and interrogatories above specified were laid against him. The archbishop seeking all advantages against him, brought in such witnesses as before were abjured, whom he knew for fear of relapse durst do none other but disclose whatsoever they knew; to wit, Christopher Grebil, William Rich, Agnes Ive, John Grebil, Robert Hilles, and Stephen Castelin. Whose depositions being taken, and the said Carder being asked what he could say for himself? he had nothing, he said, to produce against their attestations, but submitted him unto their mercy. Saying, moreover, that if he had ever any misbelief of the sacraments of the church, contrary to the common holding of the Catholics, he now was sorry, and repented him thereof. Which being done, the archbishop, (this his submission notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the register maketh no mention of any relapse,) contrary to good law, at least contrary to all Christian charity, proceeded to the reading of the sentence, and so condemned him; who neither stood stubbornly to that which he did hold, neither yet did hold any thing contrary to the mind of holy scripture, to merit burning.

Then after him was called forth Agnes Grebil, and examined of the said twelve articles above recited; which she in like manner denied, as the other had done before, putting her adversaries to their proof. Then the archbishop calling for John Grebil, her husband, and Christopher and John Grebil, her two sons, (who had been abjured before,) caused them upon their oath to depose against their own natural mother; and so they did.

First, John Grebil, the elder, her husband, examined by virtue of his oath, deposed, That first about the end of king Edward the Fourth's days, in his house, by the teaching of John Ive, she was brought to that belief, and so forth from thence daily until the time of detection she hath continued.

And besides that, (said he,) when my children, Christopher and John, being about seven years of age, were then taught of me in my house the said error of the sacrament of the altar, and by the said Agnes, my wife, divers times, she was always of one mind in the said misbelief against the sacrament of the altar; that it was not Christ's body, flesh, and blood, but only bread. Furthermore, being examined how he knew that she was steadfast in the said error; he said that she always without contradiction affirmed this teaching, and said the said opinion was good, and was well contented that her children aforesaid were of the same opinions against the sacrament of the altar.

The bishop, with his Catholic doctors, not yet contented with this, to set the husband against the wife, proceeding further in their Catholic zeal, caused her two children, Christopher and John, to be produced, one of the age of two-and-twenty, the other of nineteen, against their own natural mother. Who likewise being pressed with their oath, witnessed and said, that the aforesaid Agnes, their mother, held, believed, taught, and defended, that the sacrament of the altar was but bread, and not the very body of Christ's flesh and blood; that baptism was no better in the font, than out of the font; that confirmation was of no effect; that the solemnization of matrimony was no sacrament; that confession to God alone was sufficient; also, that going on pilgrimage, and worshipping of saints and images, was of none effect, &c. Item, That their father, and the said Agnes their mother, held, taught, and commended of the said errors within their house divers times, by the space of these three years past, as well on holidays as working days, affirming and teaching that the said opinions were good and lawful, and to be holden and maintained; and agreement was made amongst them, that none of them should discover or bewray either of these beliefs in any wise. Finally, that they never heard their said father and mother holding or teaching any other opinions, than be the said errors against the sacrament of the altar, and pilgrimages, offerings, worshipping of saints and images, as far as they could remember.

Here hast thou, Christian reader, before thine eyes an horrible spectacle of a singular, yea, of a double impiety; first, of an unnatural husband witnessing against his own wife; and of as unnatural children, accusing and witnessing against their own mother. The husband to come in against his own wife, and the children to bring in the knife wherewith to cut the throat of their own natural mother that bare them, that nourished them, that brought them up, what is this but impiety upon impiety, prodigious and horrible for all Christian ears to hear? And yet the greatest impiety of all resteth in these pretended Catholics and clergymen, which were the authors and causers of all this mischief.

The cause why this good woman so stood, as she did, in the denial of these aforesaid articles objected, was this, for that she never thought that her husband and her own children, who only were privy to her religion, would testify against her. Whom notwithstanding after she perceived to come in, and to depose this against her, being now destitute of all friends and comfort, burst out in these words openly, That she repented the time that ever she bare those children of her body. And thus the archbishop, with his doctors, having now the thing that they sought for, although she was ready to deny all errors, and to conform herself to their religion, yet notwithstanding they refused, and proceeded to their sentence; and so condemned her to death.

After her condemnation, next was brought to examination Robert Harrison, who in like manner, because he stood in his denial, contrary witnesses again were produced, to wit, Christopher Grebil, William Rich, William Olberd, and Agnes Ive, who a little before had been abjured, and therefore were so much the more apt and applicable to serve the bishop's humour for danger of relapse. After the deposition and conviction of which witnesses, although he submitted himself to repentance and conformity, yet notwithstanding it would not be received, but sentence was read, and he condemned with the other two aforesaid to the fire.

And thus these three were condemned and burned, and certificate given up of them together, to the king, from Warham the archbishop, upon the same, anno 1511.

Besides these three martyrs, I find in the aforesaid registers of William Warham, two other martyrs also in the same year, and for the same twelve articles above specified, to be condemned upon the depositions of certain witnesses brought in against them. Whereupon they were adjudged likewise for heretics to be burned, the year aforesaid, 1511. The names of which two martyrs were John Brown and Edward Walker.

The Martyrdom of LAUNCELOT, one of the King's Guards; JOHN, a Painter; and GILES GERMAN.

About the year of our Lord 1539, one John, a painter, and Giles German, were accused of heresy; and whilst they were in examination at London before the bishop and other judges, by chance there came one of the king's servants, named Launcelot, a very tall man, and of no less godly mind and disposition than strong and tall of body.

This man, standing by, seemed by his countenance and gesture to favour both the cause and the poor men his friends. Whereupon he being apprehended, was examined and condemned together with them. And the next day, at five of the clock in the morning, was carried with them into St. Giles in the field, and there burned, there being but a small concourse or company of people at their death.

The Story of one STILE, Martyr.

In the company and fellowship of these blessed saints and martyrs of Christ, which innocently suffered within the time of king Henry's reign, for the testimony of God's word and truth, another good man also was with like cruelty oppressed, and burned in Smithfield, about the latter end of Cuthbert Tonsal's time, bishop of London; whose name was called Stile, as Sir Robert Omdred tells, who was at the same time present himself at his burning and martyrdom, and eye-witness of the same. With him there was burned also a book of the Apocalypse, which belike he was wont to read upon. This book when he saw fastened unto the stake to be burned with him, lifting up his voice, "O blessed Apocalypse, (said he,) how happy am I that I shall be burned with thee!" And so this good man and the blessed Apocalypse were both together consumed in the fire.

JOHN BROWN, a blessed Martyr of Christ Jesus, burned at Ashford, by Archbishop Warham, and Dr. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, about the second year of King Henry VIII.

The first occasion of the trouble of this John Brown, the blessed servant of God, was by a certain priest; who passing down to Gravesend in the common barge, where the said John Brown was amongst divers other passengers more, and disclaiming that he so sanctily should sit so near unto him in the barge, at length bursting forth in his priestly voice and disdainful countenance, he asked him in this manner, Dost thou know (said he) who I am? Thou sittest too near me, and sittest on my clothes. No sir, (said the other,) I know not what you are. I tell thee, (quoth he,) I am a priest. What, sir, are you a parson or vicar, or some lady's chaplain? No, (quoth he again,) I am a soul priest, I sing for a soul. Do you so, sir, (said the other;) that is well done. I pray you sir, (said he,) where find you the soul when you go to mass? I cannot tell thee, (said the priest.) I pray you, where do you leave it, sir, when the mass is done? I cannot tell thee, (said the priest.) Neither can you tell where you find it when you go to mass, nor where you leave it when the mass is done, how can you then save the soul? (said he.) Go thy ways, (said the priest;) I perceive thou art an heretic, and I will be even with thee.

So at the landing, the priest taking with him Walter More and Wm. More, two gentlemen and brethren, rode straightways to the archbishop, who at that time was William Warham. Whereupon the said John Brown, within three days after, was sent for by the archbishop. Those who were sent, came suddenly into his house upon him, the same day when his wife was churched, as he was bringing in a mess of pottage to the serving of his guest; and so laying hands upon him, they set him upon his own horse, and binding his feet under the horse's belly, carried him away to Canterbury, neither he, nor his wife, nor any of his friends, knowing whither he went; and there continuing the space of forty days, from Low-Sunday till the Friday before Whitsunday: through the cruel handling of the said archbishop, and the bishop of Rochester, Dr. Fisher, he was so piteously treated, that his bare feet were set upon the hot burning coal, to make him deny his faith. Which notwithstanding he would not do, but patiently abiding the pain, continued in the Lord's quarrel unmoveable. At length, after all this cruelty sustained, his wife yet not knowing where he was, on Friday before Whitsunday he was sent to Ashford, where he dwelt, the next day there to be burned.

In the mean time, as he was brought to the town over night, there to be set in the stocks, it happened, as God would, that a young maid of his house coming by, and seeing her master, ran home and told her mistress.

Then she coming to him, and finding him in the stocks, appointed to be burned the next morning, sat by him all the night long. To whom he declared the whole story or rather tragedy how he was handled, and how his feet were burned to the bones, by the two bishops aforesaid, that he could not set them upon the ground, (he thanked God therefore,) and all to make me (said he) to deny my Lord; which I will never do. For if I should deny him (said he) in this world, he would deny me hereafter: and therefore I pray thee, good Elizabeth, continue as thou hast begun, and bring up thy children virtuously in the fear of God.

And so the next day, which was on Whitsun-even, this godly martyr was burned; where he, standing at the stake, said this prayer which followeth, holding up his hands:

O Lord, I yield me to thy grace,
Grant me mercy for my trespass:
Let never the fiend my soul chase.
Lord, I will bow, and thou shalt beat:
Let never my soul come in hell's heat.

Into thy hand I commend my spirit; thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, of thy truth.

And so this blessed martyr ended his life in peace, anno 1511.

This story the said Elizabeth Brown, his wife, did oft-times repeat to Alice, his daughter, who dwelling in the parish of St. Pulchre's, testified the narration hereof unto me, and certain others, upon whose credible information I have recorded the same.—Fox, vol. 2. p. 551.

Furthermore, it is to be noted, that the said John Brown bare a faggot seven years before this, in the days of king Henry VII. Whose son also, named Richard Brown, for the like cause of religion, was imprisoned at Canterbury in the latter time of queen Mary, and should have been burned, with two more besides himself, the next day after the death of queen Mary, but that by the proclaiming of queen Elizabeth they escaped.

Here followeth the HISTORY, no less lamentable than notable, of WILLIAM GARDINER, an Englishman, suffering most valiantly in PORTUGAL, for the testimony of God's truth.

Coming now to the year 1552, we will consider what was done in Portugal among the Popish merchants there, to a certain countryman of our's, named William Gardiner, a man verily in my judgment not only to be compared with the most principal and chief martyrs of these our days, but also such a one as the ancient churches in the time of the first persecutions cannot shew a more famous, whether we do behold the force of his faith, his firm and steadfast constancy, the invincible strength of his spirit, or the cruel and horrible torments, the report whereof were enough to put any man in horror.

Wherefore if any praise or dignity amongst men, as reason is, be due unto the martyrs of Christ, for their valiant acts, this one man amongst many seemeth worthy to be numbered, and also to be ranked in the church with Ignatius, Laurentius, Ciratius, Crescentius, and Gordianus. And if the church of Christ do receive so great and manifold benefits by these martyrs, with whose blood it is watered, by whose ashes it is enlarged, by whose constancy it is confirmed, by whose testimony it is witnessed, and finally, through whose agonies and victories the truth of the gospel doth gloriously triumph; let us not then think it any great matter to commit their glorious acts to memory, as a perpetual token of our goodwill towards that cause in and for which they suffered.

William Gardiner was of an honest stock, born at Bristol, honestly brought up, and by nature given unto gravity, of a mean stature of body, of a comely and pleasant countenance, but in no part so excellent as in the inward qualities of the mind, which he always from his childhood preserved without spot of reprehension. Also his extensive learning did not a little commend and beautify his other ornaments.

When he grew unto those years at which young men are accustomed to settle their minds to some kind of life, it happened that he gave himself to merchandise, under the conduct and guiding of a certain merchant of Bristol, called Mr. Paget, by whom he was at the last (being of the age of twenty-six years or thereabout) sent into Spain, and by chance the ship arriving at Lisbon, he tarried there about his merchandise, where at the last he having got understanding of the language, and being accustomed to their manners, became a profitable servant both to his master and others, in such things as pertained to trade; whereunto he did so apply himself, that nevertheless he in that Popish country, reserving still the religion of his own country of England, ever kept himself sound and undefiled from the Portuguese superstition. There were also besides him divers other good men in the same city. Neither did he lack good books, or the conference of good and honest men; unto whom he would oftentimes bewail his weakness, that he was neither sufficiently touched with the hatred of his sins, neither yet inflamed with the love of godliness.

Whilst he was there, it happened that there should be a solemn marriage celebrated the first of September, in the year aforesaid, betwixt the son of the king of Portugal and the Spanish king's daughter. The marriage day being come, there was great resort of the nobility and estates. There lacked no bishops with mitres, nor cardinals with hats, to set out this royal wedding. To be short, they went forward to the wedding with great pomp, where a great concourse of people resorted, some of good will, some for service sake, and some (as the manner is) to gaze and look. There was great preparation of all parties throughout the whole city, as in such cases is usual, and all places were filled with mirth and gladness.

In this great assembly of the whole kingdom, William Gardiner, although he did not greatly esteem such kind of spectacles, yet being allured through the fame and report thereof, was there also, coming thither early in the morning, to the intent he might have the better opportunity to hear and see.

The hour being come, they flocked into the church with great solemnity and pomp, the king first, and then every estate in order; the greater the persons, the more ceremonies were about them. After all things were set in order, they went forward to the celebrating of their masses. The cardinal did execute, with much singing and organ playing. The people stood with great devotion and silence, praying, looking, kneeling, and knocking; their minds being fully bent and set, as it is the manner, upon the external sacrament.

How grievously these things did prick and move this young man's mind, it cannot be expressed; partly to behold the miserable absurdity of those things, and partly to see the folly of the common people, and not only of the common people, but especially to see the king himself, and his council, with so many sage and wise men as they seemed to be, seduced with like idolatry as the common people were; inso-much that it lacked very little, but that he would even that present day have done some notable thing in the king's sight and presence, but that the great press and throng that was about him hindered him from coming to the altar.

When the ceremonies were ended, he came home very sad and heavy in his mind, insomuch that all his fellows marvelled greatly at him; who by divers conjectures conceived the cause of his sadness, notwithstanding they did not fully understand that those matters did so much trouble his godly mind; neither yet did he declare it unto any man, but seeking solitariness, falling down prostrate before God, with manifold tears he bewailed the neglecting of his duty, deliberating with himself how he might call that people from their impiety and superstition.

In this deliberation his mind being fully settled, and thinking that the matter ought not to be any longer deferred, he renounced the world, making up all his accounts so exactly, as well of that which was due unto him as that which he owed unto others, as no man could justly ask so much as one farthing. Which thing done, he continued night and day in prayer calling upon God, and continual meditation of the scriptures, that scarcely he would take any meat by day, or sleep by night, or at the most above one hour or two of rest in the night, as Pendigrace, his fellow companion both at bed and board, did testify.

The Sunday came, to be celebrated either with like pomp and solemnity, or not much less; where the said William was present early in the morning, very cleanly apparelled, even of purpose, that he might stand near the altar without repulse. Within a while after cometh the king with all his nobles. Then Gardiner setteth himself as near the altar as he might, having a Testament in his hand, the which he diligently read upon, and prayed, until the time was come that he had appointed to enter on his work. The mass began, which was then solemnized by a cardinal: yet he sat still. He who said mass proceeded, he consecrated, sacrificed, lifted up on high, shewed his god unto the people, and all the people gave great reverence: and as yet he stirred nothing. At the last they came unto that place of the mass where they used to take the ceremonial host, and toss it to and fro round about the chalice, making certain circles and semicircles.

Then the said William Gardiner, being not able to suffer any longer, ran speedily unto the cardinal, and even in the presence of the king and all his nobles and citizens, with the one hand he snatched away the cake from the priest, and trod it under his feet, and with the other hand overthrew the chalice. This matter at the first made them all abashed, but by and by there arose a great tumult, and the people began to cry out. The nobles and the common people ran together, amongst whom one drawing out his dagger gave him a great wound in his shoulder, and as he was about to strike him again to have slain him, the king twice commanded him to have him saved; so by that means they abstained from murder.

After the tumult was ceased, he was brought to the king;

by whom he was demanded what countryman he was, and how he durst be so bold to work such a contumely against his majesty, and the sacraments of the church?—He answered, “Most noble king, I am not ashamed of my country; I am an Englishman both by birth and religion, and am come hither only for traffic; and when I saw in this famous assembly so great idolatry committed, my conscience neither ought, neither could any longer suffer, but that I must needs do that which you have seen me lately do. Which thing, most noble prince, was not done nor thought of me for any contumely or reproach of your presence, but only for this purpose, as before God I do clearly confess, to seek the salvation of this people.”

When they heard that he was an Englishman, and called to remembrance how the religion was restored by king Edward, they were by and by brought in suspicion that he was suborned by Englishmen thus to do, to mock and deride their religion. Wherefore they were the more earnest upon him, to know who was the author and procurer that he should commit that act. Unto whom he answered, desiring them that they would conceive no such suspicion of him, forasmuch as he was not moved thereunto by any man, but only by his own conscience. For otherwise there was no man under heaven for whose sake he would put himself into so manifest danger; but that he owed this service first unto God, and secondarily unto their salvation: wherefore, if he had done any thing which was unpleasant unto them, they ought to impute it unto no man, but unto themselves, who so irreverently used the holy supper of the Lord unto so great idolatry, not without the peril of their own souls, except they repented.

Whilst that he spake these, with many other things more unto this effect, very gravely and stoutly, the blood ran abundantly out of the wound, so that he was ready to faint; wherefore surgeons were sent for, whereby he might be cured if it were possible, and be reserved for further examination and more grievous torment. For they were fully persuaded that this deed had divers abettors and setters on: which was the cause that all the other Englishmen also in the same city of Lisbon came into suspicion, and were commanded to safe custody. Amongst whom, Pendigraee, because he was his bed-fellow, was grievously tormented and examined more than the rest, and scarcely was delivered after two years’ imprisonment. The others were much sooner set at liberty, at the intercession of a certain duke. Notwithstanding, their suspicion could not yet be thus satisfied, but they came into his chamber to seek if there were any letters, to understand and find out the author of this enterprise. And when they could find nothing there, they came again unto him, being grievously wounded, with torments to extort of him the author of this fact, and to accuse him as guilty of the most grievous heresy. Of both which points, with such dexterity as he could, he cleared himself. Wherein although he spake in the Portuguese tongue well, yet he used the Latin tongue much more exactly.

But they not being therewith satisfied, added another strange kind of torment, which, as I suppose, passeth the bull of Phalaris: because there should no kind of extreme cruelty be left untried, they caused a piece of linen to be sewed round like a ball, which they with violence put down his throat unto the bottom of his stomach, tied with a small string, which they held in their hands; and when it was down, they pulled it up again with violence, so plucking it to and fro in such sort, as that with much less grief they might have rid him out of his life at once.

Thus at the last, when all torments and tormentors were wearied, and that it did nothing at all prevail to go this way to work, they asked him, whether he did not repent his wicked and seditious deed? As touching the deed, he answered, that it was so far off that he did repent, that if it were to do again, he thought he should do the same. But as touching the manner of the deed, he was not a little sorry that it was done in the king’s presence, to the disquietness of his mind. Howbeit, that was not to be imputed unto him, who neither enterprised nor thought upon any such matter, but was rather to be ascribed unto the king, in that he, having power, would not prohibit so great idolatry used among his people. This he spake with great fervency.

After they had used all kinds of torments, and saw that there could nothing more be gathered of him, and also that through his wounds and pains he could not live long, they brought him three days after to execution. And first of all, bringing him into the vestry, they cut off his right hand, which he, taking up with his left hand, kissed. Then he was brought into the market-place, where his other hand also was cut off; which he, kneeling down upon the ground, also kissed. These things thus done, after the manner and fashion of Spain, his arms being bound behind him, and his feet under the horse’s belly, he was carried to the place of execution.

There was in that place a certain engine, from which a great rope coming down by a pulley, was fastened about the middle of this Christian martyr, which first pulled him up. Then was there a great pile of wood set on fire underneath him, into which he was by little and little let down, not with the whole body, but so that his feet only felt the fire. Then was he hoisted up, and so let down again into the fire, and thus oftentimes pulled up and down. In which great torment, for all that, he continued with a constant spirit, and the more terribly he was burned, the more vehemently he prayed.

At the last, when his feet were consumed, the tormentors asked him, whether he did not yet repent him of his deed? and exhorted him to call upon our Lady and the saints. Whereunto he answered, That as he had done nothing whereof he did repent, so had he the less need of the help of our Lady, or any other saint; and what external torment soever they used, the truth (he said) remaineth always one and like unto itself; the which as he had before confessed in his life, so would he not now deny at his death: desiring them to leave off such vanities and folly. For when Christ did cease to be any more our advocate, then he would pray to our Lady to be his advocate; and said, “O eternal God, Father of all mercies, I beseech thee look down upon thy servant,” &c. And when they sought by all means possible to stop or hinder his praying and praising God in this sort, he cried out with a loud voice, rehearsing the forty-third Psalm, “Judge me, O God, and defend my cause against the unmerciful people.”

He was not come to the latter end of the psalm, when as they pulling him up and down in the fire for the more torment, the rope being burnt asunder, he fell down in the midst thereof; where giving his body for a sacrifice, he changed his temporal pains for everlasting rest.

Thus it seemed good in the sight of God by this messenger to provoke the Portuguese to the sincere knowledge of him; and therefore they ought the more to have acknowledged the love and kindness of God offered unto them, and also the more to be mindful of their own duty and thankfulness towards him. And if it be so great an offence to violate the ordinance of man’s law, and to contemn the ambassadors of kings and princes, let the Portuguese and all others look well unto it, what it is so cruelly to handle the heavenly messenger of the high God.

Neither was this their cruelty altogether unrevenged by the mighty hand of God, when not only the very same night, amongst divers of the king's ships which were in the haven ready to sail, one was burned, being set on fire by a sparkle of Gardiner's fire driven thither with the wind, but also the king's son, who then was married, died within half a year, and in the next year after the king himself also died, and so both within one year after the tormenting of this blessed martyr.

QUEEN MARY'S COMING TO THE THRONE; WITH THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF POPERY IN THE KINGDOM OF ENGLAND.

WHEN king Edward by long sickness began to appear more feeble, in the mean while a certain marriage was provided, and shortly also upon the same solemnized in the month of May, between the lord Gildford, son to the duke of Northumberland, and the lady Jane, the duke of Suffolk's daughter; whose mother being then alive, was daughter to Mary, king Henry the Seventh's sister, who first was married to the French king, and afterwards to Charles, duke of Suffolk. The marriage being ended, and the king waxing every day more weak, and there seeming no hope of his recovery, it was brought to pass, not only by the consent of the nobility, but also of the chief lawyers of the realm, that the king by his testament did appoint the aforesaid lady Jane, daughter to the duke of Suffolk, to be inheretrix unto the crown of England, passing over his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth.

To this order subscribed all the king's council, and the chief of the nobility, the mayor, and the city of London, and almost all the judges and chief lawyers of this realm, saving only justice Hales, of Kent, a man both favouring true religion, and also an upright judge, as any that hath been noted in this realm, who giving his consent unto lady Mary, would in no case subscribe to lady Jane. The causes laid against lady Mary, were as well for that it was feared she would marry with a stranger, and thereby entangle the crown; as also that she would alter that religion, used both in king Henry her father's, and also in king Edward her brother's days, and so bring in the pope, to the utter destruction of the realm: which indeed afterwards came to pass, as by the sequel of this story shall appear.

When king Edward was dead, this Jane was established in the kingdom by the nobles' consent, and was forthwith proclaimed queen at London, and in other cities where there was any great resort, and was there so taken and named. Between this young damsel and king Edward there was little difference in age, though in learning and knowledge of the tongues, she was not only equal but also superior unto him, being instructed of a master right nobly learned. If her fortune had been as good as her bringing up, joined with the fineness of her understanding, undoubtedly she might have seemed comparable not only to the most celebrated Roman ladies, or to any other woman that deserved high praise for singular learning, but also to the university men, who have taken many degrees in the schools.

In the mean time, while these things were carried on at London, Mary, who had knowledge of her brother's death, wrote to the lords of the council as followeth:

A Letter of the Lady Mary, sent to the Lords of the Council, claiming the Crown after the Decease of King Edward.

"My lords, we greet you well, and have received sure advertisement that our dearest brother, the king, our late sovereign lord, is departed to God's mercy; which news how woful they be unto our heart, he only knoweth to whose will and pleasure we must and do humbly submit us and our wills. But in this so lamentable a case, that is, to wit, now after his majesty's departure and death, concerning the crown and governance of this realm of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging, what hath been provided by act of parliament, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances advancing our right, you know, the realm, and the whole world knoweth, the rolls and records appear by the authority of the king our said father, and the king our said brother, and the subjects of this realm; so that we verily trust that there is no good true subject, that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we have of ourselves caused, and, as God shall aid and strengthen us, shall cause our right and title, in this behalf to be published and proclaimed accordingly. And albeit this so weighty a matter seemeth strange, that our said brother dying upon Thursday at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof: yet we consider your wisdoms and prudence to be such, that having eftsoons, amongst you debated, pondered, and well weighed this present case with our estate, with your own estate, the commonwealth, and all our honours, we shall and may conceive great hope and trust, with much assurance in your loyalty and service, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst; and that ye will, like noble men, work the best. Nevertheless, we are not ignorant of your consultations, to undo the provisions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and provisions forcible, wherewith ye be assembled and prepared, by whom, and to what end, God and you know, and nature cannot but fear some evil. But be it, that some consideration politic, or whatsoever thing else, hath moved you thereto, yet doubt you not, my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right ready to remit and fully pardon the same, and that freely to eschew bloodshed and vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same; trusting also assuredly you will take and accept this grace and virtue in good part, as appertaineth, and that we shall not be enforced to use the service of other our true subjects and friends, which in this our just and right cause, God, in whom our whole affiance is, shall send us. Wherefore, my lords, we require you and charge you, and every of you, that of your allegiance which you owe to God and us, and to none other, for our honour and the surety of our person only employ yourselves, and forthwith upon receipt hereof cause our right and title to the crown and government of this realm to be proclaimed in our city of London, and other places, as to your wisdom shall seem good, and as to this case appertaineth, not failing hereof, as our very trust is in you. And this our letter, signed with our hand, shall be your sufficient warrant in this behalf.

"Given under our signet, at our manor of Kening-hall, the 9th of July, 1553."

To this letter of the lady Mary, the lords of the council made answer again as followeth:

Answer of the Lords unto Lady Mary's Letter.

"Madam, we have received your letters the 9th of this instant, declaring your supposed title, which you judge yourself to have to the imperial crown of this realm, and all the dominions therunto belonging. For answer whereof, this is to advertise you, that forasmuch as our sovereign lady queen Jane is, after the death of our sovereign lord Edward the Sixth, a prince of most noble memory, invested and possessed with the just and right title in the imperial crown of this realm, not only by good order of old ancient laws of this realm, but also by our late sovereign lord's letter patent, signed with his own hand, and sealed with the great seal of England, in presence of the most part of the nobles, counsellors, judges, with divers other grave and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: We must therefore, as of most bounden duty and allegiance, assent unto her said grace, and to none other, except we should (which faithful subjects cannot) fall into grievous and unspeakable enormities. Wherefore we can no less do, but for the quiet both of the realm and you also, to advertise you, that forasmuch as the divorce, made between the king of famous memory, king Henry VIII. and the lady Katharine, your mother, was necessary to be had both by the everlasting laws of God, and also by the ecclesiastical laws, and by the most part of the noble and learned universities of Christendom, and confirmed also by the sundry acts of parliaments remaining yet in their force, and thereby you justly made illegitimate and unheritable to the crown imperial of this realm, and the rules, and dominions, and possessions of the same; you will, upon just consideration hereof, and of divers other causes lawful to be alleged for the same, and for that just inheritance of the right line and godly order taken by the late king our sovereign lord king Edward the sixth, and agreed upon by the nobles and great personages aforesaid, surcease by any pretence to vex and molest any of our sovereign lady queen Jane her subjects from their true faith and allegiance due unto her grace: Assuring you, that if you will for respect shew yourself quiet and obedient, (as you ought,) you shall find us all and several ready to do you any service that we with duty may, and glad with your quietness to preserve the common state of this realm, wherein you may be otherwise grievous unto us, to yourself, and to them. And thus we bid you most heartily well to fare. From the Tower of London, in this 9th of July, 1553.

“Your Ladyship's friends,
(shewing yourself an obedient subject,)

“Thomas Canterbury,	R. Rich,
The Marquis of	Huntingdon,
Winechester,	Darcy,
John Bedford,	Cheyney,
William Northampton,	R. Cotton,
Thomas Ely, chanceller,	John Gates,
Northumberland,	W. Peter,
Henry Suffolk,	W. Cecill,
Henry Arundel,	John Check,
Shrewsbury,	John Mason,
Pembroke,	Edward North,
Cobham,	R. Bowes.”

After she received this answer, lady Mary went secretly away from the city, hoping chiefly upon the good-will of the commons, and yet perchance not destitute altogether of the secret advertisements of some of the nobles. When the council heard of her sudden departure, they gathered speedily a power of men together, appointing an army, and first assigned that the duke of Suffolk should take that enterprise in hand, and so have the leading of the band. But afterwards altering their minds, they thought it best to send forth the duke of Northumberland, with certain other lords and gentlemen, and that the duke of Suffolk should keep the Tower, where the lord Guilford and the lady Jane the same time were lodged.

These things being thus agreed upon, the duke then set forward after the best array out of London, having, notwithstanding, his times prescribed and his journey appointed by the council, to the intent he might not seem to do any thing but upon warrant.

Mary, in the mean while, tossed with much travel up and down, to work the surest way for her best advantage, withdrew herself into Norfolk and Suffolk, where she understood the duke's name to be had in much hatred for the service that had been done there of late under king Edward, in subduing the rebels, and there gathering to her such aid of the commons on every side as she might, keeping herself close for a space within Fremingham eastle. To whom first of all the Suffolk men resorted, who being always forward in promoting the proceedings of the gospel, promised her their aid and help, so that she would not attempt any alteration of the religion which her brother king Edward had before established, by laws, and orders publicly enacted, and received by the consent of the whole realm in that behalf.

Unto this condition she soon agreed, with such promises made unto them that no innovation should be made of religion, as that no man would or could then have doubted her.

Thus Mary being guarded with the power of the gospels, did vanquish the duke, and all those that came with him. In consideration whereof it was an heavy word that she answered to the Suffolk men afterwards, who did make supplication to her grace to perform her promise: “Forso-much, (saith she,) as you being but members, desire to rule your head, you shall one day well perceive that members must obey their head, and not look to bear rule over the same.” And not only that, but also to cause the more terror unto others, a certain gentleman named Mr. Dobbe, dwelling at Wyndam, for the same cause, that is, for advertising her, by humble request, of her promise, was punished; being three sundry times set on the pillory, to be a gazing-stock unto all men. Divers others delivered her books and supplications made out of the scripture, to exhort her to continue in the true doctrine then established; and for their good will were sent to prison. But such is the condition of man's nature, that we are for the most part more ready always to seek friendship when we stand in need of help, than ready to requite a benefit once past and received. Howbeit, against all this one sheet-anchor we have, which may be a sure comfort to all miserable creatures, that equity and fidelity are ever perfect and certainly found with the Lord above, though the same, being shut out of the doors in this world, be not to be found among men.

The greatest help that made for the lady Mary, was the short journeys of the duke of Northumberland, which by commission were assigned to him before as is above mentioned. For the longer the duke lingered in his journey, the lady Mary more increased in power, the hearts of the people being mightily bent unto her. Which after the council at London perceived, and understood how the common multitude did withdraw their hearts from them to stand with her, and that certain noblemen began to go the other way, they turned their song, and proclaimed for queen the lady Mary, eldest daughter to king Henry VIII. and appointed by parliament to succeed king Edward, dying without issue.

And so the duke of Northumberland was left destitute and forsaken, alone at Cambridge with some of his sons and a few others, among whom the earl of Huntingdon was one who there were arrested and brought to the Tower of London, as traitors to the crown, notwithstanding that he had there proclaimed her queen before.

Thus have ye Mary now made a queen, and the sword of authority put into her hand, which how she afterwards did use, we may see in the sequel of this book. Therefore, when she had been thus advanced by the gospellers, and saw all in quiet by means that her enemies were conquered, sending before her the duke captive to the Tower the 25th of July, she followed not long after, being brought up the 3d day of August to London, with the great rejoicing of many.

Coming to London, her first lodging she took at the Tower, where the aforesaid lady Jane, with her husband the lord Guilford, a little before her coming, were imprisoned; where they remained waiting her pleasure almost five months. But the duke, within a month after his coming to the Tower, being adjudged to death, was brought forth to the scaffold, and there beheaded.

Thus the duke of Northumberland, with sir John Gates and sir Thomas Palmer, being put to death; in the mean time, queen Mary entering thus her reign with the blood of these men, besides hearing mass herself in the Tower, gave full evidence, especially by the sudden delivering of Stephen Gardiner out of the Tower, that she was not minded to stand to that which she so deeply had promised to the Suffolk men before, concerning the not subverting or altering the state of religion; as in very deed the surmise of the people was therein nothing deceived.

About this time, Bonner, bishop of London, who had been degraded in king Edward's days, being restored, appointed Mr. Bourne, a canon of St. Paul's, to preach at the cross, who afterward was bishop of Bath; he taking occasion of the gospel of that day to speak something largely in justifying of Bonner, being then present; which Bonner, said he, upon the same text in that place, that day four years had preached before, and was upon the same most cruelly and unjustly cast into the most vile dungeon of the Marshalsea, and there kept during the time of king Edward. His words sounded so evil in the ears of the hearers, that they could not keep silence, and began to murmur and to stir in such sort, that the mayor and aldermen feared much an uproar. But the truth is, that one hurled a dagger at the preacher; but who it was could not then be proved, although afterward it was known. In fine, the stir was such, that the preacher plucked in his head, and durst no more appear in that place. The matter of his sermon tended much to the derogation and dispraise of king Edward, which thing the people in no case could abide. Then Mr. Bradford, at the request of the preacher's brother and others, then being in the pulpit, stood forth and spake so mildly, christianly, and effectually, that with few words he appeased all; and afterward he and Mr. Rogers conducted the preacher betwixt them from the pulpit to the grammar-school door, where they left him safe. But shortly after they were both rewarded with long imprisonment, and last of all, with fire in Smithfield.

By reason of this tumult at Paul's cross, an order was taken by the lords of the council with the mayor and aldermen of London, that they calling the next day following a common council of the city, should thereby charge every householder to cause their children, apprentices, and other servants, to keep their own parish churches upon the holidays, and not to suffer them to attempt any thing to the violating of the common peace; willing them also to signify to the said assembly the queen's determination uttered unto them by her highness the 12th of August, in the Tower. Which was, although her grace's conscience is stayed in the matters of religion, yet she graciously meant not to compel or strain other men's consciences otherwise than God shall, as she trusted, put in their hearts a persuasion of the truth that she is in, through the opening of his word unto them, by godly, virtuous, and learned preachers, &c.

Also, it was then ordered, that every alderman in his ward should forthwith send for the curates of every parish within their liberties, and warn them not only to forbear to preach themselves, but also not to suffer any other to preach, or make any open or solemn reading of the scripture in their churches, unless the said preachers were severally licensed by the queen.

After this sermon at Paul's cross, the next day the queen's guard was at the cross with their weapons, to guard the preacher. And when men withdrew themselves from the sermon, order was taken by the mayor, that the ancients of all companies should be present, lest the preacher should be discouraged by his small auditory.

During this and the following month, (August and September, 1553,) many persons were taken up and imprisoned, for speaking against Mr. Bourne's sermon preached at St. Paul's cross.

The first day of October, queen Mary was crowned at Westminster; and the tenth day of the same month of October then following, began the parliament with the solemn mass of the Holy Ghost, after the Popish manner, celebrated with great pomp in the palace of Westminster. To which mass, among the other lords (according to the manner) should come the bishops which yet remained undeposed, which were, the archbishop of York, Dr. Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, John Harley, bishop of Hereford. Of the bishops, Dr. Taylor and Mr. Harley presenting themselves according to their duty, and taking their place amongst the lords, after they saw the mass begin, not abiding the sight thereof, withdrew themselves from the company: for which cause the bishop of Lincoln being examined, and protesting his faith, was upon the same commanded to attend; who not long after died at Ankerwife. Mr. Harley, because he was married, was excluded both from the parliament and from his bishopric.

Mass being done, the queen, accompanied with the estates of the realm, was brought into the parliament house, there according to the manner to enter and begin the consultation. At which consultation or parliament were repealed all statutes made in the time of king Henry the Eighth for Præmunire, and statutes made in king Edward the Sixth's time for administration of common prayer and the sacrament in the English tongue; and, furthermore, the attainder of the duke of Northumberland was by this parliament confirmed. In this mean while many men were forward in erecting of altars and masses in churches. And such as would stick to the laws made in king Edward's time, till others should be established, some of them were marked, and some presently apprehended. Among whom, sir James Hales, a knight of Kent, and justice of the Common Pleas, was one: who, notwithstanding he had ventured his life in queen Mary's cause, in that he would not subscribe to the uninheriting of her by the king's will, yet for that he did at a quarter sessions give charge upon the statutes made in the time of king Henry VIII. and Edward VI. for the supremacy and religion, he was imprisoned in the Marshalsea, Compter, and Fleet, and so cruelly handled and put in fear by talk that the warden of the Fleet used to have in his hearing, of such torments as were in preparing for heretics, or for what other cause God knoweth, that he sought to rid himself out of this life by wounding himself with a knife; and afterward was contented to say as they willed him. Whereupon he was discharged: but after that he never rested till he had drowned himself in a river, half a mile from his house in Kent.

During the time of this parliament, the clergy likewise, after their wonted manner, had a convocation, with a disputation also, appointed by the queen's commandment, at Paul's church in London, the same time, which was about the 18th of October. In which convocation, first Mr. John Harpsfield, bachelor of divinity, made a sermon ad clerum, the 16th of October. After the sermon done, it was assigned by the bishops, that they of the clergy-house, for avoiding confusion of words, should choose them a prolocutor; to which office by common assent was named Dr. Weston, dean of Westminster.

After these things thus sped in the convocation house, they proceeded next to the disputation appointed, as is above said, by the queen's commandment, about the matter of the sacrament; which disputation continued six days. Wherein Dr. Weston was chief on the pope's part, who behaved himself outrageously in taunting and checking. In conclusion, such as disputed on the contrary part were obliged some to flee, some to deny, and some to die, though to the most men's judgments that heard the disputation, they had the upper hand.

In the days of king Henry, and also king Edward reigning after him, divers noblemen, bishops, and others, were cast into the Tower, some charged with treason, as lord Courtney and the duke of Norfolk; some for the pope's supremacy, and suspicious letters tending to sedition, as Tonsal, bishop of Durham; and others, for other things; all which continued there prisoners till queen Mary's coming in. Unto whom the said queen soon granted their pardon, and restored them to their former dignities. Amongst whom also was Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, whom she not only freed out of captivity, but also advanced him to be high chancellor of England. Furthermore, to the lord Courtney she shewed such favour, that she made him earl of Devonshire, inso-much that there was a suspieion amongst many that she would marry him; but that proved otherwise.

We have seen before, that Bonner, who had been prisoner in the Marshalsea, was delivered by queen Mary, and restored to the bishopric of London again; Dr. Ridley, with divers other good bishops more, being deposed; as Cranmer from Canterbury, the archbishop of York likewise, Poynt from Winchester, John Hooper from Worcester, Barlow from Bath, Harley from Hereford, Taylor from Lincoln, Farrar from St. David's, Coverdale from Exeter, Seorie from Chichester, &c. with a great number of archdeacons, deans, and briefly, all such beneficed men who either were married, or would constantly adhere to their profession. All which were removed from their livings, and other of the contrary sect put in the same, as cardinal Pole, Gardiner, Heath, White, Day, Trounfield, &c.

And as touching Cranmer, forso-much as there was rumour spread of him the same time in London that he had recanted, and caused mass to be said at Canterbury; for purging of himself, he published abroad a declaration of his truth and constancy in that behalf, protesting that he neither had so done, nor minded so to do. Adding, moreover, that if it would so please the queen, he, with Peter Martyr, and certain other whom he would choose, would in open disputation sustain the cause of the doctrine taught and set forth before in the time of king Edward, against all persons whomsoever. But while he was in expectation to have this disputation obtained, he, with other bishops, were laid fast in the Tower, and Peter Martyr permitted to depart to Strasburgh.

After this, in the month of November, the archbishop Cranmer, notwithstanding he had earnestly refused to subscribe to the king's will in disinheriting his sister Mary, alleging many grave and pithy reasons for her legitimation, was in the Guildhall of London arraigned and attainted of treason, with the lady Jane, and three of the duke of Northumberland's sons: which, at the entreaty of certain persons, were had again to the Tower, and there kept for a time. All which notwithstanding, Cranmer being pardoned of treason, stood only in the action and ease of doctrine, which they called heresy, whereof he was right glad and joyful.

This being done in November, the people, and especially the churchmen, perceiving the queen so eagerly set upon her old religion, they likewise for their parts, to shew themselves no less forward to serve the queen's appetite, (as the manner is of the multitude, commonly to frame themselves after the humour of the prince and time present,) began in their choirs to set up the pageant of St. Katharine and of St. Nicholas, and of their processions, in Latin.

And when the month of December was come, the parliament broke up; but, first of all, such statutes were repealed which were made either of Præmunire, or touched any alteration of religion and administration of sacraments, under king Edward. In which parliament also communication was moved of the queen's marriage with king Philip, the emperor's son.

In this mean while, cardinal Pole being sent for by queen Mary, was by the emperor requested to stay with him, to the intent, as some think, that his presenee in England should not be a hinderance to the marriage which he intended between Philip his son and queen Mary. For the making whereof he sent a most ample embassy, with full power to make up the marriage betwixt them; which took such success, that after they had communed of the matters a few days, they knit up the knot.

The 12th day of February, 1554, was beheaded the lady Jane, to whom was sent Mr. Fecknam, alias Howman, from the queen, two days before her death, to commune with her, and to reduce her from the doctrine of Christ to queen Mary's religion. Which communication here followeth:

Fecknam. Madam, I lament your heavy ease, and yet I doubt not but that you bear out this sorrow of your's with a constant and patient mind.

Jane. You are welcome unto me, sir, if your coming be to give Christian exhortation. And as for my heavy ease, I thank God, I do so little lament it, that rather I account the same for a more manifest declaration of God's favour toward me, than ever he shewed me at any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you, or other which bear me good-will, should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing so profitable for my soul's health.

Feck. I am here come to you at this present, sent from the queen and her council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith; although I have so great confidence in you, that I shall have, I trust, little need to travel with you much therein.

Jane. Forsooth, I heartily thank the queen's highness, which is not unmindful of her humble subject; and I hope likewise that you no less will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were sent for.

Feck. What is then required of a Christian man?

Jane. That he should believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three Persons and one God.

Feck. What! is there nothing else to be required or looked for in a Christian, but to believe in him?

Jane. Yes, we must love him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.

Feck. Why, then faith justifieth not, nor saveth not.

Jane. Yes, verily, faith, as Paul saith, only justifieth.

Feck. Why, St. Paul saith, "If I have all faith without love, it is nothing."

Jane. True, it is: for how can I love him whom I trust not? or how can I trust him whom I love not? Faith and love go both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

Feck. How shall we love our neighbour?

Jane. To love our neighbour, is to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, and give drink to the thirsty, and to do to him as we would do to ourselves.

Feck. Why, then, it is necessary unto salvation to do good works also, and it is not sufficient only to believe.

Jane. I deny that, and I affirm that faith only saveth; but it is meet for a Christian, in token that he followeth his master, Christ, to do good works: yet may we not say that they profit to our salvation; for when we have done all, yet we be unprofitable servants, and faith only in Christ's blood saveth us.

Feck. How many sacraments are there?

Jane. Two: the one the sacrament of baptism, and the other the sacrament of the Lord's supper.

Feck. No, there are seven.

Jane. By what scripture find you that?

Feck. Well, we will talk of that hereafter. But what is signified by your two sacraments?

Jane. By the sacrament of baptism I am washed with water, and regenerated by the Spirit, and that washing is a token to me that I am a child of God. The sacrament of the Lord's supper offered unto me, is a sure seal and testimony that I am, by the blood of Christ which he shed for me on the cross, made partaker of the everlasting kingdom.

Feck. Why, what do you receive in that sacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Christ?

Jane. No, surely, I do not so believe. I think that at the supper I neither receive flesh nor blood, but bread and wine; which bread when it is broken, and the wine when it is drunken, putteth me in remembrance how that for my sins the body of Christ was broken and his blood shed on the cross, and with that bread and wine I receive the benefits that come by the breaking of his body, and shedding of his blood, for our sins on the cross.

Feck. Why, doth not Christ speak these words, "Take, eat, this is my body?" Require you any plainer words? Doth he not say it is his body?

Jane. I grant he saith so; and so he saith, "I am the Vine, I am the Door:" but he is never the more the door nor the vine. Doth not St. Paul say, "He calleth things that are not, as though they were?" God forbid that I should say, that I eat the very natural body and blood of Christ: for then either I should pluck away my redemption, or else there were two bodies, or two Christs. One body was tormented on the cross, and if they did eat another body, then had he two bodies; or if his body were eaten, then was it not broken upon the cross; or if it were broken upon the cross, it was not eaten of his disciples.

Feck. Why, is it not as possible that Christ by his power could make his body both to be eaten and broken, and to be born of a Virgin, as to walk upon the sea, having a body; and other such like miracles as he wrought by his power only?

Jane. Yes, verily, if God would have done at his supper any miracle, he might have done so: but I say, that then he minded no work nor miracle, but only to break his body, and shed his blood on the cross, for our sins. But I pray you to answer me this one question: Where was Christ when he said, "Take, eat, this is my body?" Was he not at the table when he said so? he was at that time alive, and suffered not till the next day. What took he but bread? what brake he but bread? and what gave he but bread? Look, what he took he brake; look, what he brake he gave; and look, what he gave they did eat: yet all this while he himself was alive, and at supper before his disciples, or else they were deceived.

Feck. You ground your faith upon such authors as say and unsay both in a breath, and not upon the church, to whom ye ought to give credit.

Jane. No, I ground my faith on God's holy word, and not upon the church. For if the church be a good church, the faith of the church must be tried by God's word, and not God's word by the church, either yet my faith. Shall I believe the church because of antiquity? or shall I give credit to the church that taketh away from me the half part of the Lord's supper, and will not let any man receive it in both kinds? Which things, if they deny to us, then deny they to us part of our salvation. And I say, that it is an evil church, and not the spouse of Christ, but the spouse of the devil, that altereth the Lord's supper, and both taketh from it and addeth to it. To that church, say I, God will add plagues, and from that church will he take their part out of the book of life. Do they learn that of St. Paul, when he ministered to the Corinthians in both kinds? Shall I believe this church? God forbid.

Feck. That was done for a good intent of the church, to avoid an heresy that sprang on it.

Jane. Why, shall the church alter God's will and ordinance for good intent? How did king Saul? The Lord God defend.

With these and such like persuasions he would have had her lean to the church; but it would not be. There were many more things whereof they reasoned, but these were the chiefest.

After this, Fecknam took his leave, saying, that he was sorry for her: for I am sure, (quoth he,) that we two shall never meet.

Jane. True it is, (said she,) that we shall never meet, except God turn your heart. For I am assured, unless you repent and turn to God, you are in an evil case: and I pray God, in the bowels of his mercy, to send you his holy Spirit; for he hath given you his great gift of utterance, if it please him also to open the eyes of your heart.

The following letters of this most amiable woman should not be lost. They contain strong sense and sound piety; and must be highly acceptable to all who fear and love God.

A Letter of Lady Jane, sent unto her Father.

"Father, although it hath pleased God to hasten my death by you, by whom my life should rather have been lengthened: yet can I so patiently take it, as I yield God more hearty thanks for shortening my woful days, than if all the world had been given unto my possession, with life lengthened at my own will. And albeit I am well assured of your impatient dolours, redoubled manifold ways, both in bewailing your own wo, and especially (as I hear) my unfortunate state; yet, my dear father, if I may without offence rejoice in my own mishaps, meseems in this I may account myself blessed, that washing my hands with the innocency of my fact, my guiltless blood may cry before the Lord, Mercy to the innocent. And yet, though I must needs acknowledge, that being constrained, and, as you wot well enough, continually assayed, in taking upon me, I seemed to consent, and therein grievously offended the queen and her laws: yet do I assuredly trust, that this my offence towards God is so much the less, in that, being in so royal estate as I was, mine enforced honour blended never with mine innocent heart. And thus, good father, I have opened unto you the state wherein I at present stand. Whose death at hand, although to you perhaps it may seem woful, to me there is nothing that can be more welcome, than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure with Christ our Saviour. In whose steadfast faith (if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father) the Lord that hitherto hath strengthened you, so continue you, that at the last we may meet in heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

At what time her father was flourishing in freedom and prosperity in the time of king Edward, there belonged unto him a certain learned man, student and graduate of the university of Oxford; who then being chaplain to the said duke, and a sincere preacher, as he appeared, of the gospel, according to the doctrine of that time set forth and received, shortly after that the state of religion began to alter by queen Mary, altered also in his profession with the time, and of a Protestant became a friend and defender of the pope's proceedings. At whose sudden mutation and unconstant mutability, this Christian lady being not a little grieved, and most of all lamenting the dangerous state of his soul, in sliding so away for fear from the way of truth, writeth her mind unto him in a sharp and vehement letter; which, as it appeareth to proceed of an earnest and zealous heart, so would God it might take such effect with him, as to reduce him to repentance, and to take better hold again for the health and wealth of his own soul. The copy of the letter is this as followeth:

Another Letter of the Lady Jane, to Mr. Harding, late Chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, her father, and then fallen from the truth of God's most holy word.—A solemn warning to Backsliders of all sorts.

"So oft as I call to mind the dreadful and fearful saying of God, "that he which hold layeth upon the plough, and looketh back, is not meet for the kingdom of heaven;" and, on the other side, the comfortable words of our Saviour Christ to all those that, forsaking themselves, do follow him: I cannot but marvel at thee, and lament thy ease, which seemed some time to be the lively member of Christ, but now the deformed imp of the devil; some time the beautiful temple of God, but now the stinking and filthy kennel of Satan; some time the unspotted spouse of Christ, but now the unshameful paramour of Antichrist; some time my faithful brother, but now a stranger and apostate; some time a stout Christian soldier, but now a cowardly runaway. Yea, when I consider these things, I cannot but speak to thee, and cry out upon thee, Thou seed of Satan, and not of Judah, whom the devil hath deceived, the world hath beguiled, and the desire of life subverted, and made thee of a Christian an infidel. Wherefore hast thou taken the testament of the Lord in thy mouth? Wherefore hast thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore hast thou instructed others to be strong in Christ, when thou thyself dost now so shamefully shrink, and so horribly abuse the testament and law of the Lord? when thou thyself preachest not to steal, yet most abominably stealest, not from men, but from God, and committing most heinous sacrilege, robbest Christ thy Lord of his right members, thy body and soul, and choosest rather to live miserably with shame in the world, than to die, and gloriously with honour reign with Christ, in whom even in death is life. Why dost thou now shew thyself most weak, when indeed thou oughtest to be most strong? The strength of a fort is unknown before the assault, but thou yieldest thy hold before any battery be made. O wretched and unhappy man, what art thou but dust and ashes? and wilt thou resist thy Maker that fashioned thee and framed thee? Wilt thou now forsake him, that called thee from the custom-gathering among the Romish Antichristians, to be an ambassador and messenger of his eternal word? He that first framed thee, and since thy first creation and birth preserved thee, nourished and kept thee, yea, and inspired thee with the spirit of knowledge, (I cannot say of grace,) shall he not now possess thee? Darest thou deliver up thyself to another, being not thine own, but his? How canst thou, having knowledge, or how darest thou, neglect the law of the Lord, and follow the vain traditions of men; and whereas thou hast been a public professor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuse the true God, and worship the invention of man, the golden calf, the whore of Babylon, the Romish religion, the abominable idol, the most wicked mass? Wilt thou torment again, rend, and tear, the most precious body of our Saviour Christ with thy bodily and fleshly teeth? Wilt thou take upon thee to offer up any sacrifice unto God for our sins, considering that Christ offered up himself, as Paul saith, upon the cross, a lively sacrifice once for all? Can neither the punishment of the Israelites, which for their idolatry they so oft received, nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curses of God's own mouth, fear thee to honour any other god than him? Dost thou so regard him that spared not his dear and only Son for thee, so diminishing, yea, utterly extinguishing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praise and honour due unto him to the idols; which have mouths and speak not, eyes and see not, ears and hears not; which shall perish with them that made them?

"What saith the prophet Baruch, where he recited the epistle of Jeremy written to the captive Jews? Did he not forewarn them, that in Babylon they should see gods of gold, silver, wood, and stone, borne upon men's shoulders, to east a fear before the heathen? But he not ye afraid of them, (saith Jeremy,) nor do as others do. But when you see others worship them, say you in your hearts, It is thou, O Lord, that oughtest only to be worshipped: for as for those gods, the carpenter framed them and polished them; yea, gilded be they, and laid over with silver and vain things, and cannot speak. He sheweth, moreover, the abuse of their dealings, how the priests took off their ornaments, and apparelled their women withal; how one holdeth a sceptre, another a sword in his hand, and yet can they judge in no matter, nor defend themselves, much less any other, from either battle or murder, nor yet from gnawing of worms, nor any other evil thing. These and such like words speaketh Jeremy unto them, whereby he proveth them to be but vain things, and no gods. And at last he concludeth thus, Con-founded be all they that worship them. They were warned by Jeremy, and thou as Jeremy hast warned others, and art warned thyself by many scriptures in many places: God saith, he is a jealous God, which will have all honour, glory, and worship, given to him only. And Christ saith, in the fourth of Luke, to Satan which tempted him, even to the same Belzebub, the same devil, which prevailed against thee, 'It is written, (saith he,) Thou shalt honour the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.'

"These and such like do prohibit thee and all Christians to worship any other God than which was before all worlds, and laid the foundations both of heaven and earth. And wilt thou honour a detestable idol invented by Romish popes, and the abominable college of crafty cardinals? Christ offered himself up once for all, and wilt thou offer him up again daily at thy pleasure? But thou wilt say, thou dost it for a good intent. O sink of sin! O child of perdition! dost thou dream therein of a good intent, where thy conscience beareth thee witness of God's threatened wrath against thee? How did Saul, who for that he disobeyed the word of the Lord for a good intent, was thrown from his worldly and temporal kingdom? Shalt thou then, that dost deface God's honour, and rob him of his right, inherit the eternal and heavenly kingdom? Wilt thou for a good intent dishonour God, offend thy brother, and danger thy soul, wherefore Christ hath shed his most precious blood? Wilt thou for a good intent pluck Christ out of heaven, and make his death void, and deface the triumph of his cross, by offering him up daily? Wilt thou, either for fear of death, or hope of life, deny and refuse thy God, who enriched thy poverty, healed thy infirmity, and yielded to thee his victory, if thou couldst have kept it? Dost thou not consider, that the thread of thy life hangeth upon him that made thee, who can, as his will is, either twine it harder to last the longer, or untwine it again to break the sooner? Dost thou not remember the saying of David, a notable king, to teach thee, a miserable wretch, in his 104th Psalm, where he saith thus: 'When thou takest away thy spirit, O Lord, from men, they die, and are turned again to their dust; but when thou lettest thy breath go forth, they shall be made, and thou shalt renew the face of the earth.' Remember the saying of Christ in his gospel, 'Whosoever seeketh to save his life, shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it.' And in the same place, 'Whosoever loveth father or mother above me, is not meet for me. He that will follow me, let him forsake himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.' What cross? The cross of infamy and shame, of misery and poverty, of affliction and persecution, for his name sake. Let the oft falling of those heavenly showers pierce thy stony heart. Let the two-edged sword of God's holy word shear asunder the sinews of worldly respect, even to the very marrow of thy carnal heart, that thou mayest once again forsake thyself, and embrace Christ. And like as good subjects will not refuse to hazard all in the defence of their earthly and temporal governor, so fly not like a white-livered milksop from the standing wherein thy chief Captain, Christ, hath set thee in array of this life. Viriliter age, confortetur cor tuum sustine Dominum. Fight manfully, come life, come death: the quarrel is God's, and undoubtedly the victory is ours.

"But thou wilt say, 'I will not break unity.' What! not the unity of Satan and his members! not the unity of darkness, the agreement of Antichrist and his adherents! Nay, thou deceivest thyself with a fond imagination of such an unity as is among the enemies of Christ. Were not the false prophets in an unity? Were not Joseph's brethren and Jacob's sons in an unity? Were not the Heathen, as the Amalekites, the Perizzites, and the Jebusites, in an unity? Were not the Scribes and Pharisees in an unity? Doth not king David testify, Convenerunt in unum adversus Dominum? Yea, thieves, murderers, conspirators, have their unity. But what unity? Truly saith of amity, Amicitia non est, nisi inter bonos. But mark, my friend, yea, friend, if thou be not God's enemy: There is no unity, but where Christ knitteth the knot among such as be his. Yea, be well assured, that where his truth is resident, there it is verified that he himself saith, Non veni mittere pacem in terram, sed gladium, &c. but to set one against another, the son against the father, and the daughter against the mother-in-law. Deceive not thyself therefore with the glittering and glorious name of Unity; for Antichrist hath his unity, yet not in deed, but in name: the agreement of ill men is not an unity, but a conspiracy. Thou hast heard some threatenings, some cursings, and some admonitions, out of the scripture, to those that love themselves above Christ. Thou hast heard also the sharp and biting words to those that deny him for love of life: Saith he not, 'He that denieth me before men, I will deny him before my Father in heaven?' And to the same effect writeth Paul, Heb. vi. 'It is impossible, saith he, that they which were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted of the good word of God, if they fall and slide away, crucifying to themselves the Son of God afresh, and making of him a mocking-stock, should be renewed again by repentance.' And again saith he, 'If we shall willingly sin after we have received the knowledge of his truth, there is no oblation left for sin, but the terrible expectation of judgment, and fire which shall devour the adversaries.' Thus St. Paul writeth, and thus thou redest; and dost thou not quake and tremble?

"Well, if these terrible and thundering threatenings cannot stir thee to cleave unto Christ, and forsake the world; yet let the sweet consolations and promises of the scriptures, let the example of Christ and his apostles, holy martyrs and confessors, encourage thee to take faster hold of Christ. Harken what he said: 'Blessed are you when men revile you, and persecute you, for my sake: rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the prophets that were before you.' Hear what Isaiah the prophet saith, 'Fear not the curse of men, be not afraid of their blasphemies, for worms and moths shall eat them up like cloth and wool, but my righteousness shall endure for ever, and my saving health from generation to generation. What art thou then, (saith he,) that fearest a mortal man, the child of man, which fadeth away like the flower, and forgettest the Lord that made thee, that spread out the heavens, and laid the foundation of the earth? I am the Lord thy God, that make the sea to rage and be still, whose name is the Lord of hosts: I shall put my word in thy mouth, and defend thee with the turning of an hand.' And our Saviour saith to his disciples, 'They shall accuse you, and bring you before princes and rulers for my name's sake, and some of you they shall persecute and kill: but fear you not, (saith he,) nor care you what you shall say; for it is the Spirit of your Father that speaketh within you. Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Lay up treasures for yourselves, (saith he,) where no thief cometh, nor moth corrupteth. Fear not them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but fear him that hath power to destroy both soul and body. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you.'

"Let these and such like consolations, taken out of the scriptures, strengthen you to Godward: Let not the examples of holy men and women go out of your mind, as Daniel and the rest of the prophets, of the three children, of Eleazarus, that constant father, of the seven of the Maccabees' children, of Peter, Paul, Stephen, and other apostles and holy martyrs in the beginning of the church; as of good Simeon, archbishop of Soloma, and Zetrophone, with infinite other under Saporess, the king of the Persians and Indians, who contemned all torments devised by the tyrants, for their Saviour's sake. Return, return again into Christ's war, and, as becometh a faithful warrior, put on that armour that St. Paul teacheth to be most necessary for a Christian man. And, above all things, take to you the shield of faith, and be you provoked by Christ's own example to withstand the devil, to forsake the world, and to become a true and faithful member of his mystical body, who spared not his own body for our sins.

"Throw down yourself with the fear of his threatened vengeance for this so great and heinous an offence of apostasy: and comfort yourself on the other part with the mercy, blood, and promise of him that is ready to turn unto you whensoever you turn unto him. Disdain not to come again with the lost son, seeing you have so wandered with him. Be not ashamed to turn again with him from the swill of strangers, to the delicacies of your most benign and loving Father, acknowledging that you have sinned against heaven and earth: against heaven, by staining the glorious name of God, and causing his most sincere and pure word to be evil spoken of through you; against earth, by offending so many of your weak brethren, to whom you have been a stumbling-block through your sudden sliding. Be not abashed to come home again with Mary, and weep bitterly with Peter; not only with shedding the tears of your bodily eyes, but also pouring out the streams of your heart, to wash away out of the sight of God the filth and mire of your offensive fall. Be not abashed to say with the publican, 'Lord, be merciful unto me a sinner!' Remember the horrible history of Julian of old, and the lamentable case of Spira of late, whose case, methinks, should be yet so green in your remembrance, that being a thing of your time, you should fear the like inconvenience, seeing you are fallen into the like offence.

"Last of all, let the lively remembrance of the last day be always before your eyes, remembering the terror that such shall be in at that time, with the runagates and fugitives from Christ, which setting more by the world than by heaven, more by their life than by him that gave them life, did shrink, yea, did clean fall away from him that forsook not them: and contrariwise, the inestimable joys prepared for them, that, fearing no peril, nor dreading death, have manfully fought, and victoriously triumphed over all power of darkness, over hell, death, and damnation, through the most redoubted captain, Christ, who now stretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiss you, and last all of to feast you with the dainties and delicacies of his own precious blood; which undoubtedly, if it might stand with his determinate purpose, he would not let to shed again rather than you should be lost. To whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, praise, and glory everlasting. Amen.

"Be constant, be constant, fear not for any pain:

"Christ hath redeem'd thee, and heaven is thy gain."

A Letter written by the Lady Jane in the end of the New Testament, in Greek, which she sent unto her Sister, the Lady Katharine, the night before she suffered.

"I have here sent you, good sister Katharine, a book, which, although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly it is more worth than precious stones. It is the book, dear sister, of the law of the Lord. It is his testament and last will which he bequeathed unto us wretches, which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy; and if you with a good mind read it, and with an earnest mind do purpose to follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It shall teach you to live, and learn you to die. It shall win you more than you should have gained by the possession of your woful father's lands: for as (if God had prospered him) you should have inherited his lands; so if you apply diligently to this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches, as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither thief shall steal, neither yet the moth corrupt. Desire with David, good sister, to understand the law of the Lord God. Live still to die, that you by death may purchase eternal life. And trust not that the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life; for as soon (if God call) goeth the young as the old; and labour always to learn to die. Defy the world, deny the devil, and despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins, and yet despair not; be strong in faith, and yet presume not; and desire with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death cometh and stealeth upon you as a thief in the night, you be with the evil servant found sleeping; and lest, for lack of oil, you be found like the five foolish women, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage. Rejoice in Christ, as I do. Follow the steps of your master, Christ, and take up your cross; lay your sins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice, as I do, good sister, that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am assured, that I shall, for losing of a mortal life, win an immortal life; the which I pray God grant you, and send you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true Christian faith, from the which (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor for fear of death. For if you will deny his truth for to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and yet shorten your days: and if you will cleave unto him, he will prolong your days, to your comfort and his glory: To the which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaseth him to call you. Fare you well, good sister, and put your only trust in God, who only must help you."

Here followeth a certain effectual Prayer made by the Lady Jane in the time of her troubles.

"O Lord, thou God and Father of my life, hear me, poor and desolate woman, which flieth unto thee only in all troubles and miseries. Thou, O Lord, art the only defender and deliverer of those that put their trust in thee: And, therefore, I being defiled with sin, enumbered with affliction, unquieted with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miseries, vexed with temptations, and grievously tormented with the long imprisonment of this vile mass of clay, my sinful body, do come unto thee, O merciful Saviour, craving thy mercy and help, without the which so little hope of deliverance is left, that I may utterly despair of any liberty. Albeit it is expedient, that seeing our life standeth upon trying, we should be visited some time with some adversity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of thy flock or no, and also know thee and ourselves the better: yet thou that saidst thou wouldest not suffer us to be tempted above our power, be merciful unto me now, a miserable wretch, I beseech thee; which, with Solomon, do cry unto thee, humbly desiring thee, that I may neither be too much puffed up with prosperity, neither too much pressed down with adversity, lest I, being too full, should deny thee, my God, or being too low brought, should despair and blaspheme thee, my Lord and Saviour. O merciful God, consider my misery, best known unto thee; and be thou now unto me a strong tower of defence, I humbly require thee. Suffer me not to be tempted above my power, but either be thou a deliverer unto me out of this great misery, or else give me grace patiently to bear thy heavy hand and sharp correction. It was thy right hand that delivered the people of Israel out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the space of four hundred years did oppress them, and keep them in bondage. Let it therefore likewise seem good to thy fatherly goodness, to deliver me, sorrowful wretch, (for whom thy Son Christ shed his most precious blood on the cross,) out of this miserable captivity and bondage, wherein I am now. How long wilt thou be absent? for ever? O Lord, hast thou forgotten to be gracious, and hast thou shut up thy loving-kindness in displeasure? Wilt thou be no more entreated? Is thy mercy clean gone for ever, and thy promise come utterly to an end for evermore? Why dost thou make so long tarrying? Shall I despair of thy mercy, O God? far be that from me. I am thy workmanship, created in Christ Jesus; give me grace therefore to tarry thy leisure, and patiently to bear thy works, assuredly knowing, that as thou canst, so thou wilt deliver me, when it shall please thee, nothing doubting or mistrusting thy goodness towards me; for thou knowest better what is good for me than I do: therefore do with me in all things what thou wilt, and plague me what way thou wilt. Only in the mean time arm me, I beseech thee, with thy armour, that I may stand fast, my loins being girded about with verity, having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and shod with the shoes prepared by the gospel of peace; above all things, taking to me the shield of faith, wherewith I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and taking the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is thy most holy word, praying always with all manner of prayer and supplication, that I may refer myself wholly to thy will, abiding thy pleasure, and comforting myself in those troubles that it shall please thee to send me: seeing such troubles be profitable for me, and seeing I am assuredly persuaded that it cannot be but well all that thou doest. Hear me, O merciful Father, for his sake, whom thou wouldest should be a sacrifice for my sins: To whom, with thee, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory. Amen."

After these things, it remains now, coming to the end of this virtuous lady, next to declare the manner of her execution, with her words and behaviour at the time of her death:

First, when she mounted upon the scaffold, she said to the people standing thereabout, "Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me: but touching the procurement and desire thereof by me, or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good Christian people, this day." (And therewith she wrung her hands, wherein she had her book.) Then said she, "I pray you all, good Christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true Christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other mean, but only by the mercy of God in the blood of his only Son Jesus Christ: and I confess, that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the same, loved myself and the world, and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthily happened unto me for my sins: and yet I thank God, that of his goodness he hath thus given me a time and respite to repent. And now, good people, while

I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers." And then kneeling down, she turned her to Fecknam, saying, "Shall I say this psalm?" And he said, Yea. Then said she the psalm of Miserere mei Deus, in English, in most devout manner, throughout to the end; and then she stood up, and gave her maiden, Mrs. Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Mr. Bruges; and then she untied her gown, and the hangman pressed upon her to help her off with it, but she desiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frowes, paaft, and neeckerchief, giving to her a fair handkerchief to knit about her eyes.

Then the hangman kneeled down, and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he willed her to stand upon the straw; which doing, she saw the block. Then said she, "I pray you despatch me quickly." Then she kneeled down, saying, "Will you take it off before I lay me down?" And the hangman said, No, madam. Then tied she the handkerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block, she said, "What shall I do? Where is it? Where is it?" One of the standers-by guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretched forth her body, and said, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." And so finished her life, in the year of our Lord God 1554, the 12th day of February.

Certain pretty Verses written by the said Lady Jane with a Pin.

Nōn aliena putes homini, quæ obtingere possunt:
Sors hodierna mihi, tunc erit illa tibi.

JANE DUDLEY.

Deo juvante, nil nocet livor malus:
Et non juvante, nil juvat labor gravis.
Post tenebras spero lucem.

Thus was beheaded the lady Jane, and with her also the lord Guilford, her husband, one of the duke of Northumberland's sons.

Touching the condemnation of this lady Jane, here is to be noted, that the judge Morgan, who gave the sentence of condemnation against her, shortly after he had condemned her, fell mad; and in his raving cried out continually to have the lady Jane taken away from him, and so ended his life.

The Style of Queen Mary altered, writing to Bonner for the summoning a Convocation.

"Maria, Dei gratia, Angliæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ Regina, fidei defensor, Reverendo in Christo Patri Edmundo Londino Episc. salutem. Lieet nuper quibusdam arduis et urgentibus negotiis nos securitatem et defensionem Ecclesiæ Angliæ, ac pacem et tranquillitatem, &c."

Where note, concerning the altering the queen's style, the following clause is left out, Ecclesia Anglicanæ et Hiberniæ supremum caput: Supreme head of the church of England and Ireland. Because in this present parliament the supremacy being given away from the crown of England to the pope, thereupon this parcel of the title was also taken away. Likewise the said Bonner giving his certificate upon the same, leaves out Auctoritate illustrissimæ, &c. legitime suffultus: which part also in the same parliament was repealed the same time.

The Dignity of Priests extolled by Bonner.

In this aforesaid convocation, Bonner, bishop of London, being vicegerent and president, as is said, made an oration to the clergy, wherein he seemeth to shew a great piece of profound and deep learning in setting forth the most incomparable and super-angelical order of priesthood, as may appear by this fragment of his aforesaid oration: which, as it came to our hands, so I thought to impart it to the reader, both for that the author of so worthy a work should not pass unknown, and partly also, for that the estimation of this blessed order should lose nothing of its pre-eminence, but might be known in most ample perfection, so as it standeth above angels and kings, if it be true what Bonner saith.

A Fragment of the Oration made by Bonner, bishop of London, to them of the Convocation, copied out by them that stood by and heard him:

BONNER'S ORATION IN PRAISE OF PRIESTHOOD.

"Wherefore it is to be known that priests and elders be worthily of all men to be worshipped for the dignity sake which they have of God, as in Matthew the sixteenth chapter, 'Whatsoever ye shall loose upon earth,' &c. 'And whatsoever ye shall bind,' &c. For a priest by some means is like Mary the Virgin, as is shewed by three points: First, as the blessed Virgin by five words did conceive Christ, as it is said, Luke i. 'Fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum:' that is to say, 'Be it unto me according to thy word:' so the priest by five words doth make the very body of Christ. Even as immediately after the consent of Mary, Christ was all whole in her womb: so, immediately after the speaking of the words of consecration, the bread is transubstantiated into the very body of Christ. Secondly, As the Virgin carried Christ in her arms, and laid him in an ox-stall after his birth: even so the priest after the consecration doth lift up the body of Christ, and placeth it, and carrieth it, and handleth it with his hands. Thirdly, As the blessed Virgin was sanctified before she had conceived: so the priest being ordained and anointed before he doth consecrate, because without orders he could consecrate nothing: therefore the laymen cannot do that thing, although he be never so holy, and do speak the self-same words of consecration. Therefore here is to be known, that the dignity of priests by some means passeth the dignity of angels, because there is no power given to any of the angels to make the body of Christ. Whereby the least priest may do in earth that which the greatest and highest angel in heaven cannot do, as St. Bernard saith, 'O worshipful dignity of priests, in whose hands the Son of God is, as in the womb of the Virgin he was incarnate.' St. Augustine saith, 'That angels in the consecration of the sacred host do serve him, and the Lord of heaven descendeth to him.' Whereupon St. Ambrose upon St. Luke saith, 'Doubt thou not the angels to be where Christ is present upon the altar.' Wherefore priests are to be honoured before all kings of the earth, princes, and nobles: for a priest is higher than a king, happier than an angel, maker of his Creator. Wherefore, &c."

Such assertions are blasphemy against God and his church, and treason against the state; but such was the language and logic of this blood-thirsty bishop.

THE PARTICULAR PROCESS AND NAMES OF SUCH MARTYRS, BOTH MEN AND WOMEN, AS WERE PUT TO DEATH IN THIS TIME OF QUEEN MARY.

The Story, Life, and Martyrdom, of Mr. JOHN ROGERS.

The 4th day of February, suffered the faithful martyr of God, Mr. John Rogers, concerning whose life, examinations, and suffering, here followeth in order set forth. And first, touching his life and bringing up:

John Rogers, brought up in the university of Cambridge, where he profited in good learning, at length was chosen by the merchant adventurers to be their chaplain at Antwerp, in Brabant, and whom he served to their edification many years. It chanced him there to fall in company with that worthy martyr of God, William Tindal, and with Miles Coverdale, which, both for the hatred they bare to Popish superstition and idolatry, and love to the true religion, had forsaken their native country. By perusing the scriptures with them, he came to great knowledge in the gospel of God, in-somuch that he cast off the heavy yoke of Popery, and joined himself with them in that painful and most profitable labour of translating the Bible into the English tongue, which is entitled, The Translation of Thomas Matthew.

He knowing by the scriptures, that unlawful vows may lawfully be broken, and that matrimony is both honest and honourable among all men, joined himself in lawful matrimony; and so went to Wittenberg in Saxony, where he with much soberness of living did not only greatly increase in all good and godly learning, but also so much profited in the knowledge of the Dutch tongue, that the charge of a congregation was orderly committed to his cure. In which ministry he diligently and faithfully served many years, until such time as it pleased God, by the faithful travel of his chosen and dear servant, king Edward VI. utterly to banish all Popery out of England, and to receive the true religion, setting God's gospel at liberty. He then being orderly called, having both a conscience and a ready good-will to help forward the work of the Lord in his native country, left Saxony, and came into England to preach the gospel, without certainty of any emolument. In which office after he had diligently and faithfully laboured, Nicholas Ridley, then bishop of London, gave him a prebend in the cathedral church of Paul; and the dean and the chapter chose him to be the reader of the divinity lecture there, in which he continued until such time as queen Mary obtained the crown, banished the gospel and true religion, and brought in the Antichrist of Rome, with his idolatry and superstition.

After the queen was come to the Tower of London, he made a godly and vehement sermon at Paul's cross, confirming such doctrine as he and others had there taught in king Edward's days, exhorting the people constantly to remain in the same, and to beware of all pestilent Popery, idolatry, and superstition. The council being then over-matched with Popish and bloody bishops, called him to account for his sermon: to whom he made a stout, witty, and godly answer; and yet so conducted himself, that at that time he was clearly dismissed. But after that proclamation was set forth by the queen, to prohibit true preaching, he was called again before the council; for the bishops thirsted after his blood.

The council quarrelled with him concerning his doctrine, and in conclusion commanded him as a prisoner to keep his own house; and so he did, although by flying he might easily have escaped their cruel hands. And many things there were which might have moved him hereunto: he did see the recovery of religion in England, for that present, desperate; he knew he could not want a living in Germany, and he could not forget his wife and ten children, and to seek means to succour them. But all these things set apart, after he was called to answer in Christ's cause, he would not depart, but stoutly stood in defence of the same, and for the third trial of that truth was content to hazard his life.

Thus he remained in his own house as prisoner a long time, till at length, through the uncharitable procurement of Bonner, bishop of London, who could not abide such honest neighbours to dwell near to him, he was removed from his own house to the prison called Newgate, where he was lodged among thieves and murderers for a long space : during which time, what business he had with the adversaries of Christ, all is not known, neither yet any certainty of his examinations, further than he himself did leave in writing, which God would not to be lost, but to remain for a perpetual testimony in the cause of God's truth, as here followeth recorded and testified by his own writing.

The Examination and Answers of John Rogers, made to the Lord Chancellor, and to the rest of the Council, the 22d of January, 1555.

L. Chancellor. First the lord chancellor said unto me thus : Sir, ye have heard the state of the realm in which it standeth now.

Rogers. No, my lord, I have been kept in close prison, and except there have been some general thing said at the table when I was at dinner or supper, I have heard nothing ; and there have I heard nothing whereupon any special thing might be grounded.

L. Chan. Then said the lord chancellor : General things ! general things ! mockingly. Ye have heard of my lord cardinal's coming, and that the parliament hath received his blessing, not one resisting unto it but one man, which did speak against it. Such an unity, and such a miracle, hath not been seen. And all they, of which there are eight score in one house, have with one assent and content received pardon of their offences, for the schism that we have had in England, in refusing the holy father of Rome to be the head of the Catholic church. How say ye ? are ye content to unite and knit yourself to the faith of the Catholic church with us, in the state in which it is now in England ? Will ye do that ?

Rogers. The Catholic church I never did nor will dissent from.

L. Chan. Nay, but I speak of the state of the Catholic church, in that wise in which we stand now in England, having received the pope to be supreme head.

Rogers. I know none other head but Christ of his Catholic church, neither will I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to have any more authority than any other bishop hath by the word of God, and by the doctrine of the old and pure Catholic church four hundred years after Christ.

L. Chan. Why didst thou then acknowledge king Henry VIII. to be the supreme head of the church, if Christ be the only head ?

Rogers. I never granted him to have any supremacy in spiritual things, as are the forgiveness of sins, communicating of the Holy Ghost, authority to be a judge above the word of God.

L. Chan. Yea, said he, and Tonstal, bishop of Duresm, and N. bishop of Worcester, if thou hadst said so in his days, thou hadst not been alive now.

Rogers. Which thing I denied ; and would have told how he was said and meant to be supreme head. But they looked and laughed one upon another, and made such a business, that I was constrained to let it pass. There lieth also no great weight thereupon ; for all the world knoweth what the meaning was. The lord chancellor also said to the lord William Haward, that there was no inconvenience therein, to have Christ to be supreme head and the bishop of Rome also : and when I was ready to have answered that there could not be two heads of one church, and have more plainly declared the vanity of that reason, the lord chancellor said, What sayest thou ? Make us a direct answer, whether thou wilt be one of this Catholic church or not, with us in that state in which we are now ?

Rogers. My lord, without fail, I cannot believe that ye yourselves do think in your hearts that he is supreme head, in forgiving sin, &c. as is before said, seeing you, and all the bishops of the realm, have now twenty years long preached, and some of you also written, to the contrary, and the parliament hath so long agoe condescended unto it. And there he interrupted me thus :

L. Chan. Tush, that parliament was with most great cruelty constrained to abolish and put away the primacy from the bishop of Rome.

Rogers. With cruelty ! why then I perceive that you take a wrong way with cruelty to persuade men's consciences. For it should appear by your doings now, that the cruelty then used hath not persuaded your consciences. How would you then have our consciences persuaded with cruelty ?

L. Chan. I talk to thee of no cruelty, but that they were so often and cruelly called upon in that parliament, to let the act go forward ; yea, and even with force driven thereunto ; whereas in this parliament it was so uniformly received, as is aforesaid.

Rogers. Here my lord Paget told me more plainly what my lord chancellor meant. Unto whom I answered, My lord, what will ye conclude thereby ? that the first parliament was of less authority, because but few condescended unto it ? and this last parliament of great authority, because more condescended unto it ? It goeth not, my lord, by more or lesser part, but by the wiser, truer, and godlier part. And I would have said more, but the lord chancellor interrupted me with his question, willing me once again to answer him. For, said he, we have more to speak with than thou, which must come in after thee. And so there were indeed ten persons more out of Newgate, besides two that were not called. Of which ten, one was a citizen of London, which granted unto them, and nine were contrary ; which all came to prison again, and refused the cardinal's blessing, and the authority of his holy father's church, saying, that one of these nine was not asked the question, otherwise than thus, Whether he would be an honest man as his father was before him ? and he answering, Yea ; he was so discharged by the friendship of my lord William Haward, as I have understood. He bade me tell him what I would do ; whether I would enter into the one church, with the whole realm as it is now, or not ? No, said I, I will first see it proved by the scriptures. Let me have pen, ink, and books, &c. and I shall take upon me plainly to set out the matter, so that the contrary shall be proved to be true ; and let any man that will confer with me by writing.

L. Chan. Nay, that shall not be permitted thee ; thou shalt never have so much proffered thee as thou hast now, if thou refuse it, and wilt now not condescend and agree to the Catholic church. Here are two things, mercy and justice : if thou refuse the queen's mercy now, then shalt thou have justice ministered unto thee.

Rogers. I never offended, nor was disobedient unto her grace, and yet I will not refuse her mercy. But if this shall be denied me to confer by writing, and to try out the truth, then it is not well, but too far out of the way. Ye yourselves, all the bishops of the realm, brought me to the knowledge of the pretended primacy of the bishop of Rome, when I was a young man, twenty years past : and will ye now without conviction have me to say and do the contrary ? I cannot be so persuaded.

L. Chan. If thou wilt not receive the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the Catholic church, then thou shalt never have her mercy, thou mayest be sure and as touching conferring and trial, I am forbidden by the scriptures to use any conferring and trial with thee. For St. Paul teacheth me, that I should shun and eschew an heretic after one or two monitions, knowing that such an one is overthrown, and is faulty, insomuch as he is condemned by his own judgment.

Rogers. My lord, I deny that I am an heretic: prove ye that first, and then allege the aforesaid text.

L. Chan. If thou wilt enter into one church with us, &c. tell us that, or else thou shalt never have so much proffered thee again as thou hast now.

Rogers. I will find it first in the scripture, and see it tried thereby, before I receive him to be supreme head.

Wor. Why, do ye not know what is in your creed, Credo Ecclesiam sanctam Catholicam: I believe the holy Catholic church?

Rogers. I find not the bishop of Rome there. For catholic signifieth not the Romish church; it signifieth the consent of all true teaching churches of all times, and all ages. But how should the bishop of Rome's church be one of them, which teacheth so many doctrines that are plainly and directly against the word of God? Can that bishop be the true head of the Catholic church, that doeth so? That is not possible.

L. Chan. Shew me one of them, one, let me hear one.

Rogers. I remembered myself, that amongst so many I were best to shew one; and said, I will shew you one.

L. Chan. Let me hear that, let me hear that.

Rogers. The bishop of Rome and his church say, read, and sing, all that they do in their congregations, in Latin, which is directly and plainly against the first to the Corinthians, the fourteenth chapter.

L. Chan. I deny that, I deny that, that is against the word of God. Let me see you prove that; how prove you that?

Rogers. Thus I began to say the text from the beginning of the chapter, Qui loquiter lingua, &c. to speak with tongue, said I, is to speak with a strange tongue, as Latin, Greek, &c. and so to speak, is not to speak unto men, but to God. But ye speak in Latin, which is a strange tongue; wherefore ye speak not unto men, but unto God, (meaning God only at the most.)—This he granted, that they spake not unto men, but unto God.

Rogers. Well, then, it is vain unto men.

L. Chan. No, not in vain: for one man speaketh in one tongue, another in another tongue, and all well.

Rogers. Nay, I will prove then that he speaketh neither to God nor to man, but unto the wind.

I was willing to have declared how and after what sort these two texts do agree (for they must agree, they be both the sayings of the Holy Ghost, spoken by the apostle Paul,) as to wit, to speak not to men, but unto God, and to speak unto the wind: and so to have gone forward with the proof of my matter begun: but here arose a noise and confusion.

Then said the lord chancellor, To speak unto God, and not unto God, were impossible.

Rogers. I will prove them possible.

No, (said my lord William Haward to my lord chanceller,) now will I bear you witness that he is out of the way: for he granted first, that they which speak in a strange speech speak unto God, and now he saith the contrary, that they speak neither to God nor to man.

Rogers. I have not granted nor said (turning me to my lord Haward) as you report. I have alleged the one text, and now I am come to the other. They must agree, and I can make them to agree; but as for you, you understand not the matter.

L. Haward. I understand so much, that that is not possible.

This is a point of sophistry, (quoth secretary Bourne.)

Then the lord chancellor began to tell the lord Haward, that when he was in High Dutchland, they at Hale, which had before prayed and used their service all in Dutch, began then to turn part into Latin, and part into Dutch.

Wor. Yea, and at Wintenberg too.

Rogers. Yea, in an university, where men for the most part understand the Latin, and yet not all in Latin. I began to go forward, and said, that I would make the texts to agree, and to prove my purpose well enough.

L. Chan. No, no, thou canst prove nothing by the scripture: the scripture is dead, it must have a lively expositor.

Rogers. No, the scripture is alive. But let me go forward with my purpose.

Wor. All heretics have alleged the scriptures in their behalf; and therefore we must have a lively expositor for them.

Rogers. Yea, all heretics have alleged the scriptures: but they were confuted by the scriptures, and by none other expositor.

Wor. But they would not confess that they were overcome by the scriptures, I am sure.

Rogers. I believe that; and yet were they overcome by them, and in all councils they were disputed with and overthrown by the scriptures. And here I would have declared how they ought to proceed in these days, and so have come again to my purpose, but it was impossible; for one asked one thing, another said another, so that I was fain to hold my peace, and let them talk. And even when I would have taken hold on my proof, the lord chancellor ordered me to prison again. Away, away! (said he;) we have more to talk with. If I would not be reformed, (so he termed it,) away, away! Then up I stood; for I had kneeled all the while.

Then Sir Richard Southwell, who stood by in a window, said to me, Thou wilt not burn in this gear when it cometh to the purpose, I know well that.

Rogers. Sir, I cannot tell, but I trust in my Lord God, yes; lifting up mine eyes unto heaven.

Then my lord of Ely told me much of the queen's majesty's pleasure and meaning, and set it out with large words, saying, that she took them that would not receive the bishop of Rome's supremacy, to be unworthy to have her mercy, &c.

Rogers. I said I would not refuse her mercy, and yet I never offended her in all my life: and that I besought her grace and all their honours, to be good to me, reserving my conscience.

Divers spake at once. No! quoth they then, a great number of them, and especially secretary Bourne; a married priest, and have not offended the law?

Rogers. I said, I had not broken the queen's law, nor yet any point of the law of the realm therein: for I married where it was lawful.

Divers at once. Where was that? said they, thinking that to be unlawful in all places.

Rogers. In Dutchland; and if ye had not here in England made an open law, that priests might have had wives, I would never have come home again; for I brought a wife and eight children with me: which thing ye might be sure that I would not have done, if the laws of the realm had not permitted it.

Then there was a great noise, some saying that I was come too soon with such a number; I should find a sour coming of it; and some one thing, and some another. And one said, that there was never a catholic man or country that ever granted that a priest might have a wife.

Rog. I said, the Catholic church never denied marriage to priests, or yet to any other man. And therewith was I going out of the chamber, the sergeaut which brought me thither having me by the arm.

Then the bishop of Worcester turned his face towards me, and said, I wist not where that church was or is.

Rog. I said, yes, that I could tell where it was; but therewith went the sergeaut with me out of the door.

The second Confession of John Rogers, made the 28th and 29th days of January, 1555.

First, being asked again by the lord chancellor, whether I would come into one church with the bishops and whole realm, as now was concluded by parliament, (in the which all the realm was converted to the Catholic church of Rome,) and so receive the mercy before proffered me, arising again with the whole realm out of the schism and error in which we had long been, with recantation of my errors? I answered, That before I could not tell what his mercy meant, but now I understood that it was a mercy of the Antichristian church of Rome, which I utterly refused; and that the rising which he spake of, was a falling into error and false doctrine. Also, that I had and would be able, by God's grace, to prove that all the doctrine which I had ever taught was true and catholic, and that by the scriptures and the authority of the fathers that lived 400 years after Christ's death. He answered, That should not, might not, nor ought not, to be granted: for I was but a private man, and might not be heard against the determination of the whole realm. Should, quoth he, when a parliament hath concluded a thing, one, or any private person, have authority to discuss whether they have done right or wrong? No, that may not be.

I answered shortly, that all the laws of men might not, neither could, rule the word of God, but that they all must be discussed and judged thereby: and neither my conscience, nor any Christian man's, could be satisfied with such laws as disagreed from that word.

Then he said, That I at the first dash condemned the queen and the whole realm to be of the church of Antichrist. I answered, That the queen's majesty, God save her grace, would have done well enough, if it had not been for his counsel. He said, the queen went before him, and it was her own motion. I said without fail, I neither could, nor would I, ever believe it.

Then said Dr. Aldrife, the bishop of Carlisle, that they the bishops would bear him witness. Yea, quoth I, that I believe well; and with that the people laughed.

Then after many words he asked me, What I thought concerning the blessed sacrament? and stood up, and put off his cap, and all his fellow bishops (of which there were a great number, new men, of whom I knew few,) whether I believed in the sacrament to be the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, that was born of the Virgin Mary, and hanged on the cross, really and substantially.

I answered, I had often told him that it was a matter in which I was no meddler, and therefore suspected of my brethren to be of a contrary opinion. Notwithstanding, even as the most part of your doctrine in other points is false, and the defence thereof only by force and cruelty; so in this matter I think it to be as false as the rest. For I cannot understand really and substantially to signify otherwise than cor-porally: but corporally Christ is only in heaven, and so cannot Christ be corporally also in your sacrament. And here I somewhat set out his charity after this sort: My lord, quoth I, ye have dealt with me most cruelly; for ye have put me in prison without law, and kept me there now almost a year and a half. For I was almost half a year in my house, where I was obedient to you, God knoweth, and spake with no man. And now have I been a full year in Newgate, at great costs and charges, having a wife and ten children to maintain, and I had never a penny of my livings; which was against the law.

He answered, that Dr. Ridley, which had given them me, was an usurper, and therefore I was the unjust possessor of them.

Was the king then an usurper, quoth I, which gave Dr. Ridley the bishopric?

Yea, quoth he; and began to set out the wrongs that the king had done to the bishop of London, and to himself also. But yet I do misuse my terms, quoth he, to call the king usurper.—But the word was gone out of the abundance of the heart before; and I think that he was not very sorry for it in heart. I might have said more concerning that matter, but I did not.

I asked him wherefore he put me in prison? He said, because I preached against the queen.

I answered, that it was not true; and I would be bound to prove it, and to stand to the trial of the law, that no man should be able to disprove it, and thereupon would set my life. I preached, quoth I, a sermon at the cross, after the queen came to the Tower; but therein was nothing said against the queen, I take witness of all the audience, which was not small. I alleged also, that he had after examination let me go at liberty after the preaching of that sermon.

Yea, but thou didst read thy lectures after, quoth he, against the commandment of the council.

That did I not, quoth I; let that be proved, and let me die for it. Thus have you now, against the law of God and man, handled me, and never sent for me, never conferred with me, never spoke of my learning, till now that ye have gotten a whip to whip me with, and a sword to cut off my neck, if I will not condescend to your mind. This charity doth all the world understand.

This is the sum of the words which were spoken on the 28th day of January at afternoon, after that Mr. Hooper had been the first, and Mr. Cardmaker the second, in examination before me. The Lord grant us grace to stand together, fighting lawfully in his cause, till we be smitten down together, if the Lord's will be so to permit it. For there shall not a hair of our heads perish against his will, but with his will. Wherunto the same Lord grant us to be obedient unto the end, and in the end, Amen: Sweet, mighty, and merciful Lord Jesus, the Son of David, and of God, Amen, Amen.

Then it being about four o'clock, the lord chancellor said, that he and the church must yet use charity with me; and gave me respite till to-morrow, to see whether I would remember myself well to-morrow, and whether I would return to the Catholic church again, and repent, and they would receive me to mercy.

I said, that I was never out of the true Catholic church, nor would be; but into his church would I, by God's grace, never come.

Well, quoth he, then is our church false and antichristian?

Yea, quoth I.

And what is the doctrine of the sacrament?

False, quoth I; and cast my hands abroad.

Come again, quoth the lord chancellor, to-morrow between nine and ten.

I am ready to come again whensoever ye call, quoth I.

The second day, which was the 29th of January, we were sent for in the morning about nine of the clock, and by the sheriff's fetched from the Compter in Southwark to the church again. And when Mr. Hooper was condemned, as I understood afterward, then they sent for me. Then my lord chancellor said unto me:

Rogers, here thou wast yesterday, and we gave thee liberty to remember thyself this night, whether thou wouldst come to the holy Catholic church of Christ again or not: Tell us now what thou hast determined, whether thou wilt be repentant and sorry for thy errors, and wilt return again and take mercy.

My lord, quoth I, I have remembered myself right well, what you yesterday said to me, and desire you to give me leave to declare my mind, what I have to say thereunto; and that done, I shall answer you to your demanded question.

When I yesterday desired that I might be suffered by the scripture and authority of the first, best, and purest church, to defend my doctrine by writing; ye answered me, that it might not, nor ought not, to be granted me, for I was a private person; and that the parliament was above the authority of all private persons, and therefore the sentence thereof might not be found faulty and valueless by me, being but a private person. And yet, my lord, quoth I, I am able to shew examples, that one man hath come into a general council, and after the whole had determined and agreed upon an act or article, some one man coming in afterward, hath, by the word of God, declared so pithily that the council had erred in decreeing the said article, that he caused the whole council to change, and alter their act or article before determined. And of these examples, said I, I am able to shew two. I can also shew the authority of St. Augustine, that when he disputed with an heretic, he would neither himself, nor yet have the heretic, to lean unto the determination of two former councils, of the which the one made for him, and the other for the heretic that disputed against him; but said, that he would have the scriptures to be their judge, which were common and indifferent for them both, and not proper to either of them.

Item. I could shew, said I, the authority of a learned lawyer, Panormitanus, which saith, that unto a simple layman that bringeth the word of God with him, there ought more credit to be given than to a whole council gathered together. By these things will I prove that I ought not to be denied to say my mind, and to be heard against a whole parliament, bringing the word of God for me, and the authority of the old church 400 years after Christ, albeit that every man in the parliament had willingly, and without respect of fear and favour, agreed thereunto, which thing I doubt not a little of; especially seeing the like had been permitted in the old church, even in general councils, yea, and that in one of the chiefest councils that ever was, unto which neither any acts of this parliament, nor yet any of the late general councils of the bishops of Rome, ought to be compared. For, said I, if Henry VIII. were alive, and should call a parliament, and begin to determine a thing—(and here I would have alleged the example of the act of making the queen a bastard, and of making himself the superior head; but I could not, being interrupted.)

Here my lord chancellor would suffer me to speak no more, but bade me sit down, mockingly saying, that I was sent for to be instructed of them, and I would take upon me to be their instructor.

My lord, quoth I, I stand, and sit not: shall I not be suffered to speak for my life?

Shall we suffer thee to tell a tale, and to prate, quoth he. And with that he stood up, and began to face me, as his manner is, with taunt upon taunt, and check upon check: for in that case, being God's cause, I told him he should not make me afraid to speak.

L. Chan. See what a spirit this fellow hath, said he; finding fault at my accustomed earnestness, and haughty manner of speaking.—Rogers. I have a true spirit, quoth I, agreeing and obeying the word of God; and would further have said, That I was never the worse, but the better, to be earnest in a just and true cause, and in my master Christ's matters; but I could not be heard. And at the length he proceeded towards his excommunication and condemnation, after that I had told him that his church of Rome was the church of Antichrist.

To be short, he read my condemnation before me, particularly mentioning therein but two articles; first, That I affirmed the Romish Catholic church to be the church of Antichrist; and that I denied the reality of their sacrament. He caused me to be degraded and condemned, and put into the hands of the laity; and so he gave me over into the sheriff's hands, which were much better than his.

After the sentence was read, he sent us (Mr. Hooper and me) to the Clink, there to remain till night; and when it was dark they carried us, Mr. Hooper going before with the one sheriff, and I coming after with the other, with bills and weapons enow, out of the Clink, and led us through the bishop's house, and so through St. Mary Overy's churchyard, and so into Southwark, and over the bridge, in procession to Newgate through the city.

But I must shew you this also, that when he had read the condemnation, he declared that I was in the great curse, and what a vengeable dangerous matter it was to eat and drink with us that were accursed, or to give us any thing; for all that so did should be partakers of the same great curse.

Well, my lord, quoth I, here I stand before God and you, and all this honourable audience, and take him to witness, that I never wittingly or willingly taught any false doctrine; and therefore have I a good conscience before God and all good men. I am sure that you and I shall come before a Judge that is righteous, before whom I shall be as good a man as you; and I nothing doubt but that I shall be found there a true member of the true Catholic church of Christ, and everlastingly saved. And as for your false church, ye need not to excommunicate me from it: I have not been in it these twenty years; the Lord be thanked therefore. But now ye have done what ye can, my lord, I pray you yet grant me one thing.

What is that? quoth he.

That my poor wife, being a stranger, may come and speak with me so long as I live; for she hath ten children that are her's and mine, and somewhat I would counsel her, what were best for her to do.

No, quoth he; she is not thy wife.

Yes, my lord, quoth I, and hath been these eighteen years.

Should I grant her to be thy wife? quoth he.

Choose you, quoth I, whether ye will or not, she shall be so nevertheless.

She shall not come at thee, quoth he.

Then I have tried out all your charity, said I. You make yourself highly displeased with the matrimony of priests; but you maintain open whoredom; as in Wales, quoth I, where every priest hath his whore openly dwelling with him, and lying by him; even as your holy father suffereth all the priests of Dutchland, and in France, to do the like.

Thereto he answered not; and thus I departed, and saw him no more.

Now when the time came that he, being delivered to the sheriffs, should be brought out of Newgate to Smithfield, the place of his execution, first came to him Mr. Woodroofe, one of the aforesaid sheriffs, and calling Mr. Rogers unto him, asked him if he would revoke his abominable doctrine, and his evil opinion of the sacrament of the altar? Mr. Rogers answered, That which I have preached I will seal with my blood. Then, quoth Mr. Woodroofe, thou art an heretic. That shall be known, (quoth Rogers,) at the day of judgment. Well, quoth Mr. Woodroofe, I will never pray for thee. But I will pray for you, (quoth Mr. Rogers.) And so he was brought the same day, which was Monday the 4th of February, by the sheriffs toward Smithfield, saying the psalm Miserere, by the way, all the people wonderfully rejoicing at his constancy, with great praises and thanks to God for the same; and there in the presence of Mr. Rochester, comptroller of the queen's household, sir Sichard Southwell, both the sheriffs, and a wonderful number of people, he was burned into ashes, washing his hands in the flame as he was in burning.

A little before his burning at the stake, his pardon was brought, if he would have recanted; but he utterly refused it. He was the first martyr of all the blessed company that suffered in Queen Mary's time. His wife and children, being eleven in number, but ten only able to go, and one sucking on her breast, met him by the way as he went toward Smithfield. This sorrowful sight of his own flesh and blood could not move him, but he cheerfully took his death with wonderful patience, in the defence of Christ's gospel.

The History and Martyrdom of LAURENCE SAUNDERS, burned for the Defence of the Gospel at Coventry, February 8th, anno 1555.

After that queen Mary, by public proclamation in the first year of her reign, had inhibited the sincere preaching of God's holy word, as is before declared, divers godly ministers of the word, which had the cure and charge of souls committed to them, did notwithstanding, according to their bounden duty, feed their flock faithfully, not as preachers authorized by public authority, (as the godly order of the realm was in the happy days of blessed king Edward,) but as the private pastors of particular flocks; among whom Laurence Saunders was one, a man of worshipful parentage. His bringing up was in learning from his youth, in places meet for that purpose, as, namely, in the school of Eton. From whence (according to the manner there used) he was chosen to go to the king's college in Cambridge, where he continued scholar of the college three whole years, and there profited in knowledge and learning very much for that time. Shortly after that, he did forsake the university, and went to his parents, upon whose advice he was minded to become a merchant; for that his mother, who was a gentlewoman of great estimation, being left a widow, and having a good portion for him among his other brethren, she thought to set him up wealthily; and so he coming up to London, was bound apprentice with a merchant, named sir William Chester, (who afterwards chanced to be sheriff of London the same year that Saunders was burned at Coventry.) Thus, by the minds of his friends, Laurence should needs have been a merchant; but Almighty God, which hath his secret working in all things, saw better for his servant, as it fell out in the end.

It happened that his master, being a good man, and hearing his apprentice often in his secret prayers inwardly to mourn by himself, called him unto him, to know what was the cause of that his solitariness and lamentation? who then perceiving his mind nothing to fancy that kind of life, (for so Saunders declared unto him,) and perceiving also his whole purpose to be bent on the study of his book and spiritual contemplation, like a good man sent letters unto his friends, and gave him his indenture to set him free. And thus Laurence Saunders, being delighted with the love of learning, and especially with the reading of God's word, tarried not long in traffie, but shortly returned to Cambridge again to his study; where he began to add to the knowledge of the Latin the study of the Greek tongue, wherein he profited in small time very much: therewith also he joined the study of the Hebrew. Then gave he himself wholly to the study of the scripture, to furnish himself to the office of a preacher.

In study he was diligent and painful, in godly life he declared the fruits of a well-exercised conscience; he prayed often and with great fervour, and in his prayers, as also at other times, he had his part of spiritual exercises, which his hearty sighing to God declared, in which when any special assault did come, by prayer he felt present relief: then was his company marvellous comfortable. For as his exercises were special teachings, so in the end they proved singular consolations; wherein he became so expert, that within short space he was able to comfort others which were in any affliction, by the consolation wherewith the Lord did comfort him. Thus continued he in the university, till he became master of arts, and a long space after.

In the beginning of king Edward's reign, when God's true religion was begun to be restored, after silence obtained, he began to preach, and was so well liked of them which then had authority, that they appointed him to read a divinity lecture in the college at Fotheringay, where by doctrine and life he edified the godly, drew many ignorant people to God's true knowledge, and stopped the mouth of the adversaries. He married about that time, and in the married state led a life unblameable before all men. The college of Fotheringay being dissolved, he was placed to be reader in the minster at Litchfield: where he so behaved himself in teaching and living, that the very adversaries did give him a full report as well of learning as of much godliness. After a certain space, he departed from Litchfield to a benefice in Leicestershire, called Churchlangton; whereupon he keeping residence taught diligently, and kept a liberal house. From thence he was orderly called to take a benefice in the city of London, named Allhallows, in Bread-street. Then minded he to give over his cure in the country: and therefore, after he had taken possession of his benefice in London, he departed from thence into the country, clearly to discharge himself thereof. And even at that time began the broil about the claim that queen Mary made to the crown, by reason whereof he could not accomplish his purpose.

In this trouble, and even among the beginners of it, (such I mean as were for the queen,) he preached at Northampton, nothing meddling with the state, but boldly uttered his conscience against Popish doctrine and Antichrist's damnable errors, which were like to spring up again in England, as a just plague for the little love which the English nation did bear to the blessed word of God, which had been so plentifully offered unto them. The queen's men which were there and heard him, were highly displeased with him for his sermon, and for it kept him among them as prisoner. But partly for the love of his brethren and friends, which were chief doers for the queen among them, partly because there was no law broken by his preaching, they dismissed him. He seeing the dreadful days at hand, inflamed with the fire of godly zeal, preached with diligence at both those benefices, as time could serve him, seeing he could resign neither of them now, but into the hand of a Papist.

Thus passed he to and fro preaching, until the queen's proclamation was put forth; at which time he was at his benefice in the country, where he, notwithstanding the proclamation, taught diligently God's truth, confirming the people therein, and arming them against false doctrine, until he was not only commanded to cease, but also with force resisted, so that he could not proceed there in preaching. Some of his friends, perceiving such fearful menacing, counselled him to flee out of the realm; which he refused so to do. But seeing he was with violence kept from doing good in that place, he returned towards London, to visit the flock of which he had there the charge.

On Saturday the 14th of October, as he was coming nigh to the city of London, Sir John Mordant, a counsellor to queen Mary, did overtake him, and asked him whither he went? I have (said Saunders) a cure in London, and now I go to instruct my people according to my duty. If you will follow my counsel, (quoth Mr. Mordant,) let them alone, and come not at them. To this Saunders answered, How shall I then be discharged before God, if any be sick and desire consolation, if any want good counsel and need instruction, or if any should slip into error and receive false doctrine? Did you not (quoth Mordant) preach such a day (and named the day) in Bread-street, in London? Yes, verily, (said Saunders,) that same is my cure. I heard you myself, (quoth Mr. Mordant;) and will you preach now there again? If it please you, (said Saunders,) to-morrow you may hear me again in that same place, where I will confirm by the authority of God's word, all that I said then, and whatsoever before that time I taught them.

I would counsel you, (quoth the other,) not to preach. If you can and will forbid me by lawful authority, then must I obey, (said Saunders.) Nay, (quoth he,) I will not forbid you, but I do give you counsel. And thus entered they both the city, and departed each from other. Mr. Mordant, of an uncharitable mind, went to give warning to Bonner, bishop of London, that Saunders would preach in his cure the next day. Saunders resorted to his lodging, with a mind bent to do his duty; where because he seemed to be somewhat troubled, one which was there about him asked him how he did? In very deed, (said he,) I am in prison till I be in prison: meaning that his mind was inquiet until he had preached, and that he should have quietness of mind, though he were put in prison.

The next day, which was Sunday, in the forenoon, he made a sermon in his parish, treating on that place which Paul writeth to the Corinthians, "I have coupled you to one man, that you should make yourselves a chaste virgin unto Christ. But I fear lest it come to pass, that as the serpent beguiled Eve, even so your minds should be corrupted from the singleness which ye had towards Christ." He recited a sum of that true Christian doctrine, through which they were coupled to Christ, to receive of him free justification through faith in his blood. The Papistical doctrine he compared to the serpent's deceiving; and lest they should be deceived by it, he made a comparison between the voice of God, and the voice of the Popish serpent; descending to more particular declaration thereof, as it were to let them plainly see the difference that is between the order of the church service set forth by king Edward in the English tongue, and comparing it with the Popish service then used in the Latin tongue.

The first he said was good, because it was according to the word of God, Cor. xiv. and the order of the primitive church. The other he said was evil; and though in that evil he intermingled some good Latin words, yet was it but as a little honey or milk mingled with a great deal of poison, to make them drink up all. This was the sum of his sermon.

In the afternoon he was ready in his church to have given another exhortation to his people. But the bishop of London interrupted him, by sending an officer for him. This officer charged him, upon the pain of disobedience and contumacy, forthwith to come to the bishop his master. Thus, as the apostles were brought out of the temple where they were teaching, unto the rulers of the priests, so was Laurence Saunders brought before this bishop, who had in his company the aforementioned Sir John Mordant, and some of his chaplains. The bishop laid no more to Laurence Saunders' charge, but treason for breaking the queen's proclamation, heresy and sedition for his sermon.

The treason and sedition his charity was content to let slip, until another time; but an heretic he would now prove him, and all those, he said, which did teach and believe that the administration of the sacraments, and all orders of the church, are most pure, which do come most nigh to the order of the primitive church. For the church was then but in her infancy, and could not abide that perfection which was afterwards to be furnished with ceremonies. And for this cause Christ himself, and after him the apostles, did in many things bear with the rudeness of that church.

To this, Laurence Saunders answered with the authority of St. Augustine, That ceremonies were even from the beginning invented and ordained for the rude infancy and weak infirmity of man; and therefore it was a token of the greater perfection of the primitive church, that it had few ceremonies, and of the rudeness of the church papistical, because it had so many ceremonies, partly blasphemous, partly unsavoury and unprofitable.

After much talk had concerning this matter, the bishop willed him to write what he believed of transubstantiation. Laurence Saunders did so, saying, My lord, ye do seek my blood, and ye shall have it: I pray God that ye may be so baptized in it, that ye may thereafter loathe blood-sucking, and become a better man. This writing the bishop kept for his purpose, even to cut the writer's throat, as shall appear hereafter. The bishop, when he had his will, sent Laurence Saunders to the lord chancellor, as Ananias sent Christ to Caiaphas: and like favour found Saunders as Christ his master did before him. But the chancellor being not at home, Saunders was constrained to tarry for him by the space of four hours, in the outer chamber, where he found a chaplain of the bishop's very merrily disposed with certain gentlemen, playing at tables, with divers others of the same family or house occupied there in the same exercise. All this time Saunders stood very modestly and soberly at the screen or eupboard, bareheaded, sir John Mordant, his guide or leader, walking up and down by him; who, as I said before, was one of the council. At last the bishop returned from the court, whom as soon as he was entered, a great many suitors met and received; so that before he could get out of one house into another, half an hour was passed. At last he came into the chamber where Saunders was, and went through into another chamber; where in the mean way Saunders' leader gave him a writing, containing the cause, or rather the accusation, of the said Saunders: which when he had perused, Where is the man? (said the bishop.) Then Saunders being brought forth to the place of examination, first most lowly and meekly kneeled down, and made courtesy before the table where the bishop did sit; unto whom the bishop spake on this wise:

How happeneth it, (said he,) that notwithstanding the queen's proclamation to the contrary, you have dared to preach?

Saunders denied not that he did preach; saying, that forasmuch as he saw the perilous times now at hand, he did but (according as he was admonished and warned by Ezekiel the prophet) exhort his flock and parishioners to persevere and stand steadfast in the doctrine which they had learned; saying also, that he was moved thereunto by the place of the apostle, wherein he was commanded rather to obey God than man; and, moreover, that nothing more moved or stirred him thereunto than his own conscience.

A goodly conscience, surely! (said the bishop.) This your conscience could make our queen a bastard, or mis-begotten; would it not, I pray you?

Then said Saunders, We do not declare or say that the queen is base, or mis-begotten, neither go about any such matter. But for that, let them care whose writings are yet in the hands of men, witnessing the same, not without the great reproach and shame of the author; privily taunting the bishop himself, (who had before, to get the favour of Henry the Eighth, written and set forth in print a book of true obedience, wherein he had openly declared queen Mary to be a bastard.)

Now Mr. Saunders going forwards in his purpose, said, We do openly profess and teach the sincerity and purity of the word; the which, though it be now forbidden us to preach with our mouths, yet notwithstanding I do not doubt but that our blood hereafter shall manifest the same.

The bishop being in this sort prettily nipped and touched, said, Carry away this frenzy fool to prison. Unto whom Mr. Saunders answered, That he did give God thanks, which had given him at the last a place of rest and quietness, where he might pray for the bishop's conversion.

Furthermore, he that did lie with him afterwards in prison in the same bed, reported that he heard him say, that even in the time of his examination he was wonderfully comforted, insomuch, as not only in spirit but also in body, he received a certain taste of that holy communion of saints.

In the mean time, the chancellor, after this little talk with Mr. Saunders, sent him to the prison of the Marshalsea.

As the said Mr. Saunders was in prison, strait charge was given to the keeper that no person should speak with him. His wife yet came to the prison gate, with her young child in her arms, to visit her husband. The keeper, though for his charge he durst not suffer her to come into the prison, yet did he take the little babe out of her arms, and brought him unto his father. Laurence Saunders seeing him, rejoiced greatly, saying, that here joiced more to have such a boy, than he should if two thousand pounds were given him. And to the standers-by, which praised the goodness of the child, he said, What man fearing God would not lose this life present, rather than by prolonging it here he should adjudge this boy to be a bastard, his wife a whore, and himself a whoremonger? Yea, if there were no other cause for which a man of my estate should lose his life, yet who would not give it, to avouch this child to be legitimate, and his marriage to be lawful and holy?

I do, good reader, recite this saying, not only to let thee see what he thought of priests' marriage; but chiefly to let all married couples and parents learn to bear in their bosom true affection.

And now to come to the examination of this good man: after that the bishops had kept him one whole year and a quarter in prison, at length they called him, as they did the rest of his fellows, openly to be examined. Of the which his first examination the effect and purport thus followeth:

The Examination of Laurence Saunders.

Praised be our gracious God who preserveth his from evil, and doth give them grace to avoid all such offences as might hinder his honour, or hurt his church, Amen.

Being cited before the queen's most honourable council, sundry bishops being present, the lord chancellor began to speak as follows:

L. Chan. It is not unknown that you have been a prisoner, for such abominable heresies and false doctrine as hath been sown by you; and now it is thought good that mercy be shewed to such as seek for it. Wherefore, if now you will shew yourself conformable, and come home again, mercy is ready. We must say, that we have fallen in manner all; but now we be risen again, and returned to the Catholic church: you must rise with us, and come home unto it. Give us forthwith a direct answer.

Saunders. My lord, and my lords all, may it please your honours to give me leave to answer with deliberation.

Chan. Leave off your painting and pride of speech: for such is the fashion of you all, to please yourselves in your glorious words; answer yea or nay.

Saunders. My lord, it is no time for me now to paint: and as for pride, there is no great cause why it should be in me; my learning I confess to be but small, and as for riches or worldly wealth I have none at all. Notwithstanding, it standeth me in hand to answer your demand circumspectly, considering that one of these two extreme perils are like to fall upon me; the losing of a good conscience, or the losing of this my body and life. And I tell you truth, I love both life and liberty, if I could enjoy them without the hurt of my conscience.

Chan. Conscience! You have none at all; but pride and arrogancy, dividing yourselves by singularity from the church.

Saunders. The Lord is the knower of all men's consciences. And where your lordship laveth to my charge this dividing myself from the church, I do assure you, that I live in the faith wherein I have been brought up since I was fourteen years old; being taught that the power of the bishop of Rome is but usurped, with many other abuses springing thereof.—Yea, this I have received even at your hands that are here present, as a thing agreed upon by the Catholic church and public authority.

Chan. Yea, marry. But I pray you, have you received by consent and authority, all your heresies of the blessed sacrament of the altar?

Saunders. My lord, it is less offence to cut off an arm, hand, or joint of man, than to cut off the head: for the man may live though he do lack an arm, hand, or joint; and so he cannot without his head. But you, all the whole of you, have agreed to cut off the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, whom now you will have to be the head of the church again.

Bp. of Lond. And if it like your lordship, I have his hand against the blessed sacrament. How say you to that?

Saunders. What I have written, that I have written, and farther I will not accuse myself. Nothing have you to burden me withal, for breaking of your laws since they were in force.

Chan. Well, you be obstinate, and refuse liberty.

Saunders. My lord, I may not buy liberty at such a price. But I beseech your honours to be means to the queen's majesty for such a pardon for us, that we may live and keep our consciences unlogged; and we then shall live as most obedient subjects. Otherwise, I must say for myself, that by God's grace I will abide the utmost extremity that man may do against me, rather than to act against my conscience.

Chan. Ah, sirrah, you will live as you list. The Donatists did desire to live in singularity, but indeed they were not meet to live on earth. No more be you, and that shall you understand within these seven days; and therefore away with him.

Saunders. Welcome be it, whatsoever the will of God shall be, either life or death; and I tell you truly, I have learned to die. But I exhort you to beware of shedding of innocent blood: truly it will cry. The Spirit of God rest upon all your honours. Amen.

This examination being ended, the officers led him out of the place, and so stayed until the rest of his fellows were likewise handled, that they might have them all together to prison.

Laurence Saunders standing among the officers, seeing there a great multitude of people, opened his mouth and spake freely, warning them all of that which by their falling from Christ to Antichrist they did deserve; and therefore exhorting them by repentance to rise again, and to embrace Christ with stronger faith, to confess him to the end, in the defiance of Antichrist, sin, death, and the devil: so should they retain the Lord's favour and blessing.

After he was excommunicated, and delivered to the secular power, he was brought by the sheriff of London to the prison called the Compter, in his own parish in Breadstreet; whereat he rejoiced greatly, both because he found there a fellow-prisoner, Mr. Cardmaker, with whom he had a Christian and comfortable conference, and also because out of prison, as before out of a pulpit, he might preach to his parishioners.

The 4th day of February, the bishop of London came to the prison where he was, to degrade him: which when he had done, Laurence Saunders said to him, I thank God I am none of your church.

The day following, in the morning, the sheriff of London delivered him to certain of the queen's guard, which were appointed to carry him to the city of Coventry, there to be burned. The first night they came to St. Alban's, where Mr. Grimoald (a man who had more store of good gifts than of great constancy) did speak with him.

After Mr. Saunders had given him a lesson meet for his lightness, he took a cup in his hand, and asked him if he would pledge him of that cup, of which he would begin to him? Grimoald, by his shrugging and shrinking shewing what he was, said, Of that cup which is in your hand I will pledge you; but of that other which you mean, I will not promise you. Well, said Mr. Saunders, my dear Lord Jesus Christ hath drunk to me of a more bitter cup than mine shall be; and shall I not pledge my most sweet Saviour? Yes, I hope.

After they were come to Coventry, the same night a poor shoemaker, which was wont to serve him of shoes, came to him after this manner, and said, "O my good master, God strengthen and comfort you." "Gramercies, good shoemaker, (quoth Mr Saunders,) and I pray thee to pray for me, for I am the unmeetest man for this high office that ever was appointed to it: but my gracious God and dear Father is able to make me strong enough." That same night he was put into the common gaol among other prisoners, where he slept but little, but spent the night in prayer, and instructing of others.

The next day, which was the eighth day of February, he was led to the place of execution in the park without the city; going in an old gown and a shirt, barefooted, and oft-times fell flat upon the ground, and prayed. When he was come nigh to the place, the officer appointed to see the execution done, said to Mr. Saunders, That he was one of them which marred the queen's realm with false doctrine and heresy: wherefore thou hast deserved death, quoth he. But yet if thou wilt revoke thine heresies, the queen hath pardoned thee; if not, yonder is fire prepared for thee.—To whom Mr. Saunders answered, "It is not I, nor my fellow-preachers of God's truth, that have hurt the queen's realm; but it is yourself, and such as you are, which have always resisted God's holy word; it is you which have and do mar the queen's realm. I do hold no heresies; but the doctrine of God, the blessed gospel of Christ, that hold I, that believe I, that have I taught, and that will I never revoke."

With that, this tormentor cried, Away with him! And away from him went Mr. Saunders with a merry courage towards the fire. He fell to the ground, and prayed; he rose up again, and took the stake, to which he should be chained, in his arms, and kissed it, saying, Welcome the cross of Christ! Welcome everlasting life! And being fastened to the stake, and fire put to him, full sweetly he slept in the Lord.

And thus have ye the full history of Laurence Saunders, whom I may well compare to St. Laurence, or any other of the old martyrs of Christ's church, both for the fervent zeal of the truth and gospel of Christ, and the most constant patience in his suffering, as also for the cruel torments that he in his patient body did sustain in the flame of fire. For so his cruel enemies handled him, that they burned him with green wood and other smothering, rather than burning fuel, which put him to much more pain; but that the grace and most plentiful consolation of Christ, which never forsake his servants, and gave strength to St. Laurence, gave also patience to this Laurence, above all that his torments could work against: which well appear by his quiet standing, and sweet sleeping in the fire, as is above declared.

This blessed man of God enduring long time in prison, did not pass all this time in unfruitful idleness, but still from time to time did visit his friends, as is said, and especially his wife, with many letters full of godly instruction and consolation.

A Letter which Laurence Saunders did write to his Wife, and others of the faithful, after his condemnation to the fire, written the last of January, anno 1555, out of the Compter, in Breadstreet.

"The grace of Christ, with the consolation of the Holy Ghost, to the keeping of the faith and a good conscience, confirm and keep you for ever vessels to God's glory. Amen.

"O! what worthy thanks can be given to our gracious God for his unmeasurable mercies plentifully poured upon us! And I, most unworthy wretch, cannot but pour forth at this present, even from the bottom of my heart, the bewailing of my great ingratitude and unkindness towards so gracious a good God and loving Father. I beseech you all, as for my other many sins, so especially for that sin of my unthankfulness, crave pardon for me in your earnest prayers, commending me to God's great mercies in Christ.

"To number these mercies in particular, were to number the drops of water which are in the sea, the sands on the shore, the stars in the sky. O my dear wife, and ye the rest of my friends, rejoice with me; I say, rejoice! with thanksgiving for this my present promotion, in that I am made worthy to magnify my God, not only in my life, by my slow mouth and uncircumcised lips, bearing witness unto his truth, and also by my blood to seal the same, to the glory of my God, and confirming of his true church: and as yet I testify unto you that the comfort of my sweet Christ doth drive from my fantasy the fear of death. But if my dear husband, Christ, doth for my trial leave me alone a little to myself, alas, I know in what case I shall be then! but if for my proof he do so, yet I am sure he will not be long or far from me. Though he stand behind the wall and hide himself, (as Solomon saith in his mystical ballad,) yet will he peep in by a crest to see how I do. He is a very tender-hearted Joseph: though he speak roughly to his brethren, and handle them hardly, yea, threaten grievous bondage to his best beloved brother Benjamin; yet can he not contain himself from weeping with us and upon us, with falling on our necks, and sweetly kissing us. Such, such a brother is our Christ unto all. Wherefore hasten to go unto him, as Jacob did with his sons and family, leaving their country and acquaintance. Yea, this our Joseph hath obtained for us, that Pharaoh the infidel shall minister unto us chariots, wherein at ease we may be carried to come unto him: as we have experienced how our very adversaries do help us unto our everlasting bliss by their speedy despatch; yea, and how all things have been helpings hereunto, blessed be our God. Be not afraid of fray-bugs which lie in the way: fear rather the everlasting fire; fear the serpent which hath that deadly sting, of which by bodily death they shall be brought to taste, which are not grafted in Christ, wanting faith and a good conscience, and so are not acquainted with Christ the killer of death. But, O my dear wife and friends! we, whom God hath delivered from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son, by putting off the old man, and by faith putting on the new, even our Lord Jesus Christ, his wisdom, holiness, righteousness, and redemption; we, I say, have to triumph against the terrible, spiteful serpent the devil, sin, hell, death, and damnation. For Christ our brazen serpent hath pulled away the sting of this serpent, so that now we may boldly, in beholding it spoiled of sting, triumph, and with our Christ and all his elect, say, 'Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who hath given us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

"Wherefore be merry, my dear wife, and all my dear fellow heirs of the everlasting kingdom; always remember the Lord.—Rejoice in hope, be patient in tribulation, continue in prayer, and pray for us now appointed to the slaughter, that we may be unto our heavenly Father a fat offering, and an acceptable sacrifice. I may hardly write unto you: wherefore let these few words be a witness of my commendations to you, and all them which love us in the faith; and, namely, unto my flock, among whom I am resident by God's providence, but as a prisoner.

"And although I am not so among them, as I have been, to preach to them out of a pulpit, yet doth God now preach unto them by me, by this my imprisonment and captivity which now I suffer among them for Christ's gospel sake, bidding them to beware of the Romish Antichristian religion and kingdom, requiring and charging them to abide in the truth of Christ, which is shortly to be sealed with the blood of their pastor; who though he be unworthy of such a ministry, yet Christ their high pastor is to be regarded, whose truth hath been taught them by me, is witnessed by my chains, and shall be by my death, through the power of that high Pastor. Be not careful, good wife, cast your care upon the Lord, and commend me unto him in repentant prayer, as I do you and our Samuel; whom, even at the stake, I will offer as myself unto God. Fare ye well, all in Christ, in hope to be joined with you in joy everlasting. This hope is put up in my bosom. Amen, Amen, Amen, pray, pray."

Extract of a Letter to Mrs. Lucy Harrington, a godly gentlewoman, and friendly to him in his troubles.

"Your most gentle commendations, whereof this messenger made remembrance unto me, were for two causes very comfortable: First, For that thereby I understood of the state of your health and bodily welfare, for the which I give thanks unto God, who grant the long continuance thereof to his honour and fatherly good-will, whereunto I will daily say, Amen. And further, I was refreshed by the expressing of your mindful friendship towards me, far unworthy thereof. Wherein I take occasion of much rejoicing in our so gracious a God and merciful Father, who as he hath in his immeasurable mercy by faith hand-fastened us his chosen children unto his dear Son our Christ, as the spiritual spouse of such a heavenly husband; so he linketh us by love one unto another, being by that bond compact together, with charitable readiness to do good one to another.

"My need concerning bodily necessities is as yet furnished by God's provision, so that I am not driven to any extremity, wherefore to be burdensome to you, as your gentle benevolence provoketh me; the Lord reward you therefore. If God make me worthy to be his witness at this present, in giving this corruptible body to burn for the testimony of his truth, it is enough for me to say to you, that I have a poor wife and child, whom I love in the Lord, and whom I know for my sake you will tender when I am departed hence, &c."

Another Letter to Mrs. Lucy Harrington.

"Grace and mercy, &c. It happeneth oftentimes that abundance of matter bringeth with it much vehemency of friendly affection, maketh men dumb, and even then chiefly, when there is most eager purpose of speaking, silence doth suppress, and causeth the party so affected unperfectly to express that he goeth about to utter. Many times faith is feeble, and then love loseth her savour. Pray we therefore, Lord increase our faith, and love forthwith will be on fire. And immortal thanks be given unto our God, who in our Christ hath bestowed upon us the first-fruits of his Spirit, who crieth in our hearts, Abba, Father. And as St. Paul saith, 'Seeing we have the same spirit of faith, according as it is written,—I believed, and therefore I have spoken; we also believe, and therefore we speak.' Yea, God knoweth, this spirit putteth in us a mind to speak, but in attempting thereof we are driven with Moses to say, O Lord, I am slow mouthed, and of uncircumcised lips; and with Jeremy, O Lord, I cannot speak.

"Albeit, that this infaney restraineth the opening of such abundance of heart in my tender Christian duty to be declared towards you, yet I beseech you, let this be settled in your understanding; that as St. Paul expresseth unto his Corinthians, that they were in his heart either to live or to die, with many other such sayings uttered unto them and the Galatians, expressing his vehement affection towards them:

so in some part I would be like affected towards all God's children, and especially towards you whom I know in Christ, and to whom I will not say how much I am indebted. I thank you for your great friendship and tender good-will towards my wife; yea, that good gracious God recompense you, which may worthily with the more countervail the same, and fulfil that which lacketh of thankful duty in us. And because of that which heretofore I have conceived of you, and of your more than natural love toward me and mine, I make myself thus bold to lay this burden upon you, even the care and charge of my said poor wife; I mean, to be unto her a mother and mistress, to rule and direct her by your discreet counsel. I know she conceiveth of you the same that I do, and is thankful unto God with me for such a friend; and therefore I beseech you, even for Christ's sake, put never from you this friendly charge over her, whether I live longer, or shortly depart. But to charge you otherwise, thanks be to God, neither I, neither she, have any such extreme need: if we had, I would be as bold with you as mine own mother. I beseech you give my hearty salutations unto Mr. Fitzwilliams, and my good lady, with thanks also for my poor wife and child; the Lord recompense them.

"L. SAUNDERS."

Another Letter to his Wife, with a certain remembrance to Mr. Harrington and Mr. Hurland.

"Grace and comfort, &c. Wife, you shall do best not to come often unto the grate, where the porter may see you. Put not yourself in danger where it needs not: you shall, I think, shortly come far enough into danger by keeping faith and a good conscience: which, dear wife, I trust you do not slack to make reckoning and account upon, by exercising your inward man in meditation of God's most holy word, being the sustenance of the soul, and also by giving yourself to humble prayer: for these two things be the very means how to be made members of our Christ, meet to inherit his kingdom.

"Do this, dear wife, in earnest, and not leaving off, and so we two shall, with our Christ and all his chosen children, enjoy the merry world in that everlasting immortality; whereas here will nothing else be found but extreme misery, even of them which most greedily seek this worldly wealth: and so, if we two continue God's children grafted in our Christ, the same God's blessing which we receive shall also settle upon our Sannet. Though we do shortly depart hence, and leave the poor infant (to our seeming) at all adventures, yet shall he have our gracious God to be his God: for so hath he said, and he cannot lie; I will be thy God, saith he, and the God of thy seed. Yea, if you leave him in the wilderness destitute of all help, being called of God to do his will, either to die for the confession of Christ, either any work of obedience; that God which heard the cry of the little poor infant of Hagar, Sarah's handmaiden, and did succour it, will do the like to the child of you, or any other fearing him, and putting your trust in him.

"And if we lack faith, as we do indeed many times, let us call for it, and we shall have the increase both of it, and also of any other good grace needful for us; and be merry in God, in whom also I am very merry and joyful. O Lord, what great cause of rejoicing have we, to think upon that kingdom, which he vouchsafed for his Christ's sake freely to give us, forsaking ourselves and following him! Dear wife, this is truly to follow him, even to take up our cross, and follow him; and then, as we suffer with him, so shall we reign with him everlastingly, shortly. Amen."

Another letter to his Wife, to Mr. R. Harrington, and Mr. Hurland, &c.

"Grace and comfort, &c. Dear wife, rejoice in our gracious God, and his and our Christ; and give thanks most humbly and heartily to him for this day's work, that in any part I, most unworthy wretch, should be made worthy to bear witness unto his everlasting verity, which Antichrist, with his, by main force, I perceive, and by most impudent pride and boasting, will go about to suppress. Remember God always, my dear wife, and so shall God's blessing light upon you and your Samuel. O remember always my words for Christ's sake, be merry, and grudge not against God, and pray, pray. We be all merry here, thanks be unto our God, who in his Christ hath given us great cause to be merry, by whom he hath prepared for us such a kingdom, and doth and will give unto us some little taste thereof, even in this life, and to all such as are desirous to take it. 'Blessed, (saith our Christ,) be they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for such shall be satisfied.' Let us go, yea, let us run, to seek such treasure, and that with whole purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord, to find such riches in his heavenly word through his Spirit obtained by prayer. My dear friends and brethren, Mr. Harrington and Mr. Hurland, pray, pray. 'The spirit is ready, but the flesh is weak.' When I look upon myself, being astonished and confounded, what have I else to say but these words of Peter, 'Lord, go from me, for I am a sinful man!' But then feel I that sweet comfort, 'The word of the Lord is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths;' and this is my comfort in my trouble. Then wax I bold with the same Peter to say, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life.' This comfort have I when the giver thereof doth give it. But I look for battles, which the root of unfaithfulness (the which I feel in me) will most eagerly give unto my conscience, when we come once to the combat. We be, I ween, within the sound of the trumpet of our enemies. Play, ye that be abroad, the part of Moses, 'praying in all places, lifting up pure hands;' and God's people shall prevail. Yea, our blood shall be their perdition who do most triumphantly spill it, and we then being in the hands of our God shall shine in his kingdom, and shall stand in great steadfastness against them which have dealt extremely with us; and when these our enemies shall thus see us, they shall be vexed with horrible fear, and shall wonder at the hastiness of the sudden health; and shall say with themselves, having inward sorrow and mourning for very anguish of mind, 'These are they whom we sometime had in derision, and jested upon: we fools thought their lives to be very madness, and their end to be without honour; but, lo, how they are accounted among the children of God!' The blessing of God be with you all, &c.

To his Wife, a little before he was burnt.

"Grace and comfort in Christ, Amen. Dear wife, be merry in the mercies of our Christ, and also ye my dear friends. Pray, pray for us, every body. We be shortly to be despatched hence unto our good Christ, Amen, Amen.—Wife, I would you sent me my shirt, which you know whereunto it is consecrated. Let it be sewed down on both sides, and not open. O my heavenly Father, look upon me in the face of thy Christ, or else I shall not be able to abide thy countenance, such is my filthiness. He will do so, and therefore I will not be afraid what sin, death, hell, and damnation, can do against me. O wife, always remember the Lord. God bless you; yea, he will bless thee, good wife, and thy poor boy also: only cleave thou unto him, and he will give thee all things. Pray, pray, pray.

Another Letter to Mr. Robert and John Glover, written the same morning that he was burnt.

"Grace and consolation in our sweet Saviour Christ. O my dear brethren, whom I love in the Lord, being loved of you also in the Lord, be merry and rejoice for me, now ready to go up to that mine inheritance, which I myself indeed am most unworthy of; but my dear Christ is worthy, who hath purchased the same for me with so dear a price. Make haste, my dear brethren, to come unto me, that we may be merry with that joy which no man shall take from us. O wretched sinner, that I am not thankful unto this my Father, who hath vouchsafed me worthy to be a vessel unto his honour. But, O Lord, now accept my thanks, though they proceed out of a not enough circumcised heart. Salute my good sisters, your wives; and good sisters, fear the Lord. Salute all other that love us in the truth. God's blessing be with you always, Amen. Even now towards the offering of a burnt sacrifice, O my Christ, help, or else I perish.

"LAURENCE SAUNDERS."

The Life and Martyrdom of JOHN HOOPER, Bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, who was burnt at Gloucester, February 9, 1555.

John Hooper, student and graduate in the university of Oxford, after the study of the sciences, wherein he had abundantly profited, through God's secret vocation was stirred with fervent desire to the love and knowledge of the scriptures. In the reading and searching whereof, as there lacked in him no diligence, joined with earnest prayer, so neither wanted unto him the grace of the Holy Ghost to satisfy his desire, and to open unto him the light of true divinity.

Thus Mr. Hooper growing more and more in ripeness of spiritual understanding, and shewing withal some sparkles of his fervent spirit in the time of king Henry VIII. fell soon under the displeasure of certain rabbies in Oxford, who began to stir up persecution against him, whereby, through the procurement of Dr. Smith, he was compelled to leave the university; and so removing from thence, was taken into the house of sir Thomas Arundel to be his steward, till the time that sir Thomas Arundel, (having intelligence of his opinions and religion, which he in no case did favour, and yet exceedingly favouring the person and conduct of the man,) found the means to send him on a message to the bishop of Winchester, writing his letter privately to the bishop, by conference of learning to do some good upon him, but in any case requiring him to send home his servant to him again.

Winchester, after long conference with Mr. Hooper four or five days together, when he at length perceived that neither he could do that good which he thought to him, nor that he would take any good at his hand, according to Mr. Arundel's request, he sent home his servant again, right well commending his learning and wit, but yet bearing in his breast a grudge against Mr. Hooper.

It followed not long after this, as malice is always working mischief, that intelligence was given to Mr. Hooper to provide for himself, for the danger that was working against him. Whereupon Mr. Hooper leaving Mr. Arundel's house, and borrowing a horse of a certain friend (whose life he had saved a little before from the gallows) took his journey to the sea-side to go to France, sending back the horse again by one, which indeed did not deliver him to the owner. Mr. Hooper being at Paris, tarried there not long, but in short time returned into England again, and was retained of Mr. Sendlow, till the time that he was again molested; whereby he was compelled, under the pretence of being a captain of a ship going to Ireland, to take the seas, and so escaped he, although not without extreme peril of drowning, through France to the higher parts of Germany. Where gathering acquaintance with learned men, was of them friendly and lovingly entertained, both at Basle and Zurich, especially by Mr. Bullinger, being his singular friend. Where also he married his wife, who was a Burgonian, and applied very studiously to the Hebrew tongue.

At length, when God saw it good to stay the bloody time of the Six Articles, and to give us king Edward to reign over this realm, with some peace and rest unto the gospel, amongst many other English exiles which then repaired homeward, Mr. Hooper also, moved in conscience, thought not to absent himself, but seeing such a time and opportunity, offered to help forward the Lord's work, to the uttermost of his ability. And so coming to Mr. Bullinger, and other of his acquaintance in Zurich, as duty required, to give them thanks for their singular kindness and humanity toward him manifold ways declared, with like humanity again purposed to take his leave of them at his departing; and so did. Unto whom Mr. Bullinger again spake on this wise: Mr. Hooper, although we are sorry to part with your company for our own cause, yet much greater cause we have to rejoice, both for your sake, and especially for the cause of Christ's true religion, that you shall now return out of long banishment into your native country again, where not only you may enjoy your own private liberty, but also the cause and state of Christ's church by you may fare the better, as we doubt not but it shall. And if you will please not to forget us again, then I pray you let us hear from you.

Whereunto Mr. Hooper answering again, first gave to Mr. Bullinger and the rest hearty thanks, for that their singular good-will and undeserved affection. And added, You shall be sure from time to time to hear from me; and I will write unto you how it goeth with me. But the last news of all I shall not be able to write: for there (said he,) taking Mr. Bullinger by the hand, where I shall take most pains, there shall you hear of me to be burned to ashes; and that shall be the last news, which I shall not be able to write unto you, but you shall hear of me, &c.

To this also may be added another like prophetic demonstration, foreshewing before the manner of this martyrdom wherewith he should glorify God, which was this:—When Mr. Hooper, being made bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, should have his arms given him by the herald, as the manner is here in England, every bishop to have his arms assigned unto him, whether by the appointment of Mr. Hooper, or by the herald, I have not certainly to say; but the arms which were to him allotted was this: A lamb in a fiery bush, and the sun-beams from heaven descending down upon the lamb; rightly denoting, as it seemed, the order of his suffering which afterward followed.

When Mr. Hooper had taken his farewell of Mr. Bullinger and his friends in Zurich, he came again into England in the reign of king Edward the Sixth, and coming to London, he used continually to preach, most times twice, at least once, every day, and never failed.

In his sermons, according to his accustomed manner, he corrected sin, and sharply inveighed again the iniquity of the world, and corrupt abuses of the church : the people in great flocks and companies daily came to hear his voice, as the most melodious sound and tune of Orphens's harp, as the proverb saith ; inso much, that oftentimes when he was preaching, the church would be so full, that many could enter no further than the doors thereof. In his doctrine he was earnest, in tongue eloquent, in the scriptures perfect, and in pains indefatigable.

Moreover, besides his other gifts and qualities, this is in him to be marvelled, that even as he began, so he continued still unto his life's end ; for neither could his labour and pains-taking break him, neither promotion change him, neither dainty fare corrupt him. His life was so pure and good, that no kind of slander could fasten any fault upon him, though there wanted not enemies. He was of body strong, his health whole and sound, his wit very pregnant, his invincible patience able to sustain whatsoever sinister fortune and adversity could do. He was constant of judgment, a good justice, spare of diet, sparer of words, and sparest of time. In housekeeping very liberal, and sometimes more free than his living could extend unto. Briefly, of all those virtues and qualities, required by St. Paul in a good bishop, in his epistles to Timothy, I know not one in this good bishop lacking. He bare in countenance and talk always a certain severe and grave grace, which might peradventure be wished sometime to have been a little more popular and vulgar-like in him ; but he knew what he had to do best himself.

This by the way I thought to note, for that there was once an honest citizen, and to me not unknown, which having in himself a certain conflict of conscience, came to his door for counsel ; but being abashed at his austere behaviour, durst not come in, but departed, seeking remedy of his troubled mind at other men's hands, which he afterwards by the help of Almighty God did find and obtain. Therefore, in my judgment, such as are appointed and made governors over the flock of Christ, to teach and instruct them, ought so to frame their life, manners, countenance, and external behaviour, as neither they shew themselves too familiar and light, whereby to be brought into contempt, nor on the other side again that they appear more lofty and rigorous than appertaineth to the edifying of the simple flock of Christ. Nevertheless, as every man hath his peculiar gift wrought in him by nature, so this disposition of fatherly gravity in this man neither was excessive, neither did he bear that personage that was in him without great consideration. For it seemed to him, peradventure, that this licentious and unbridled life of the common sort ought to be chastened, not only with words and discipline, but also with the grave and severe countenance of good men.

After he had thus practised himself in this popular and common kind of preaching, at length, and that not without the great profit of many, he was called to preach before the king's majesty, and soon after made bishop of Gloucester by the king's commandment. In that office he continued two years, and behaved himself so well, that his very enemies could find no fault with him ; and after that, he was made bishop of Worcester.

But I cannot tell what sinister and unlucky contention concerning the ordering and consecration of bishops, and of their apparel, with such other like trifles, began to disturb the good and lucky beginning of the godly bishop : for notwithstanding that godly reformation of religion that began in the church of England, besides other ceremonies, more ambitious than profitable or tending to edification, they used to wear such garments and apparel as the popish bishops were went to do : first, a chymere, and under that a white rochet, then a mathematical cap with four angles, dividing the whole world into four parts. These trifles, tending more to superstition than otherwise, as he could never abide, so in no wise could he be persuaded to wear them. And for this cause he made supplication to the king's majesty, most humbly desiring his highness either to discharge him of the bishopric, or else to dispense with him for such ceremonial orders. Whose petition the king granted immediately, writing his letter to the archbishop.—

“ Right reverend father, and right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we, by the advice of our council, have called and chosen our right well-beloved and well worthy Mr. John Hooper, professor of divinity, to be our bishop of Gloucester, as well for his great knowledge, deep judgment, and long study, both in the scriptures and profane learning, as also for his good discretion, ready utterance, and honest life, for that kind of vocation : To the intent all our loving subjects, which are in his said charge, and elsewhere, might by his sound and true doctrine learn the better their duty towards God, their obedience towards us, and love towards their neighbours ; from consecrating of whom we understand you to stay, because he would have you omit and let pass certain rites and ceremonies offensive to his conscience, whereby ye think ye should fall into premunire of laws : we have thought good, by the advice aforesaid, to dispense and discharge you of all manner of dangers, penalties, and forfeitures, you shall run, and be in any manner of way, by omitting any of the same. And these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge therefore.

An. Wingfield,
N. Wooton.”

Besides this letter of the king, also the earl of Warwick (who was afterwards duke of Northumberland) adjoined his letter to the aforesaid archbishop of Canterbury, to this purpose and effect, that Mr. Hooper might not be hardened with the oath used then commonly in the consecration of bishops, which was against his conscience, as by the purport of the letter here is to be seen, as followeth :

“ After my most hearty commendations to your grace, these may be to desire the same, that in such reasonable things, wherein this bearer, my lord elect of Gloucester, craveth to be borne withal at your hands, you would vouchsafe to shew him your grace's favour the rather at this my instance : which thing partly I have taken in hand by the king's majesty's own motion. The matter is weighed by his highness, none other but that your grace may easily condescend unto. The principal cause is, that you would not charge this said bearer with an oath burdensome to his conscience.—And so, for lack of time, I commit your grace to the tuition of Almighty God. From Westminster, the 23d of July, 1550.

“ Your grace's most assured loving friend,

“ J. WARWICK.”

Both this grant of the king, and also the earl's letters aforesaid, notwithstanding, the bishops still stood earnestly in defence of the aforesaid ceremonies ; saying, it was but a small matter, and that the fault was in the abuse of the things, and not in the things themselves ; adding, moreover, that he ought not to be so stubborn in so light a matter, and that his wilfulness therein was not to be suffered.

To be short,—whilst both parties thus contended about this matter more than reason would, in the mean time occasion was given, as to the true Christians to lament, so to the adversaries to rejoice. In conclusion, this theological contention came to this end, that the bishops having the upper hand, Mr. Hooper was fain to agree to this condition, that sometimes he should in his sermon shew himself apparelled as the other bishops were. Wherefore, appointed to preach before the king, as a new player in a strange apparel, he cometh forth on the stage. His upper garment was a long scarlet chymere down to the foot, and under that a white linen rochet that covered all his shoulders; upon his head he had a geometrical, that is, a four-squared cap, albeit that his head was round. What cause of shame the strangeness hereof was that day to that good preacher, every man may easily judge. But this private contumely and reproach, in respect of the public profit of the church, which he only sought, he bare and suffered patiently. And I would to God in like manner they which took upon them the other part of that tragedy had yielded their private cause, whatsoever it was, to the public concord and edifying of the church: for no man in all the city was one hair the better for that hot contention.

And thus by the way thou hast heard, good reader, hitherto the weakness of these good men, plainly and simply, as the truth was, declared unto thee, to the end their fall may minister occasion to us, either of eschewing the like, or else to take heart and comfort in the like fall and frailness of ours. Now again on the other part it remaineth to record, after the aforesaid discord, the godly reconciliations of these good men in time of persecution, who afterward being in prison for the truth's sake, reconciled themselves again with most godly agreement.

Mr. Hooper, after all these tumults and vexations sustained about his investing and princely vestures, at length entering into his diocese, did there employ his time which the Lord lent him under king Edward's reign, with such diligence, as may be a spectacle to all bishops which shall ever hereafter succeed him, not only in that place, but in whatsoever diocese through the whole realm of England; so careful was he in his cure, that he left neither pains untaken nor ways unsought how to train up the flock of Christ in the true word of salvation, continually labouring in the same. Other men commonly are wont, for lucre or promotion's sake, to aspire to bishoprics, some hunting for them, and some purchasing or buying them, as men use to purchase lordships, and when they have them are loath to leave them, and thereupon also loath to commit that thing by worldly laws whereby to lose them.

To this sort of men Mr. Hooper was quite contrary, who abhorred nothing more than gain, labouring always to save and preserve the souls of his flock; who being bishop of two dioceses, so ruled and guided either of them, and both together, as though he had in charge but one family. No father in his household, no gardener in his garden, no husbandman in his vineyard, was more or better occupied than he in his diocese amongst his flock, going about his towns and villages in teaching and preaching to the people there.

That time that he had to spare from preaching, he bestowed either in hearing public causes, or else in private study, prayer, and visiting of schools: with his continual doctrine he adjoined due and discreet correction, not so much severe to any, as to them which for abundance of riches and wealthy state thought they might do what they listed. And doubtless in his exhortations he spared no kind of people, but was indifferent to all men, as well rich as poor, to the great shame of no small number of men now-a-days. Whereof many we see so addicted to the pleasing of great and rich men, that in the mean time they have no regard to the meaner sort of poor people, whom Christ hath bought as dearly as the other.

His life in fine was such, that to the church and to all churchmen it might be a light and example, and to others a perpetual lesson and sermon. Finally, how virtuous and good a bishop he was, ye may conceive and know evidently by this: that even as he that was hated of none but of them which were evil, so yet the worst of them all could not reprove his life in any one jot.

I have now declared his usage and behaviour abroad in the public affairs of the church: and certainly there appeared in him at home no less example of a worthy prelate's life. For though he bestowed the most part of his care upon the public flock and congregation of Christ, for the which also he spent his blood; yet nevertheless there lacked no provision in him to bring up his own children in learning and good manners; insomuch, that ye could not discern whether he deserved more praise for his fatherly usage at home, or for his bishop-like doings abroad; for every where he kept one religion in one uniform doctrine and integrity. So that if you entered into the bishop's palace, you would suppose yourself to have entered into some church or temple. In every corner thereof there was some savour of virtue, good example, honest conversation, and reading of the holy scriptures. There was not to be seen in his house any courtly rioting or idleness; no pomp at all, no dishonest word, no swearing, could there be heard.

As for the revenues of both his bishoprics, although they did not greatly exceed, as the matter was handled, yet if any thing surmounted thereof, he pursed nothing, but bestowed it in hospitality. Twice I was, as I remembered, in his house at Worcester, where in his common hall I saw a table spread with good store of meat, and beset full of beggars and poor folks; and I asking his servants what this meant? they told me, that every day their master's manner was to have to dinner a certain number of poor folk of the said city by course, who were served by four at a mess with wholesome meats; and when they were served (being before examined by him, or his deputies, of the Lord's Prayer, the Articles of their Faith, and Ten Commandments,) then himself sat down to dinner, and not before.

After this manner Mr. Hooper executed the office of a most careful and vigilant pastor for the space of two years and more, so long as the state of religion in king Edward's time did safely flourish. And would God that all other bishops would use the like diligence, care, and observance, in their function! After this, king Edward being dead, and Mary being crowned queen of England, religion being subverted, this good bishop was one of the first that was sent for by a pursuivant, to be at London; and that for two causes:

First, To answer to Dr. Heath, then appointed bishop of that diocese, who was before in king Edward's days deprived thereof for Papistry.

Secondarily, To render account to Dr. Bonner, bishop of London, for that he in king Edward's time was one of his accusers, in that he shewed himself not conformable to such ordinances as were prescribed to him by the king and his council, openly at Paul's cross. And although the said Mr. Hooper was not ignorant of the evils that should happen to him, (for he was admonished by certain of his friends to get away and shift for himself,) yet he would not, but tarried still, saying, "Once I did flee, and take me to my feet; but now, because I am called to this place and vocation, I am thoroughly persuaded to tarry, and to live and die with my sheep."

And when, at the day of his appearance, which was the first of September, he came to London, before he could come to the aforesaid Dr. Heath and Bonner, he was intercepted, and commanded violently against his will to appear before the queen and her council, to answer to certain bonds and obligations wherein, they said, he was bound unto her. And when he came before them, Winchester by and by received him very opprobriously, and, railing and rating of him, accused him of false religion. He again freely and boldly told his tale, and purged himself. But in fine it came to this conclusion, that by them he was commanded to ward; it being declared unto him at his departure, that the cause of his imprisonment was only for certain sums of money which he was indebted to the queen, and not for religion. This, how false and untrue it was, shall in its place more plainly appear.

The next year, being 1554, the 19th of March, he was called again to appear before Winchester, and other of the queen's commissioners; where, what for the bishop, and what for the unruly multitude, when he could not be permitted to plead his cause, he was deprived of his bishopric, as, indeed, had been before determined.

At this meeting, the bishops of Winchester, London, Durham, Llandaff, and Chichester, sat as commissioners.

At Mr. Hooper's coming in, the lord chancellor asked, whether he was married?

Hooper. Yea, my lord, and will not be unmarried till death unmarry me.

Durham. That is matter enough to deprive you.

Hooper. That is not, my lord, except ye act plainly against the law.

The matter concerning marriage was no more talked of then for a great space; but as well the commissioner, as such as stood by, began to make such outcries, and laughed, and used such gesture, as was unseemly for the place, and for such a matter. The bishop of Chichester, Dr. Day, called Mr. Hooper hypocrite, with vehement words and scornful countenance. Bishop Tonsal called him beast; so did Smith, one of the clerks of the council, and divers others that stood by. At length the bishop of Winchester said, That all men might live chaste that would; and brought in this text, "There be that have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven," Matt. xix.

Mr. Hooper said, That text proved not that all men could live chaste, but such only to whom it was given; and read that which goeth before in the text. But there was a clamour and cry, mocking and scorning, with calling him beast, that the text could not be examined.

After long and brutish talk, Tonsal, bishop of Durham, asked Mr. Hooper, whether he believed the corporal presence in the sacrament? And Mr. Hooper said plainly, that there was none such presence, neither did he believe any such thing.

Mr. Hooper would have said more to have opened the text, but all men that stood next about the bishop interrupted so his words with clamours and cries, that Mr. Hooper was not permitted to say any more against the bishop. Whereupon they bade the notaries write that he was married, and said that he would not go from his wife, and that he believed not the corporal presence in the sacrament; wherefore he was worthy to be deprived of his bishopric.

The true Report of Mr. Hooper's Entertainment in the Fleet, written with his own hand the 7th of January, 1554.

The first of September, 1553, I was committed unto the Fleet from Richmond, to have the liberty of the prison; and within six days after I paid for my liberty five pounds sterling to the warden, for fees: who, immediately upon the payment thereof, complained unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and so was I committed to close prison one quarter of a year, in the tower-chamber of the Fleet, and used very ill. Then, by the means of a good gentlewoman, I had liberty to come down to dinner and supper, but not suffered to speak with any of my friends; but, as soon as dinner and supper was done, to repair to my chamber again. Notwithstanding, whilst I came down thus to dinner and supper, the warden and his wife picked quarrels with me, and complained untruly of me to their great friend the bishop of Winchester.

After one quarter of a year, and somewhat more, Babington, the warden, and his wife, fell out with me for the wicked mass: and thereupon the warden went to the bishop of Winchester, and got me put into the wards, where I have continued a long time, having nothing appointed to me for my bed but a little pad of straw, and a rotten covering, with a tick and a few feathers therein, the chamber being vile and stinking, until by God's means good people sent me bedding to lie in. On the one side of which prison is the sink and filth of the house, and on the other side the town ditch, so that the stench of the house hath infected me with sundry diseases.

During which time I have been sick, and the doors, bars, hasps, and chains, being all closed and made fast upon me, I have mourned, called, and cried for help; but the warden, when he hath known me many times ready to die, and when the poor men of the wards have called to help me, hath commanded the doors to be kept fast, and charged that none of his men should come at me, saying, "Let him alone, it were a good riddance of him."

I paid always like a baron to the said warden, as well in fees as for my board, which was twenty shillings a week, besides my man's table, until I was wrongfully deprived of my bishopric, and since that time I have paid him as the best gentleman doth in his house; yet hath he used me worse and more vilely than the veriest slave that ever came to the hall commons.

The said warden hath also imprisoned my man, William Downton, and stripped him out of his clothes to search for letters, and could find none, but only a little remembrance of good people's names that gave me their alms to relieve me in prison; and to undo them also, the warden delivered the same bill unto the said Stephen Gardiner, God's enemy and mine.

I have suffered imprisonment almost eighteen months, my goods, living, friends, and comfort, taken from me; the queen owing me by just account eighty pounds or more. She hath put me in prison, and giveth nothing to find me, neither is there suffered any one to come at me whereby I might have relief. I am with a wicked man and woman, so that I see no remedy, saving God's help, but I shall be cast away in prison before I come to judgment. But I commit my just cause to God, whose will be done, whether it be by life or death.

Another Examination of Mr. Hooper.

The 22d of January following, 1555, Babington, the warden of the Fleet, was commanded to bring Mr. Hooper before the bishop of Winchester, with other bishops and commissioners, at the said Winchester's house at St. Mary Overy's.

The bishop of Winchester, in the name of himself and the rest, moved Mr. Hooper earnestly to forsake the evil and corrupt doctrine, as he termed it, preached in the days of king Edward VI. and to return to the unity of the Catholic church, and to acknowledge the pope's holiness to be head of the same church, according to the determination of the whole parliament; promising, that as he himself, with other his brethren, had received the pope's blessing and the queen's mercy, even so mercy was ready to be shewn to him and others, if he would arise with them, and condescend to the pope's holiness.

Mr. Hooper answered, That forasmuch as the pope taught doctrine altogether contrary to the doctrine of Christ, he was not worthy to be accounted as a member of Christ's church, much less to be a head thereof; wherefore he would in no wise condescend to any such usurped jurisdiction, neither esteemed he the church, wherof they called him head, to be the Catholic church of Christ: for the church only heareth the voice of her spouse Christ, and flieth the strangers. Howbeit, (said he,) if in any point (to me unknown) I have offended the queen's majesty, I shall most humbly submit myself to her mercy, if mercy may be had with safety of conscience, and without the displeasure of God.

Answer was made, That the queen would shew no mercy to the pope's enemies.

Whereupon Babington was commanded to take him to the Fleet again; who did so, and shifted him from his former chamber into another, near unto the warden's own chamber, where he remained six days; and in the mean time his former chamber was searched by Dr. Martin and others, for writings and books, which Mr. Hooper was thought to have made; but none was found.

The 28th of January, Winchester and other the commissioners sat in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, where Mr. Hooper appeared before them at afternoon again, and there, after much reasoning and disputation to and fro, he was commanded aside till Mr. Rogers, who was then come, had been likewise examined.

Examinations being ended, the two sheriffs of London were commanded, about four of the clock, to carry them to the Compter in Southwark, there to remain till the morrow at nine o'clock, to see whether they would relent, and come home again to the Catholic church. So Mr. Hooper went before with one of the sheriffs, and Mr. Rogers came after with the other; and being out of the church door, Mr. Hooper looked back, and stayed a little till Mr. Rogers drew near: unto whom he said, Come, brother Rogers, must we two take this matter first in hand, and begin to fry these faggots? Yea, sir, said Mr. Rogers, by God's grace. Doubt not, said Mr. Hooper, but God will give strength. So going forward, there was such a press of people which rejoiced at their constancy, that they had much ado to pass.

By the way the sheriff said to Mr. Hooper, I wonder that ye were so hasty and quick with my lord chancellor, and did use no more patience. He answered, I was nothing at all impatient, although I was earnest in my Master's cause, and it standeth me so in hand; for it goeth upon life and death, not the life and death of this world only, but also of the world to come. Then were they committed to the keeper of the Compter, and appointed to several chambers, with commandment that they should not be suffered to speak one with another, neither yet any other permitted to come at them that night.

Upon the next day following, the 29th of January, at the hour appointed, they were brought again by the sheriffs before the said bishop and commissioners, in the church where they were the day before. And after long and earnest talk, when they perceived that Mr. Hooper would by no means condescend unto them, they condemned him to be degraded, and read unto him his condemnation. That done, Mr. Rogers was brought before them, and in like manner treated; and so they delivered both of them to the secular power, the two sheriffs of London, who were willed to carry them to the Clink, a prison not far from the bishop of Winchester's house, and there to remain till night.

When it was dark, Mr. Hooper was led by one of the sheriffs, with many bills and weapons, first through the bishop of Winchester's house, and so over London-bridge through the city to Newgate. And by the way some of the sergeants were willed to go before, and put out the costermongers' candles, who use to sit with lights in the streets: either fearing, of likelihood, that the people would have made some attempt to have taken him away from them by force, if they had seen him go to that prison; or else, being burdened with an evil conscience, they thought darkness to be a most fit season for such a business.

But notwithstanding this device, the people having some foreknowledge of his coming, many of them came forth of their doors with lights, and saluted him, praising God for his constancy in the true doctrine which he had taught them, and desiring God to strengthen him in the same to the end: Mr. Hooper passed by, and required the people to make their earnest prayer to God for him, and so went through Cheapside to the place appointed, and was delivered as close prisoner to the keeper of Newgate, where he remained six days, nobody being permitted to come to or talk with him, saving his keepers and others appointed thereto.

During this time, Bonner, bishop of London, and other at his appointment, as Fecknam, Chedsey, and Harpsfield, &c. resorted divers times unto him, to try if by any means they could persuade him to relent, and become a member of their antichristian church. All the ways they could devise, they attempted: for, besides the disputations and allegations of testimonies of the scriptures, and of ancient writers, wrested to a wrong sense, according to their accustomed manner, they used also all outward gentleness and significations of friendship, with many great proffers and promises of worldly commodities, not omitting also most grievous threatenings, if with gentleness they could not prevail; but they found him always the same man, steadfast and immovable.

When they perceived that they could by no means reclaim him to their purpose with such persuasions and offers as they used for his conversion, then went they about by false rumours and reports of recantation, (for it is well known that they and their servants did spread it first abroad,) to bring him, and the doctrine of Christ which he professed, out of credit with the people. So the noise being a little spread abroad, and believed of some of the weaker sort, by reason of the frequent resort of the bishop of London and others, it increased more, and at the last came to Mr. Hooper's ears. Wherewith he was not a little grieved, that the people should give so light credit unto false rumours, having so simple a ground; as may appear by the following letter.

A Letter of Mr. Hooper, for the stopping of certain false Rumours spread abroad, of his Recantation.

"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all them that unfeignedly look for the coming of our Saviour Christ. Amen.

"Dear brethren and sisters in the Lord, and my fellow-prisoners for the cause of God's gospel, I do much rejoice and give thanks unto God for your constancy and perseverance in affliction, unto whom I wish continuance unto the end. And as I do rejoice in your faith and constancy in afflictions that be in prison, even so do I mourn and lament to hear of our dear brethren that yet have not felt such dangers for God's truth as we have, and do feel, and be daily like to suffer more, yea, the very extreme and vile death of the fire. Yet such is the report abroad, as I am credibly informed, that I, John Hooper, a condemned man for the cause of Christ, should now after sentence of death, (being in Newgate prisoner, and looking daily for execution,) recant and abjure that which heretofore I have preached. And this talk ariseth of this, that the bishop of London and his chaplains resort unto me. Doubtless, if our brethren were as godly as I could wish them, they would think, that in ease I did refuse to talk with them, they might have just occasion to say that I were unlearned, and durst not speak with learned men; or else proud, and disdained to speak with them. Therefore, to avoid just suspicion of both, I have and do daily speak with them when they come, not doubting but that they report that I am neither proud nor unlearned. And I would wish all men to do as I do in this point. For I fear not their arguments, neither is death terrible unto me, praying you to make true report of the same, as occasion shall serve; and that I am more confirmed in the truth which I have preached heretofore, by their coming.

"Therefore, ye that may send to the weak brethren, pray them that they trouble me not with such reports of recantations as they do. For I have hitherto left all things of the world, and suffered great pains and imprisonment, and I thank God I am as ready to suffer death as a mortal man may be. It were better for them to pray for us, than to credit or report such rumours that be untrue. We have enemies enow of such as know not God truly. But yet the false report of weak brethren is a double cross. I wish you eternal salvation in Jesus Christ, and also require your continual prayers, that he which hath begun a good work in us, may continue in it to the end.

"I have taught the truth with my tongue, and with my pen, heretofore; and hereafter shortly shall confirm the same, by God's grace, with my blood. Forth of Newgate the second of February, anno 1554.

"Your brother in Christ,

"JOHN HOOPER."

After the sentence of degradation thus declared, now let us see the form and manner of their degrading, which here also followeth.—But first here is to be noted, that they degrading this blessed bishop, did not proceed against him as a bishop, but as only against a priest, as they termed him; for such as he was, these Balaamites accounted for no bishop.

Here followeth the Form and Manner used in the Degrading of Bishop Hooper.

The fourth of February, the year above-mentioned, in the chapel of Newgate, the bishop of London there sitting with his notary and certain other witnesses, came Alexander Andrew, the gaoler, bringing with him Mr. Hooper and Mr. Rogers, being condemned before by the chancellor; where the said bishop of London, at the request of the aforesaid Winchester, proceeded to the degradation of the parties above-mentioned, Mr. Hooper and Mr. Rogers, after this form and manner: First, he put upon him all the vestures and ornaments belonging to a priest, with all other things to the same order appertaining, as though (being re-vested) they should solemnly execute their office. Thus they being apparelled and re-vested, the bishop beginneth to pluck off, first the uttermost vesture, and so by degree and order coming down to the lowest vesture, which they had only in taking benet and collet; and so being stript and deposed, he deprived them of all order, benefit, and privilege, belonging to the clergy: and consequently that being done, pronounced, decreed, and declared, the said parties so degraded to be given personally to the secular power, as the sheriff's being for that year, Mr. David Woodroffe and Mr. William Chester; who receiving first the said Mr. Rogers at the hands of the bishop, had him away with them.

The same Monday at night, being the fourth of February, his keeper gave him an inkling that he should be sent to Gloucester to suffer death; whereat he rejoiced very much, lifting up his eyes and hands unto heaven, and praising God, that he saw it good to send him among the people over whom he was pastor, there to confirm with his death the truth which he had before taught them; not doubting but the Lord would give him strength to perform the same to his glory. And immediately he sent to his servant's house for his boots, spurs, and cloak, that he might be in readiness to ride when he should be called.

The next day following, about four of the clock, before day, the keeper with others came to him and searched him, and the bed wherein he lay, to see if he had written any thing; and then he was led by the sheriffs of London and other their officers forth of Newgate, to a place appointed, not far from St. Dunstan's church in Fleet-street, where six of the queen's guard were appointed to receive him, and to carry him to Gloucester, there to be delivered unto the sheriffs, who, with the lord Shandois, Mr. Wicks, and other commissioners, were appointed to see execution done. The which guard brought him to the Angel, where he brake his fast with them, eating his meat at that time more liberally than he had used to do a good while before. About the break of the day he went to horse, and leapt cheerfully on horseback without help, having a hood upon his head under his hat, that he should not be known; and so he took his journey joyfully towards Gloucester, and always by the way the guard learned of him where he was accustomed to bait or lodge, and ever carried him to another inn.

Upon the Thursday following, he came to a town in his diocese, called Cirencester, fifteen miles from Gloucester, about eleven of the clock, and there dined at a woman's house which had always hated the truth, and spoken all evil she could of Mr. Hooper. This woman, perceiving the cause of his coming, shewed him all the friendship she could, and lamented his case with tears, confessing that she before had often reported, that if he were put to the trial he would not stand to his doctrine.

After dinner he rode forwards, and came to Gloucester about five of the clock, and a mile without the town was much people assembled, who cried and lamented his estate; insomuch, that one of the guard rode post into the town, to require aid of the mayor and sheriffs, fearing lest he should be taken from them. The officers and their retinue repaired to the gate with weapons, and commanded the people to keep their houses, &c. but there was no man that once gave any signification of any such rescue or violence. So was he lodged at one Ingram's house in Gloucester; and that night, as he had done all the way, he did eat his meat quietly, and slept his first sleep soundly, as it was reported by them of the guard and others. After this first sleep he continued all that night in prayer until the morning, and then he desired that he might go into the next chamber, (for the guard were also in the chamber where he lay,) that there being solitary, he might pray and talk with God: so that all the day, saving a little at meat, and when he talked at any time with such as the guard licensed to speak with him, he spent in prayer.

Amongst others that spake with him, Sir Anthony Kingston, knight, was one. Who seeming in times past his very friend, was then appointed by the queen's letters to be one of the commissioners to see execution done upon him. Mr. Kingston being brought into the chamber, found him at his prayers; and as soon as he saw Mr. Hooper, he burst forth in tears. Mr. Hooper at the first blush knew him not. Then said Mr. Kingston, Why, my lord, do you not know me, an old friend of your's, Anthony Kingston?

Yes, Mr. Kingston, I do now know you well, and am glad to see you in health, and do praise God for the same.

But I am sorry to see you, said Sir Anthony, in this case; for, as I understand, you be come hither to die. But, alas! consider that life is sweet, and death is bitter: therefore, seeing life may be had, desire to live, for life hereafter may do good.

Indeed it is true, Mr. Kingston, I am come hither to end this life, and to suffer death here, because I will not gainsay the former truth that I have heretofore taught amongst you in this diocese and elsewhere; and I thank you for your friendly counsel, although it be not so friendly as I could have wished it. True it is, Mr. Kingston, that death is bitter, and life is sweet: but, alas! consider that the death to come is more bitter, and the life to come is more sweet. Therefore, for the desire and love I have to the one, and the terror and fear of the other, I do not so much regard this death, nor esteem this life, but have settled myself, through the strength of God's holy Spirit, patiently to pass through the torments and extremities of the fire now prepared for me, rather than to deny the truth of his word; desiring you and others, in the mean time, to commend me to God's mercy in your prayers.

Well, my lord, then I perceive there is no remedy, and therefore I will take my leave of you. And I thank God that ever I knew you, for God did appoint you to call me, being a lost child; and by your good instructions, where before I was an adulterer and a fornicator, God hath brought me to the forsaking and detesting of the same.

If you have had the grace so to do, I do highly praise God for it; and if you have not, I pray God ye may have, and that you may continually live in his fear.

After these and many other words, the one took leave of the other, Mr. Kingston with bitter tears, Mr. Hooper with tears also trickling down his cheeks. At which departure Mr. Hooper told him, that all the troubles he had sustained in prison had not caused him to utter so much sorrow.

The same day in the afternoon, a blind boy, after long intercession made to the guard, obtained license to be brought unto Mr. Hooper. The same boy not long afore had suffered imprisonment at Gloucester for confessing of the truth. Mr. Hooper, after he had examined him of his faith, and the cause of his imprisonment, beheld him steadfastly, and (the water appearing in his eyes) said unto him, Ah, poor boy, God hath taken from thee thy outward sight, for what reason he best knoweth; but he hath given thee another sight much more precious, for he hath endued thy soul with the eye of knowledge and faith. God give thee grace continually to pray unto him, that thou lose not that sight, for then shouldest thou be blind both in body and soul.

After that, another came to him, (whom he knew to be a very Papist, and a wicked man,) who appeared to be sorry for Mr. Hooper's trouble, saying, Sir, I am sorry to see you thus.—To see me! Why (said he) art thou sorry?—To see you, saith the other, in this ease; for I hear say you are come hither to die, for the which I am sorry.—Be sorry for thyself, man, said Mr. H. and lament thine own wickedness; for I am well, I thank God, and death to me for Christ's sake is welcome.

The same night he was committed by the guard (their commission being then expired) unto the custody of the sheriffs of Gloucester. The name of the one was Jenkins, the other Bond, who with the mayor and aldermen repaired to Mr. Hooper's lodging, and at the first meeting saluted him, and took him by the hand. Unto whom Hooper spake on this manner:—Mr. Mayor, I give most hearty thanks to you, and to the rest of your brethren, that you have vouchsafed to take me, a prisoner and a condemned man, by the hand; whereby to my rejoicing it is some deal apparent, that your old love and friendship towards me is not altogether extinguished; and I trust also, that all the things I have taught you in times past are not utterly forgotten, when I was here, by the godly king that is dead, appointed to be your bishop and pastor. For the which most true and sincere doctrine, because I will not now account it falsehood and heresy, as many other men do, I am sent hither (as I am sure you know) by the queen's commandment, to die, and am come where I taught it, to confirm it with my blood. And now, Mr. Sheriffs, I understand by these good men, and my very friends, (meaning the guard,) at whose hands I have found so much favour and gentleness by the way hitherward, as a prisoner could reasonably require, (for the which also I most heartily thank them,) that I am committed to your custody, as unto them that must see me brought to-morrow to the place of execution. My request therefore to you shall be only, that there may be a quick fire, shortly to make an end; and in the mean time I will be as obedient unto you as yourselves would wish. If you think I do amiss in any thing, hold up your finger, and I have done. For I am not hither as one enforced or compelled to die: for it is well known I might have had my life, with worldly gain; but as one willing to offer and give my life for the truth, rather than to consent to the wicked papistical religion of the bishop of Rome, received and set forth by the magistrates of England, to God's high displeasure and dishonour; and I trust by God's grace to-morrow to die a faithful servant of God, and a true obedient subject to the queen.

These and such like words used Mr. H. to the mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen, whereat many of them mourned and lamented. Notwithstanding, the two sheriffs went aside to consult, and were determined to have lodged him in the common gaol of the town, called Northgate, if the guard had not made earnest intercession for him; who declared at large how quietly, mildly, and patiently, he had behaved himself in the way; adding thereto, that any child might keep him well enough, and that they themselves would rather take pains to watch with him, than that he should be sent to the common prison. So it was determined at length he should still remain in Robert Ingram's house; and the sheriffs, and the sergeants, and other officers, did appoint to watch with him that night themselves.

His desire was, that he might go to bed that night betimes, saying, that he had many things to remember: and so he did at five of the clock, and slept one sleep soundly, and bestowed the rest of the night in prayer. After he got up in the morning, he desired that no man should be suffered to come into the chamber, that he might be solitary till the hour of execution.

About eight of the clock came sir John Bridges, lord Shandois, with a great band of men, sir Anthony Kingston, sir Edmund Bridges, and other commissioners, appointed to see execution done. At nine of the clock, Mr. Hooper was willed to prepare himself to be in readiness, for the time was at hand.

Immediately he was brought down from his chamber by the sheriffs, who were accompanied with bills, gleaves, and weapons. When he saw the multitude of weapons, he spake to the sheriffs on this wise: Mr. Sheriffs, said he, I am no traitor, neither needed you to have made such a business to bring me to the place where I must suffer: for if ye had willed me, I would have gone alone to the stake, and have troubled none of you all. Afterward looking upon the multitude of people that were assembled, (being by estimation to the number of 7000, for it was market-day, and many also came to see his behaviour towards death,) he spake unto those that were about him, saying, Alas! why be these people assembled and come together? Peradventure they think to hear something of me now, as they have in times past; but, alas! speech is prohibited me. Notwithstanding, the cause of my death is well known unto them: when I was appointed here to be their pastor, I preached unto them true and sincere doctrine, and that out of the word of God: because I will not now account the same to be heresy and untruth, this kind of death is prepared for me.

So he went forward, led between the two sheriffs, as it were a lamb to the place of slaughter, in a gown of his host's, his hat upon his head, and a staff in his hand to stay himself withal; for the grief of the sciatica, which he had taken in prison, cased him somewhat to halt. All the way (being straitly charged not to speak) he could not be perceived once to open his mouth; but beholding the people all the way, which mourned bitterly for him, he would sometimes lift up his eyes towards heaven, and look very cheerfully upon such as he knew: and he was never known, during the time of his being amongst them, to look with so cheerful and ruddy a countenance as he did at that present.

When he came to the place appointed where he should die, smilingly he beheld the stake and preparation made for him, which was near unto the great elm-tree over against the college of priests, where he was wont to preach. The place round about the houses, and the boughs of the tree, were replenished with people, and in the chamber over the college-gate stood the priests of the college. Then kneeled he down (forasmuch as he could not be suffered to speak unto the people) to prayer, and beekoned six or seven times unto one whom he knew well, to hear the said prayer, to make report thereof in time to come, pouring tears upon his shoulders and in his bosom, who gave attentive ears unto the same; the which prayer he made upon the whole Creed, wherein he continued the space of half an hour. Now, after he was somewhat entered into his prayer, a box was brought and laid before him upon a stool, with his pardon from the queen, if he would turn. At the sight whereof he cried, "If you love my soul, away with it! If you love my soul, away with it!" The box being taken away, the lord Shandois said, Seeing there is no remedy, despatch him quickly. Mr. Hooper said, "Good, my lord; I trust your lordship will give me leave to make an end of my prayers."

Then said the lord Shandois to Sir Edmund Bridges' son, who gave ear before to Mr. Hooper's prayer at his request:

Edmund, take heed that he do nothing else but pray; if he do, tell me, and I shall quickly despatch him. Whilst this talk was, there stepped one or two uncalled, which heard him speak these words following:—

"Lord, (said he,) thou art a gracious God and a merciful Redeemer: have mercy therefore upon me, most miserable and wretched offender, after thy great mercy, and according to thine inestimable goodness. Thou art ascended into heaven: receive me to be a partaker of thy joys, where thou sittest in equal glory with thy Father. For well knowest thou, Lord, wherefore I am come hither to suffer, and why the wicked do persecute this thy poor servant; not for my sins and transgressions committed against thee, but because I will not allow their wicked doings, to the contaminating of thy blood, and to the denial of the knowledge of thy truth, wherewith it did please thee by thy holy Spirit to instruct me; the which, with as much diligence as a poor wretch might, being thereto called, I have set forth to thy glory. And well seest thou, my Lord and God, what terrible pains and cruel torments be prepared for thy creature; such, Lord, as without thy strength none is able to bear, or patiently to pass. But all things that are impossible with man, are possible with thee: therefore strengthen me of thy goodness, that in the fire I break not the rules of patience; or else assuage the terror of the pains, as shall seem most to thy glory."

As soon as the mayor had espied these men which made report of the former words, they were commanded away, and could not be suffered to hear any more.

Prayer being done, he prepared himself to the stake, and put off his host's gown, and delivered it to the sheriffs, requiring them to see it restored to the owner, and put off the rest of his geer, unto his doublet and hose, wherein he would have burned; but the sheriffs would not permit that, such was their greediness; unto whose pleasures, good man, he very obediently submitted himself, and his doublet, hose, and waistcoat, were taken off. Then being in his shirt, he took a point from his hose himself, and thrust his shirt between his legs, where he had a pound of gunpowder in a bladder, and under each arm the like quantity, delivered him by the guard. So desiring the people to say the Lord's Prayer with him, and to pray for him, (who performed it with tears during the time of his pains,) he went up to the stake. Now, when he was at the stake, three irons, made to bind him to the stake, were brought, one for his neck, another for his middle, and the third for his legs. But he refusing them, said, "Ye have no need thus to trouble yourselves: for I doubt not but God will give strength sufficient to abide the extremity of the fire without bands. Notwithstanding, suspecting the frailty and weakness of the flesh, but having assured confidence in God's strength, I am content ye do as ye shall think good."

So the hoop of iron prepared for his middle was brought; which being made somewhat too short (for his belly was swoln with imprisonment,) he shrank, and put in his belly with his hand, until it was fastened: and when they offered to have bound his neck and legs with the other two hoops of iron, he utterly refused them, and would have none, saying, "I am well assured I shall not trouble you."

Thus being ready, he looked upon the people, of whom he might be well seen, (for he was both tall, and stood also on an high-stool,) and beheld round about him; and in every corner there was nothing to be seen but weeping and sorrowful people. Then lifting up his eyes and hands unto heaven, he prayed to himself. By and by, he that was appointed to make the fire, came to him, and did ask him forgiveness.

Of whom he asked, why he should forgive him ; saying, that he knew never any offence he had committed against him. O Sir, said the man, I am appointed to make the fire. Therein, said Mr. Hooper, thou dost not offend me ; God forgive thee thy sins, and do thine office, I pray thee.

Then the reeds were cast up, and he received two bundles of them in his own hands, embraced them, kissed them, and put under either arm one of them, and shewed with his hand how the rest should be bestowed, and pointed to the place where any did lack.

Anon commandment was given that the fire should be set to ; and so it was. But because there were no fewer green faggots put to than two horses could carry upon their backs, it kindled not by and by, and was a pretty while also before it took the reeds upon the faggots. At length it burned about him ; but the wind having full strength in that place, (it was a lowering and cold morning,) it blew the flame from him, so that he was in a manner no more but touched by the fire.

Within a space after, a few dry faggots were brought, and a new fire kindled with faggots, (for there were no more reeds,) and that burned at the nether parts, but had small power above, because of the wind, saying that it did burn his hair and scorch his skin a little. In the time of which fire, even as at the first flame, he prayed, saying mildly and not very loud, but as one without pains, "O Jesus, the son of David, have mercy upon me, and receive my soul."

After the second fire was spent, he did wipe both his eyes with his hands, and beholding the people, he said with an indifferent loud voice, "For God's love, good people, let me have more fire." And all this while his nether parts did burn ; for the faggots were so few, that the flame did not burn strongly at his upper parts.

The third fire was kindled within a while after, which was more extreme than the other two ; and then the bladders of gunpowder brake, which did him small good, they were so placed, and the wind had such power. In this fire he prayed with somewhat a loud voice, "Lord Jesus, have mercy upon me ! Lord Jesus, have mercy upon me ! Lord Jesus, receive my spirit !" And these were the last words he was heard to utter : but when he was black in the mouth, and his tongue swollen that he could not speak, yet his lips went till they shrunk to the gums ; and he knocked his breast with his hands, until one of his arms fell off, and then knocked still with the other, what time the fat, water, and blood, dropped out at his fingers' ends, until by renewing of the fire his strength was gone, and his hand did cleave fast in knocking to the iron upon his breast. So immediately bowing forwards, he yielded up his spirit.

In clarissimi Doctrina et Pietate Viri JOHANNIS HOPERI Martyrium, Conradi Gesneri carmen.

Aureus HOPERUS flammis invictus et igni,
Atque suum Christum confessus ad ultima vitæ
Momenta, integritate sua præclarus, at ardens
Exterius flammis, divinus martyr et intus
Eximio fidei fervore accensus, ad astra

In terris cineresque manent, et fama corusca,
Flammæ instar lucens, lucebit dum stabit orbis,
Utcunque immanes Boreæ, magnæque procellæ
Flatibus adversis tam clarum abrumperè lumen,
Nitantur frustra. Nam, quæ Deus ipse secundat,
Quis prohibere queat ? mortalia facta sed ultro
Et commenta ruunt, vastaque voragine sidunt.
HOPERI exemplo, quotquot spiratis Jesu

Doctrinam Christi, discrimina temerè vitæ,

Audiat ulla, oculus vel vidit, sed neque captus
Humanæ mentis potuit complexier unquam,
Qualia, quanta Deus servet sua bona beatiss.

Thus was he three-quarters of an hour or more in the fire ; even as a lamb patiently he abode the extremity thereof, neither moving forwards, backwards, or to any side ; but having his nether parts burned, and his bowels fallen out, he died as quietly as a child in his bed ; and he now reigneth as a blessed martyr in the joys of heaven prepared for the faithful in Christ, before the foundations of the world ; for whose constancy all Christians are bound to praise God.

See here, gentle reader, the spirit and practice of Popery, in these days of darkness ; and earnestly pray God to preserve thee and the nation from the tyranny of bigots, now, henceforth, and for ever, Amen.

A Letter which Mr. Hooper did write out of Prison to certain of his Friends.

"The grace of God be with you, Amen. I did write unto you of late, and told you what extremity the parliament had concluded upon concerning religion, suppressing the truth, and setting forth the untruth, intending to cause all men by extremity to forswear themselves, and to take again, for the head of the church, him that is neither head nor member of it, but a very enemy, as the word of God and all ancient writers do record : and for lack of law and authority, they will use force and extremity, which have been the arguments to defend the pope and popery, since their authority first began in the world. But now is the time of trial, to see whether we fear more God or man. It was an easy thing to hold with Christ whilst the prince and world held with him : but now the world hateth him, it is the true trial who be his.

"Wherefore in the name, and in the virtue, strength, and power of his holy Spirit, prepare yourselves in any case to adversity and constancy. Let us not run away when it is most time to fight : remember, none shall be crowned, but such as fight manfully ; and he that endureth to the end, shall be saved. Ye must now turn all your cogitations from the peril you see, and mark the felicity that followeth the peril ; either victory in this world of your enemies, or else a surrender of this life to inherit the everlasting kingdom. Beware of beholding too much the felicity or misery of this world, for the consideration and too earnest love or fear of either of them draweth from God.

"Wherefore think with yourselves as touching the felicity of the world, it is good : but yet none otherwise than it standeth with the favour of God. It is to be kept ; but yet so far forth as by keeping of it we lose not God. It is good abiding and tarrying still among our friends here : but yet so, that we tarry not therewithal in God's displeasure, and hereafter dwell with the devils in fire everlasting. There is nothing under God but may be kept, so that God, being above all things we have, be not lost.

"Of adversity judge the same. Imprisonment is painful : but yet liberty unto evil conditions is more painful. The prisons stink ; but yet not so much as sweet houses, where the fear and true honour of God are lacking. I must be alone and solitary ; it is better so to be and have God with me, than to be in company with the wicked. Loss of goods is great ; but loss of God's grace and favour is greater. I am a poor simple creature, and cannot tell how to answer before such a great number of noble, learned, and wise men; it is better to make answer before the pomp and pride of wicked men, than to stand naked in the sight of all heaven and earth before the just God at the latter day. I shall die then by the hands of the cruel man: he is blessed that loseth his life full of miseries, and findeth the life of eternal joys. It is pain and grief to depart from goods and friends: but yet not so much as to depart from grace and heaven itself. Wherefore there is neither felicity nor adversity of this world that can appear to be great, if it be weighed with the joys or pains in the world to come.

"I can do no more but pray for you; do the same for me, for God's sake. For my part, I thank the heavenly Father, I have made mine accounts, and appointed myself unto the will of the heavenly Father: as he will, so I will by his grace. For God's sake, as soon as ye can, send my poor wife and children some letter from you, and my letter also which I sent of late to D—. As it was told me she never had a letter from me sithence the coming of M. S. unto her, the more to blame the messengers, for I have written divers times. The Lord comfort them, and provide for them; for I am able to do nothing in worldly things. She is a godly and wise woman. If my meaning had been accomplished, she should have had necessary things; but what I meant, God can perform, to whom I commend both her and you all. I am a precious jewel now, and daintily kept, never so daintily: for neither mine own man, nor any of the servants of the house, may come to me, but my keeper alone, a simple rude man, God knoweth; but I am nothing careful thereof. Fare you well. The 21st of January, 1555.

"Your bounden,

"JOHN HOOPER."

Amongst many other memorable acts and notes worthy to be remembered in the history of Mr. Hooper, this also is not to be forgotten which happened between him and a bragging friar, a little after the beginning of his imprisonment. The story whereof here followeth:

A friar came from France to England with great vaunt, asking who was the greatest heretic in England? thinking belike to do some great act upon him. To whom answer was made, that Mr. Hooper had then the greatest name to be the chiefest ringleader, who was then in the Fleet. The friar coming to him, asked why he was committed to prison? He said, for debt. Nay, said he; it was for heresy. Which when the other had denied, What sayest thou, quoth he, to Hoc est corpus meum: "This is my body?" Mr. Hooper, being partly moved at the sudden question, desired that he might ask of him another question, which was this, What remaineth after the consecration in the sacrament, any bread or no? No bread at all, saith he. And when ye break it, what do you break, whether bread or the body? said Mr. Hooper. No bread, said the friar, but the body only. If ye do so, said Mr. Hooper, ye do great injury, not only to the body of Christ, but also ye break the scriptures, which say, "A bone of him shall not be broken." With that the friar, having nothing to answer, recoiled back, and with his circles and his crosses began to use exorcism against Mr. Hooper, as though he were possessed.

Here follow certain of Mr. Hooper's Letters.

As you have heard the whole story of the life and martyrdom of this good man declared, so now let us consequently adjoin some part of his letters, written in the time of his imprisonment, most fruitful and worthy to be read, especially in these dangerous days, by all true Christians, which by true mortification seek to serve and follow the Lord through all tempests and storms of this malignant world, as by the reading and perusing of the said letters you shall better feel and understand.

A Letter of Mr. Hooper to certain godly Professors and Lovers of the Truth, instructing them how to behave themselves in that woful Alteration and Change of Religion.

"The grace, mercy, and peace, of God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, my dear brethren, and with all those that unfeignedly love and embrace his holy gospel, Amen.

"It is told me that the wicked idol, the mass, is established again by law, and passed in the parliament house. Learn the truth of it, I pray you, and what penalty is appointed in the act to such as speak against it; also whether there be any compulsion to constrain men to be at it. The statute thoroughly known, such as be abroad and at liberty may provide for themselves, and avoid the danger the better. Doubtless there hath not been seen before our time such a parliament as this is, that as many as were suspected to be the favourers of God's word, should be banished out of both houses. But we must give God thanks for that truth he hath opened in the time of his blessed servant king Edward VI. and pray unto him that we deny it not, nor dishonour it with idolatry; but that we may have strength and patience rather to die ten times than to deny him once. Blessed shall we be, if ever God make us worthy of that honour to shed our blood for his name's sake; and blessed then shall we think the parents which brought us into the world, that we should from this mortality be carried into immortality. If we follow the commandment of St. Paul, that saith, 'If ye then be risen again with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God;' we shall neither depart from the vain transitory goods of this world, nor from this wretched and mortal life, with so great pains as others do.

"Let us pray to our heavenly Father, that we may know and love his blessed will, and the glorious joy prepared for us in time to come; and that we may know and hate all things contrary to his blessed will, and also the pain prepared for the wicked in the world to come. There is no better way to be used in this troublesome time for your consolation, than many times to have assemblies together of such men and women as be of your religion in Christ, and there to take and renew amongst yourselves the truth of your religion; to see what ye be by the word of God, and to remember what ye were before ye came to the knowledge thereof; to weigh and confer the dreams and false lies of the preachers that now preach, with the word of God that retaineth all truth: and by such talk and familiar resorting together, ye shall the better find out all their lies that now go about to deceive you, and also both know and love the truth that God hath opened to us. It is much requisite, that the members of Christ comfort one another, make prayers together, confer one with another; so shall ye be the stronger, and God's Spirit shall not be absent from you, but in the midst of you, to teach you, to comfort you, to make you wise in all godly things, patient in adversity, and strong in persecution.

"Ye see how the congregation of the wicked, by helping one another, make their wicked religion and themselves strong against God's truth and his people. If ye may have some learned man, that can out of the scriptures speak unto you of faith, and true honouring of God, also that can shew you the descent of Christ's church from the beginning of it until this day, that ye may perceive by the life of our forefathers these two things: the one, that Christ's words, which said that all his must suffer persecution and trouble in the world, be true; the other, that none of all his, before our time, escaped trouble; then shall ye perceive that it is but a folly for one that professeth Christ truly, to look for the love of the world.

"Thus shall ye learn to bear trouble, and to exercise your religion, and feel indeed that Christ's words be true, 'In the world ye shall suffer persecution.' And when ye shall feel your religion indeed, say, ye be no better than your forefathers; but be glad, that ye may be counted soldiers for this war: and pray to God when ye come together, that he will use and order you and your doings in these three ends, which ye must take heed to: the first, that ye glorify God; the next, that ye edify the church and congregation; the third, that ye profit your own souls.

"In all your doings, beware ye be not deceived. For although this time be not yet so bloody and tyrannous as the times of our forefathers, that could not bear the name of Christ, without danger of life and goods; yet is our time more perilous both for body and soul. Therefore of us Christ said, 'Think ye, when the Son of man cometh, he shall find faith upon the earth?' He said not, Think ye he shall find any man or woman christened, and in name a Christian? but he spake of the faith that saveth the Christian man in Christ: and doubtless the scarcity of faith is now more (and will, I fear, increase) than it was in the time of the greatest tyrants that ever were; and no marvel why. Read the sixth chapter of St. John's Revelation, and ye shall perceive, amongst other things, that at the opening of the fourth seal came out a 'pale horse, and he that sat upon him was called Death, and Hell followed him.' This horse is the time wherein hypocrites and dissemblers entered into the church under the pretence of true religion, as monks, friars, nuns, massing-priests, with such others; that hath killed more souls with heresy and superstition, than all the tyrants that ever were, killed bodies by fire, sword, or banishment, as it appeareth by his name that sitteth upon the horse, who is called Death: for all souls that love Christ, and trust to these hypocrites, live to the devil in everlasting pain, as is declared by him that followeth the pale horse, which is Hell.

"These pretended and pale hypocrites have stirred the earthquakes, that is, to wit, the princes of the world, against Christ's church, and have also darkened the sun, and made the moon bloody, and have caused the stars to fall from heaven; that is to say, have darkened with mists, and daily do darken, (as ye hear by their sermons,) the clear sun of God's most pure word: the moon, which be God's true preachers, which fetch only light as the sun of God's word, are turned into blood, prisons, and chains, that their light cannot shine unto the world as they would; whereupon it cometh to pass, that the stars, that is to say, Christian people, fall from heaven; that is, to wit, from God's most true word to hypocrisy, most devilish superstition, and idolatry. Let some learned man shew you all the articles of your belief and monument of Christian faith, from the time of Christ hitherto, and ye shall perceive that there was never mention of such articles as these hypocrites teach. God bless you, and pray for me, as I do for you.

"Out of the Fleet,

"By your brother in Christ,

"JOHN HOOPER."

An Exhortation to Patience, sent to his godly Wife ANNE HOOPER: whereby all the true members of Christ may take comfort and courage to suffer trouble and affliction for the profession of his holy gospel.

"Our Saviour Jesus Christ, (dearly beloved, and my godly wife,) in St. Matthew's gospel said to his disciples, That it was necessary scandals should come: and that they could not be avoided, he perceived as well by the condition of those that should perish and be lost for ever in the world to come, as also by their affliction that should be saved. For he saw the greatest part of the people should condemn and neglect whatsoever true doctrine or godly ways should be shewed unto them, or else receive and use it as they thought good to serve their pleasures, without any profit to their souls at all, not caring whether they lived as they were commanded by God's word or not; but would think it sufficient to be counted to have the name of a Christian man, with such works and fruits of his profession and Christianity, as his fathers and elders, after their custom and manner, esteem to be good fruits and faithful works, and will not try them by the word of God.

"And as these men wilfully and voluntarily rejected the word of God; even so God most justly delivereth them into the blindness of mind and hardness of heart, that they cannot understand nor yet consent to any thing that God would have preached, and set forth to his glory, after his own will and word: wherefore they hate it mortally, and of all things most detest God's holy word. And as the devil hath entered into their hearts, that they themselves cannot nor will not come to Christ, to be instructed by his holy word; even so can they not abide any other man to be a Christian man, and to lead his life after the word of God, but hate him, persecute him, rob him, imprison him, yea, and kill him, if God suffer it. And so much are these wicked men blinded, that they pass off no law, whether it be God's or man's, but persecute such as never offended, yea, do evil to those that have prayed daily for them, and wish them God's grace.

"In their Pharaohical and blind fury they have no respect to nature: for the brother persecuteth the brother, the father the son, and most dear friends, in devilish slander and offence, are become most mortal enemies; and no marvel, for when they have chosen sundry masters, the one the devil, the other God, the one shall agree with the other as God, and the devil agree between themselves. For this cause, (that the more part of the world doth use to serve the devil under eloked hypocrisy of God's title,) Christ said, 'It is expedient and necessary that scandals should come;' and many means be devised to keep the little babes of Christ from the heavenly Father. But Christ saith, 'Wo be unto him by whom the offence cometh:' yet is there no remedy, man being of such corruption and hatred towards God, but that the evil shall be deceived, and persecute the good; and the good shall understand the truth, and suffer persecution for it, unto the world's end. 'For, as he that was born after the flesh persecuted in times past him that was born after the spirit, even so it is now.' Therefore, forasmuch as we live in this life amongst so many great perils and dangers, we must be well assured by God's word how to bear them, and how patiently to take them as they be sent to us from God. We must also assure ourselves that there is no other remedy for Christians in the time of trouble, than Christ himself hath appointed us. In St. Luke he giveth us this commandment, 'Ye shall possess your lives in patience.' In the which words he giveth us both commandment what to do, and also great comfort and consolation in all troubles. He sheweth what is to be done, and what is to be hoped for in troubles: and, when troubles happen, he biddeth us be patient, and in no ease violently nor seditiously to resist our persecutors; because God hath such care and charge of us, that he will keep, in the midst of all troubles, the very hairs of our head, so that one of them shall not fall away without the will and pleasure of our heavenly Father. Whether the hair therefore tarry on the head or fall from the head, it is the will of the Father. And seeing he hath such care for the hairs of our head, how much more doth he care for our life itself? Wherefore, let God's adversaries do what they list, whether they take life or take it not, they can do us no hurt: for their cruelty hath no further power than God permiteth them; and that which cometh unto us by the will of our heavenly Father, can be no harm, no loss, neither destruction, unto us, but rather gain, wealth, and felicity. For all troubles and adversity that chance to such as be of God, by the will of the heavenly Father, can be none other but gain and advantage.

"That the spirit of man may feel these consolations, the giver of them, the heavenly Father, must be prayed unto, for the merits of Christ's passion: for it is not the nature of man that he can be contented, until it be regenerated and possessed with God's Spirit, to bear patiently the troubles of the mind or of the body. When the mind and heart of a man seeth on every side sorrow and heaviness, and the worldly eye beholdeth nothing but such things as be troublous, and wholly bent to rob the poor of that he hath, and also to take from him his life; except the man weigh these brittle and uncertain treasures that be taken from him with the riches of the life to come, and this life of the body with the life in Christ's blood, and so for the love and certainty of the heavenly joys condemn all things present, doubtless he shall never be able to bear the loss of goods, life, or any other thing of this world.

"Therefore St. Paul giveth a godly and necessary lesson to all men in this short and transitory life, and therein sheweth how a man may best bear the iniquities and troubles of this world; 'If ye be risen again with Christ, (saith he,) seek the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father. Wherefore the Christian man's faith must be always upon the resurrection of Christ when he is in trouble; and in that glorious resurrection he shall not only see continual and perpetual joy and consolation, but also the victory and triumph over all persecution, trouble, sin, death, hell, the devil, and all other tyrants and persecutors of Christ and of Christ's people, the tears and weeping of the faithful dried up, their wounds healed, their bodies made immortal in joy, their souls for ever praising the Lord, in conjunction everlasting with the blessed company of God's elect in perpetual joy.

"We must therefore patiently suffer, and willingly attend upon God's doings, although they seem clean contrary, after our judgment, to our wealth and salvation; as Abraham did, when he was bid to offer his son Isaac, in whom God promised the blessing and multiplying of his seed. Joseph at the last came to that which God promised him, although, in the mean time, after the judgment of the world, he was never like to be (as God said he should be) lord over his brethren. When Christ would have the blind man to see, he put clay upon his eyes; which, after the judgment of man, was a means rather to make him double blind, than to give him his sight: but he obeyed, and knew that God could work his desire, what means soever he used contrary to man's reason. And, as touching this world, he useth all his after the same sort. If any smart, his people be the first; if any suffer shame, they begin; if any be subject to slander, it is those that he loveth; so that he sheweth no face or favour, nor love almost in this world outwardly to them, but layeth clay upon their sore eyes that be sorrowful: yet the patient man seeth, as St. Paul said, life hid under these miseries and adversities, and sight under foul clay; and in the mean time he hath the testimony of a good conscience, and believeth God's promises to be his consolation in the world to come, which is more worthy unto him than all the world is worth besides; and blessed is that man in whom God's Spirit beareth record that he is the son of God, whatsoever troubles he suffer in this troublesome world.

"And to judge things indifferently, my good wife, the troubles be not yet generally, as they were in our good fathers' time, soon after the death and resurrection of our Saviour Jesus Christ, whereof he spake in St. Matthew, (ch. xxiv.) Of the which place you and I have taken many times great consolation, and especially of the latter part of the chapter, wherein is contained the last day and end of all troubles, I doubt not, both for you and me, and for such as love the coming of our Saviour Christ to judgment. Remember therefore that place, and mark it again, and ye shall in this time see this great consolation, and also learn much patience. Was there ever such troubles as Christ threatened upon Jerusalem? Was there, since the beginning of the world, such affliction? Who was then best at ease? The apostles, that suffered in bodily persecution, and gathered of it ease and quietness in the promises of God. And no marvel: for Christ saith, 'Lift up your heads, for your redemption is at hand;' that is to say, Your eternal rest approacheth and draweth near. The world is stark blind, and more foolish than foolishness itself: and so be the people of the world. For when God saith, Trouble shall come, they will have ease; and when God saith, Be merry and rejoice in trouble, we lament and mourn, as though we were cast-aways. But this our flesh (which is never merry with virtue, nor sorry with vice, never laugheth with grace, nor ever weepeth with sin) holdeth fast with the world, and letteth God slip. But, my dearly beloved wife, you know how to perceive and to beware of the vanity and crafts of the devil well enough in Christ. And that ye may the better have patience in the Spirit of God, read again the 24th chapter of St. Matthew, and mark what difference is between the destruction of Jerusalem and the destruction of the whole world, and you shall see, that then here were left alive many offenders to repent; but at the latter day there shall be absolute judgment and sentence (never to be revoked) of eternal life and eternal death upon all men: and yet towards the end of the world we have nothing so much extremity as they had then, but even as we be able to bear. So doth the merciful Father lay upon us now imprisonment, (and I suppose, for my part, shortly death,) now spoil of goods, loss of friends, and the greatest loss of all, the knowledge of God's word. God's will be done. I wish in Christ Jesus, our only Mediator and Saviour, your constancy and consolation, that you may live for ever and ever, whereof in Christ I doubt not: to whom, for his most blessed and painful passion, I commit you. Amen.—October 13, 1553."

"To all my dear Brethren, my Relievers and Helpers in the City of London.

"The grace of God be with you, Amen. I have received from you, dearly beloved in our Saviour Jesus Christ, by the hands of my servant, William Downton, your liberality; for the which I most heartily thank you, and I praise God highly in you for you, who hath moved your hearts to shew this kindness towards me, praying him to preserve you from all famine, scarcity, and lack of the truth of his word, which is the lively food of your souls, as ye preserve my body from hunger, and other necessities which should happen unto me, were it not cared for by the benevolence and charity of godly people. Such as have taken all worldly goods and lands from me, and spoiled me of all that I had, have imprisoned my body, and appointed not one halfpenny to feed or relieve me withal: but I do forgive them, and pray for them daily in my poor prayer unto God, and from my heart I wish their salvation, and quietly and patiently bear their injuries, wishing no further extremity to be used towards us. Yet if the contrary seem best unto our heavenly Father, I have made my reckoning, and fully resolved myself to suffer the uttermost that they are able to do against me, yea, death itself, by the aid of Christ Jesus, who died the most vile death of the cross for us wretches and miserable sinners. But of this I am assured, that the wicked world, with all its force and power, shall not touch one of the hairs of our heads without leave and license of our heavenly Father, whose will be done in all things. If he will life, life be it; if he will death, death be it. Only we pray, that our wills may be subject unto his will; and then, although both we and all the world see none other thing but death, yet if he think life best, we shall not die, no, although the sword be drawn out over our heads: as Abraham thought to kill his son Isaac, yet when God perceived that Abraham had surrendered his will to God's will, and was content to kill his son, God then saved his son.

"Dearly beloved, if we be contented to obey God's will, and for his commandment's sake to surrender our goods and our lives to be at his pleasure, it maketh no matter whether we keep goods and life, or lose them: nothing can hurt us, that is taken from us for God's cause; nor can any thing at length do us good, that is preserved contrary unto God's commandment. Let us wholly suffer God to use us and our's after his holy wisdom, and beware we neither use nor govern ourselves contrary to his will by our own wisdom: for if we do, our wisdom will at length prove foolishness. It is kept to no good purpose, that we keep contrary unto his commandments. It can by no means be taken from us, that he would should tarry with us. He is no good Christian that ruleth himself and his as worldly means serveth; for he that so doeth shall have as many changes as chanceth in the world. To-day with the world he shall like and praise the truth of God; to-morrow as the world will, so will he like and praise the falsehood of man: to-day with Christ, and to-morrow with Antichrist. Wherefore, dear brethren, as touching your behaviour towards God, use both your inward spirits and your outward bodies, your inward and your outward man, I say, not after the manners of men, but after the infallible word of God.

"Restrain from evil in both; and glorify your heavenly Father in both. For if ye think ye can in heart serve him, and yet outwardly serve with the world the thing that is not God, ye deceive yourselves; for both the body and the soul must together concur in the honour of God, as St. Paul plainly teacheth, 1 Cor. vi. For if an honest wife be bound to give both heart and body to faith and service in marriage, and if an honest wife's faith in the heart cannot stand with an whorish or defiled body outwardly; much less can the true faith of a Christian, in the service of Christianity, stand with the bodily service of external idolatry; for the mystery of marriage is not as honourable between man and wife, as it is between Christ and every Christian man, as St. Paul saith.

"Therefore, dear brethren, pray to the heavenly Father, that as he spared not the soul nor the body of his dearly beloved Son, but applied both of them with extreme pain, to work our salvation both of body and soul; so he will give us all grace to apply our bodies and souls to be servants unto him. For doubtless he requireth as well the one as the other, and cannot be discontented with the one, and well pleased with the other. Either he hateth both, or loveth both; he divideth not his love to one, and his hatred to the other. Let not us therefore, good brethren, divide ourselves, and say our souls serve him, whatsoever our bodies do to the contrary for civil order and policy.

"But, alas! I know, by myself, what troubleth you; that is, the great danger of the world, that will revenge, ye think, your service to God with sword and fire, with loss of goods and lands. But, dear brethren, weigh the other side, that your enemies and God's enemies shall not do so much as they would, but as much as God shall suffer them, who can trap them in their own counsels, and destroy them in the midst of their furies. Remember ye be the workmen of the Lord, and called into his vineyard, there to labour till evening-tide, that you may receive your penny, which is more worth than all the kingdoms of the earth. But he that calleth us into his vineyard, hath not told us how sore and how fervently the sun shall trouble us in our labour: but hath bid us labour, and commit the bitterness thereof unto him; who can and will so moderate all afflictions, that no man shall have more laid upon him than in Christ he shall be able to bear. Unto whose merciful tuition and defence I commend both your souls and bodies. September 2, anno 1554.

"Your's, with my poor prayer,

"JOHN HOOPER."

To Mrs. Wilkinson, a Woman hearty in God's Cause, and comfortable to his afflicted Members.

"The grace of God, and the comfort of his holy Spirit, be with you, Amen.

"I am very glad to hear of your health, and do thank you for your loving tokens. But I am a great deal more glad to hear how christianly you avoid idolatry, and prepare yourself to suffer the extremity of the world, rather than to endanger yourself to God. You do as you ought to do in this behalf, and in suffering of transitory pains you shall avoid permanent torments in the world to come. Use your life, and keep it with as much quietness as you can, so that you offend not God. The ease that cometh of his displeasure, turneth at length to unspeakable pains; and the gains of the world, with the loss of his favour, is beggary and wretchedness. Reason is to be amended in this cause of religion: for it will choose and follow an error with the multitude, if it may be allowed, rather than turn to faith, and follow the truth with the people of God. Moses found the same fault in himself, and did amend it, choosing rather to be afflicted with the people of God, than to use the liberty of the king's daughter, that accounted him as her son. Pray for contentation and peace of the Spirit, and rejoice in such troubles as shall happen to you for the truth's sake; for in that part, Christ saith you be happy. Pray also for me, I pray you, that I may do in all things the will of our heavenly Father: to whose tuition and defence I commend you."

Unto these letters of Mr. Hooper, we think proper to annex an epistle written to him by a famous learned man, Henry Bullinger, chief superintendant in the city of Zurich. Of whose singular love and affection toward Mr. Hooper, ye heard before in the beginning of Mr. Hooper's life.

"To the most reverend father, Mr. J. Hooper, bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, and now prisoner for the gospel of Jesus Christ, my fellow-elder, and most dear brother in England."

"The heavenly Father grant unto you, and to all those which are in bands and captivity for his name's sake, grace and peace through Jesus Christ our Lord, with wisdom, patience, and fortitude of the Holy Ghost.

"I have received from you two letters, my most dear brother, the former in the month of September of the year past, the latter in the month of May of this present year, both written out of prison. But I doubting lest I should make answer to you in vain, whilst I feared that my letters should never come into your hands, or else increase and double your sorrow, did refrain from the duty of writing. In the which thing I doubt not but you will have me excused, especially seeing you did not vouchsafe, no, not once in a whole year, to answer to my whole treatises, rather than letters, whereas I continued still notwithstanding in writing unto you; as also at this present, after I heard you were cast in prison, I did not refrain from continual prayer, beseeching our heavenly Father, through our only Mediator Jesus Christ, to grant unto you, and to your fellow prisoners, faith and constancy unto the end. Now is that thing happened unto you, my brother, the which we did oftentimes prophesy unto ourselves, at your being with us, should come to pass, especially when we did talk of the power of Antichrist, and of his felicity and victories. For you know the saying of Daniel, 'His power shall be mighty, but not in his strength; and he shall wonderfully destroy and make havock of all things, and shall prosper and practise, and he shall destroy the mighty and the holy people after his own will.' You know what the Lord warned us of beforehand by Matthew, in the 10th chapter; by John, in the 15th chapter and the 16th; and also what that chosen vessel St. Paul hath written in the second of Timothy, and the 3d chapter. Wherefore I do nothing doubt, by God's grace, of your faith and patience, whilst you know that those things which you suffer are not looked for, or come by chance, but that you suffer them in the best, truest, and most holy quarrel: for what can be more true and holy than our doctrine, which the Papists, those worshippers of Antichrist, do persecute? All things touching salvation we attribute unto Christ alone, and to his holy institutions, as we have been taught of him and of his disciples; but they would have even the same things to be communicated as well to their Antichrist, and to his institutions. Such we ought no less to withstand than we read that Elias withstood the Baalites. For if Jesus be Christ, then let them know that he is the fulness of his church, and that perfectly: but if Antichrist be king and priest, then let them exhibit unto him that honour. How long do they halt on both sides? Can they give unto us any one that is better than Christ? or, who shall be equal with Christ, that may be compared with him, except it be he whom the apostle calleth the adversary? But if Christ be sufficient for his church, what needeth this patching and piercing? But I know well enough I need not use these disputations with you, which are sincerely taught, and have taken root in Christ, being persuaded that you have all things in him, and that we in him are made perfect.

"Go forwards, therefore, constantly to confess Christ, and to defy Antichrist, being mindful of this most holy and most true saying of our Lord Jesus Christ, 'He that overcometh shall possess all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be his son; but the fearful, and the unbelieving, and the murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.' The first death is soon overcome, although a man must burn for the Lord's sake: for they say well that do affirm this our fire to be scarcely a shadow of that which is prepared for unbelievers, and them that fall from the truth. Moreover, the Lord granteth unto us, that we may easily overcome by his power the first death, the which he himself did taste and overcome: promising withal such joys as never shall have end, unspeakable, and passing all understanding, the which we shall possess so soon as ever we do depart hence. For so again saith the angel of the Lord, 'If any man worship the beast, and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or on his hand, the same shall drink of the wrath of God; yea, of the wine which is poured into the cup of his wrath; and he shall be tormented in fire and brimstone, before the holy angels and before the Lamb; and the smoke of their torments shall ascend evermore; and they shall have no rest day nor night which worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the print of his name. Here is the patience of saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. To this he added by and by, 'I heard a voice saying to me, Write, blessed be the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth, (or speedily they be blessed :) Even so, saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labours, but their works follow them;' Rev. xiv. for our labour shall not be frustrate or in vain.

"Therefore seeing you have such a large promise, be strong in the Lord, fight a good fight, be faithful to the Lord unto the end: consider that Christ the Son of God is your Captain, and fighteth for you, and that all the prophets, apostles, and martyrs, are your fellow soldiers. They that persecute and trouble us, are men sinful and mortal, whose favour a wise man would not buy with the value of a farthing: and, besides that, our life is frail, short, brittle, and transitory. Happy are we, if we depart in the Lord; who grant unto you, and to all your fellow prisoners, faith and constancy. Commend me to the most reverend fathers and holy confessors of Christ, Dr. Crammer, bishop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, and the good old father Dr. Latimer. Them, and all the rest of the prisoners with you for the Lord's cause, salute in my name, and in the name of all my fellow ministers, the which do speak unto you the grace of God, and constancy in the truth.

"If there be any thing wherein I may do any pleasure to your wife and children, they shall have me wholly at command, whereof I will write also to your wife, for I understand she abideth at Frankfort. Be strong and merry in Christ, waiting for his deliverance, when and in what sort it shall seem good unto him. The Lord Jesus shew pity upon the realm of England, and illuminate the same with his holy Spirit, to the glory of his name, and the salvation of souls. The Lord Jesus preserve and deliver you from all evil, with all them that call upon his name. Farewell, and farewell eternally. The 10th of October, anno 1554, from Zurich.

"You know the hand. H. B."

The History of Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, who suffered for the Truth of God's Word, under the Tyranny of the Roman Bishop, the 9th of February, 1555.

The town of Hadley was one of the first that received the word of God in all England, at the preaching of Mr. Thos. Bilney; by whose industry the gospel of Christ had such gracious success, and took such root there, that a great number in that parish became exceedingly well learned in the holy scriptures, as well women as men, so that a man might have found among them many who had often read the whole Bible through, and that could have said a great deal of St. Paul's Epistles by heart, and very well and readily have given a godly learned opinion in any matter of controversy. Their children and servants were also brought up and trained so diligently in the right knowledge of God's word, that the whole town seemed rather a university of the learned, than a town of cloth-making or labouring people. And what most is to be commended, they were for the most part faithful followers of God's word in their living.

In this town was Dr. Rowland Taylor, doctor in both civil and canon laws, and a right perfect divine and parson; who, at his first entering into his benefice, did not (as the common sort of beneficed men do) let out his benefice to a farmer, that shall gather up the profits, and set in an ignorant and unlearned priest to serve the cure, and so they having the fleece, little or nothing care for feeding the flock; but contrarily, he forsook the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, with whom he before was in household, and made his personal abode and dwelling in Hadley, among the people committed to his charge. Where he, as a good shepherd abiding and dwelling among his sheep, gave himself wholly to the study of the holy scriptures, most faithfully endeavouring himself to fulfil that charge which the Lord gave unto Peter, saying, "Peter, lovest thou me? Feed my lambs, feed my sheep, feed my sheep." This love of Christ so wrought in him, that no Sunday nor holiday passed, nor other time when he might get the people together, but he preached to them the word of God, the doctrine of their salvation.

Not only was his word a preaching unto them, but all his life and conversation was an example of unfeigned Christian life and true holiness. He was void of all pride; humble, and meek as any child; so that none were so poor but they might boldly, as unto their father, resort unto him; neither was his lowliness childish or fearful, but as occasion, time, and place required, he would be stout in rebuking the sinful, so that none was so rich but he would plainly tell him his fault, with such earnest and grave rebukes as became a good curate and pastor.

To the poor that were blind, lame, sick, bed-ridden, or that had many children, he was a very father, a careful patron, and a diligent provider, insomuch that he caused the parishioners to make a general provision for them; and he himself (beside the continual relief that they always found at his house) gave an honest portion yearly to the common alms-box. His wife also was an honest, discreet, and sober matron, and his children well nurtured, brought up in the fear of God and good learning.

To conclude: he was a right and lively image or pattern of all those virtuous qualities described by St. Paul in a true bishop; a salt of the earth, savourily biting the corrupt manners of evil men; a light in God's house, set upon a candlestick for all good men to imitate and follow.

Thus continued this good shepherd among his flock, governing and leading them through the wilderness of this wicked world, all the days of the most innocent and holy king of blessed memory, Edward VI. But after it pleased God to take king Edward from this vale of misery unto his most blessed rest, the Papists (who ever seemed and dissembled both with king Henry VIII. and king Edward his son) now seeing the time convenient for their purpose, uttered their hypocrisy, openly refusing all reformation made by the said kings: and, contrary to what they had all these kings' days preached, taught, written, and sworn, they violently overthrew the true doctrine of the gospel, and persecuted with fire and sword all those that would not agree to receive again the Roman bishop as supreme head of the universal church, and allow all the errors, superstitions, and idolatries, that before by God's word were disproved and justly condemned, as though now they were good doctrine, virtuous, and true religion.

In the beginning of this rage of Antichrist, a certain pretty gentleman after a sort of a lawyer, called Foster, being a steward and keeper of courts, a man of no great skill, but a bitter persecutor in those days, with one John Clerk, of Hadley, (which Foster had ever been a secret favourer of all Romish idolatry,) conspired with the said Clerk to bring in the pope and his image worship again into Hadley church. For as yet Dr. Taylor, as a good shepherd, had retained and kept in his church the godly church service and reformation made by king Edward, and most faithfully and earnestly preached against the popish corruptions, which had infected the whole country.

Therefore the aforesaid Foster and Clerk hired one John Averth, parson of Aldam, (a very mammonist, a blind leader of the blind, a popish idolater, and an open adulterer and whoremonger,) a very fit minister for their purpose, to come to Hadley, and there to give the onset to begin again the popish mass.

To this purpose they builded up with all haste possible the altar, intending to bring in their mass again, about the Palm Monday. But this their device took none effect: for in the night the altar was beaten down. Wherefore they built it up again the second time, and laid diligent watch, lest any should again break it down.

On the day following came Foster and John Clerk, bringing with them their popish sacrificer, who brought with him all his implements and garments to play his popish pageant; whom they and their men guarded with swords and bucklers, lest any man should disturb him in his missal sacrifice.

When Dr. Taylor, who according to his custom sat at his book studying the word of God, heard the bells ring, he arose and went into the church, supposing something had been there to be done, according to his pastoral office; and coming to the church, he found the church doors shut and fast barred, saving the chancel door, which was only latched. Where he entered in, and coming into the chancel, saw a popish sacrificer in his robes, with a broad new shaven crown, ready to begin his popish sacrifice, beset round about with drawn swords and bucklers, lest any man should approach to disturb him.

Then said Dr. Taylor, Thou devil, who made thee so bold to enter into this church of Christ, to profane and defile it with this abominable idolatry?

With that started up Foster, and with an ireful and furious countenance said to Dr. Taylor, Thou traitor, what doest thou here, to let and disturb the queen's proceedings?

Dr. Taylor answered, I am no traitor, but I am the shepherd that God my Lord Christ hath appointed to feed this his flock; wherefore I have good authority to be here: and I command thee, thou popish wolf, in the name of God, to avoid hence, and not to presume here with such popish idolatry to poison Christ's flock.

Then said Foster, Wilt thou traitorously, heretic, make a commotion, and resist violently the queen's proceedings? Dr. Taylor answered, I make no commotion, but it is you Papists that make commotions and tumults. I resist only with God's word against your popish idolatries, which are against God's word, the queen's honour, and tend to the utter subversion of this realm of England : and further, thou dost against the law, which commandeth that no mass be said but at a consecrated altar.

When the parson of Aldam heard that, he began to shrink back, and would have left his saying mass ; then started up John Clerk, and said, Mr. Avert, be not afraid, you have a superaltare ; go forth with your business, man.

Then Foster, with his armed men, took Dr. Taylor, and led him with a strong hand out of the church, and the popish prelate proceeded in his Romish idolatry. Dr. Taylor's wife, who had followed her husband into the church, when she saw her husband thus violently thrust out of his church, she kneeled down, and held up her hands, and with a loud voice said, I beseech God, the righteous Judge, to avenge this injury that this popish idolater to this day doth to the blood of Christ. Then they thrust her out of the church also, and shut the doors ; for they feared that the people would have rent their sacrificer in pieces. Notwithstanding, one or two threw in great stones at the windows, and missed very little the popish masser.

Thus you see, how, without consent of the people, the popish mass was again set up, with battle array, with sword and buckler, with violence and tyranny ; which practice the Papists have ever yet used : as for reason, law, or scripture, they have none on their part. Therefore they are the same that say, 'The law of unrighteousness is our strength : come, let us oppress the righteous without any fear,' &c.

Within a day or two after, with all haste possible, this Foster and Clerk made a complaint of Dr. Taylor, by a letter written to S. Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor.

When the bishop heard this, he sent a letter missive to Dr. Taylor, commanding him within certain days to come and to appear before him, upon his allegiance, to answer such complaints as were made against him.

When Dr. Taylor's friends heard of this, they were exceedingly sorry and grieved in mind ; which when foreseeing to what end the same matter would come, seeing also all truth and justice were trodden under foot, and falsehood with cruel tyranny were set aloft, and ruled all the whole rout ; his friends, I say, came to him, and earnestly counselled him to depart and fly, alleging and declaring to him, that he could neither be indifferently heard to speak his conscience and mind, nor yet look for justice or favour at the said chancellor's hands, who, as it was well known, was most fierce and cruel ; but must needs, if he went up to him, wait for imprisonment and cruel death at his hands.

Then said Dr. Taylor to his friends, Dear friends, I most heartily thank you, for that you have so tender a care over me : and although I know that there is neither justice nor truth to be looked for at my adversary's hands, but rather imprisonment and cruel death ; yet know I my cause to be so good and righteous, and the truth so strong upon my side, that I will by God's grace go and appear before them, and to their beards resist their false doing.

Then said his friends, Master doctor, we think it not best so to do : you have sufficiently done your duty, and testified the truth both by your godly sermons and also in resisting the parson of Aldam, with other that came hither to bring again the popish mass. And forasmuch as our Saviour Christ willeth and biddeth us, that when they persecute us in one city, we should fly into another ; we think in flying at this time ye should do best, keeping yourself against another time, when the church shall have great need of such diligent teachers and godly pastors. O, quoth Dr. Taylor, what will ye have me to do ? I am old, and have already lived too long, to see these terrible and most wicked days. Fly you, and do as your conscience leadeth you ; I am fully determined, with God's grace, to go to the bishop, and to his beard to tell him that he doth naught. God shall well hereafter raise up teachers of his people, which shall with much more diligence and fruit teach them than I have done ; for God will not forsake his church, though now for a time he trieth and correcteth us, and not without a just cause.

As for me, I believe before God I shall never be able to do God so good a service as I may do now ; nor shall I ever have so glorious a calling as I now have, nor so great mercy of God proffered me, as is now at this present. For what Christian man would not gladly die against the pope and his adherents ? I know that the Papacy is the kingdom of Antichrist, altogether full of lies, altogether full of falsehood, so that all their doctrine, even from Christ's cross be my speed, and St. Nicholas, unto the end of the Apocalypse, is nothing but idolatry, superstition, errors, hypocrisy, and lies. Wherefore I beseech you, and all other my friends, to pray for me, and I doubt not but God will give me strength and his holy Spirit, that all mine adversaries shall have shame of their doings.

When his friends saw him so constant, and fully determined to go, they with weeping eyes commended him unto God ; and he within a day or two prepared himself to his journey, leaving his cure with a godly old priest, named sir Richard Yeoman, who afterwards for God's truth was burnt at Norwich.

There was also in Hadley, one Alcocke, a very godly man, well learned in the holy scriptures, who, after sir R. Yeoman was driven away, used daily to read a chapter, and to say the English Litany, in Hadley church. But him they fetched up to London, and cast him into prison in Newgate, where, after a year's imprisonment, he died.

But let us return to Dr. Taylor again, who being accompanied by a servant of his own, named John Hull, took his journey towards London. By the way, this John Hull laboured to counsel and persnade him very earnestly to fly, and not to come to the bishop, and proffered himself to go with him to serve him, and in all perils to venture his life for him and with him. But in no wise would Dr. Taylor consent or agree thereunto, but said, O John, shall I give place to this thy counsel and worldly persuasion, and leave my flock in this danger ! Remember the good shepherd, Christ, which not only fed his flock, but also died for his flock : him must I follow, and with God's grace will do.

Therefore, good John, pray for me ; and if thou seest me weak at any time, comfort me, and discourage me not in this my godly enterprise and purpose.

Thus they came up to London, and shortly after Dr. Taylor presented himself to the bishop of Winchester, Stephen Gardiner, then lord chancellor of England. For this hath been one great abuse in England for many years, that such offices as have been of most importance and weight, have commonly been committed to bishops and other spiritual men, whereby three devilish mischiefs and inconveniences have happened in this realm, to the great dishonour of God, and utter neglecting of the flock of Christ.

First, They have had small leisure to attend to their pastoral cures, which thereby have been utterly neglected and undone.

Secondly, It hath also puffed up many bishops and other spiritual persons into such haughtiness and pride, that they have thought no nobleman in the realm worthy to be their equal and fellow.

Thirdly, Where they by this means knew the very secrets of princes, they being in such high offices, have caused the same to be known in Rome, before the kings could accomplish and bring their intents to pass in England. By this means hath the Papacy been so maintained, and things ordered after their wills and pleasures, that much mischief hath happened in this realm and others, sometimes to the destruction of princes, and sometimes to the utter undoing of many commonwealths.

Now when Gardiner saw Dr. Taylor, he, according to his common custom, reviled him, calling him knave, traitor, heretic, with many other villanous reproaches; all which Dr. Taylor heard patiently, and at the last said unto him:

My lord, (quoth he,) I am neither traitor nor heretic, but a true subject, and a faithful Christian man, and am come, according to your commandment, to know what is the cause that your lordship hath sent for me.

Then said the bishop, Art thou come, thou villain! How darest thou look me in the face for shame! Knowest thou not who I am?

Yes, (quoth Dr. Taylor,) I know who you are; ye are Dr. Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor; and yet but a mortal man, I trow. But if I should be afraid of your lordly looks, why fear you not God, the Lord of us all? How dare you for shame look any Christian man in the face, seeing ye have forsaken the truth, denied our Saviour Christ and his word, and done contrary to your own oath and writing? With what countenance will ye appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, and answer to your oath made first unto king Henry VIII. of famous memory, and afterwards unto blessed king Edward VI. his son?

The bishop answered, Tush, tush, that was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore worthy to be broken: I have done well in breaking it; and I thank God I am come home again to our mother the Catholic church of Rome; and so I would thou shouldest do.

Dr. Taylor answered, Should I forsake the church of Christ, which is founded upon the true foundation of the apostles and prophets, to prove those lies, errors, superstition, and idolatries, that the popes and their company at this day so blasphemously do approve? Nay, God forbid. Let the pope and his return to our Saviour Christ and his word, and thrust out of the church such abominable idolatries as he maintaineth, and then will Christian men turn unto him. You wrote truly against him, and were sworn against him.

I tell thee, (quoth the bishop of Winchester,) it was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore ought to be broken, and not kept: and our holy father the pope hath discharged me of it.

Then said Dr. Taylor, But you shall not so be discharged before Christ, who doubtless will require it at your hands, as a lawful oath made to our liege and sovereign lord the king, from whose obedience no man can assail you, neither the pope nor any of his.

I see, (quoth the bishop,) thou art an arrogant knave, and a very fool.

My lord, (quoth Dr. Taylor,) leave your unseemly railing at me, which is not seemly for such an one in authority, as you are: for I am a Christian man, and you know, that he that saith to his brother, "Raca, is in danger of the council; and he that saith, thou fool, is in danger of hell-fire."

The bishop answered, Ye are false, and the whole of you are liars.

Nay, (quoth Dr. Taylor,) we are true men, and know that it is written, "The mouth that lieth, slayeth the soul;" and again, "Lord God, thou shalt destroy all that speak lies." And therefore we abide by the truth of God's word, which ye, contrary to your own consciences, deny and forsake.

Thou art married, (quoth the bishop.) Yea, (quoth Dr. Taylor,) that I thank God I am, and have had nine children, and all in lawful matrimony; and blessed be God that ordained matrimony, and commanded that every man, that hath not the gift of continency, should marry a wife of his own, and not live in adultery or whoredom.

Then said the bishop, Thou hast resisted the queen's proceedings, and wouldest not suffer the parson of Aldam, a very virtuous and devout priest, to say mass in Hadley.

Dr. Taylor answered, My lord, I am parson of Hadley; and it is against all right, conscience, and laws, that any man should come into my charge, and presume to infect the flock committed unto me, with the venom of the popish idolatrous mass.

With that the bishop waxed very angry, and said, Thou art a blasphemous heretic indeed, that blasphemest the blessed sacrament, and speakest against the holy mass, which is made a sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Dr. Taylor answered, Nay, I blaspheme not the blessed sacrament which Christ instituted, but I reverence it as a true Christian man ought to do, and confess that Christ ordained the holy communion in the remembrance of his death and passion, which when we keep according to his ordinance, we through faith eat the body of Christ and drink his blood, giving thanks for our redemption; and this is our sacrifice for the quick and the dead, to give thanks for his merciful goodness shewed to us, in that he gave his Son Christ unto the death for us.

Thou sayest well, (quoth the bishop;) it is all that thou hast said, and more too: for it is a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Then answered Dr. Taylor, Christ gave himself to die for our redemption upon the cross, whose body there offered was the propitiatory sacrifice, full, perfect, and sufficient unto salvation for all them that believe in him. And this sacrifice did our Saviour Christ offer in his own person himself once for all, neither can any priest any more offer him, nor we need any more propitiatory sacrifice; and therefore I say with Chrysostom, and all the doctors, Our sacrifice is only memorative, in the remembrance of Christ's death and passion, a sacrifice of thanksgiving; and therefore by the fathers called eucharistia: and other sacrifice hath the church of God none.

It is true, (quoth the bishop,) the sacrament is called eucharistia, a thanksgiving, because we there give thanks for our redemption, and it is also a sacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead, which thou shalt confess ere thou and I have done.—Then called the bishop his men, and said, Have this fellow hence, and carry him to the King's Bench, and charge the keeper he be straitly kept.

Then kneeled Dr. Taylor down, and held up both his hands, and said, "Good Lord, I thank thee: and from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable errors, idolatries, and abominations, good Lord deliver us; and God be praised for good king Edward."

So they carried him to prison to the King's Bench, where he lay prisoner almost two years.

This is the sum of that first talk, as I saw it mentioned in a letter that Dr. Taylor wrote to a friend of his, thanking God for his grace, that he had confessed his truth, and was found worthy for truth to suffer prison and bands, beseeching his friends to pray for him, that he might persevere constant unto the end.

Being in prison, Dr. Taylor spent all his time in prayer, reading the holy scriptures, and writing and preaching, and exhorting the prisoners, and such as resorted to him, to repentance and amendment of life.

Within a few days after, were divers other learned and godly men, in sundry counties of England, committed to prison for religion, so that almost all the prisons in England were become right Christian schools and churches; so that there was no greater comfort for Christian hearts, than to come to the prisons to behold their virtuous conversation, and to hear their prayers, preachings, most godly exhortations, and consolations.

Now were placed in churches blind and ignorant mass-mongers, with their Latin babblings and apish ceremonies; who, like cruel wolves, spared not to murder all such, as any thing at all but once whispered against their popery. As for the godly preachers which were in king Edward's time, they were either fled the realm, or else (as the prophets did in king Ahab's days) they were privily kept in corners. As many as the Papists could lay hold on, they were sent into prison, there as lambs waiting when the butchers would call them to the slaughter.

When Dr. Taylor was come into the prison called the King's Bench, he found therein the virtuous and vigilant preacher of God's word, Mr. Bradford; which man, for his innocence and godly living, his devout and virtuous preaching, was worthily counted a miracle of our time, as even his adversaries must needs confess. Finding this man in prison, he began to exhort him to faith, strength, and patience, and to persevere constant unto the end. Mr. Bradford hearing this, thanked God that he had provided him such a comfortable prison-fellow: and so they both together lauded God, and continued in prayer, reading, and exhorting one the other; insomuch, that Dr. Taylor told his friends that came to visit him, that God had most graciously provided for him, to send him to that prison, where he found such an angel of God, to be in his company to comfort him.

Dr. Taylor brought forth to be deprived.

After that Dr. Taylor had lain in prison awhile, he was cited to appear in the arches at Bow church, to answer unto such matter as there should be objected against him. At the day appointed he was led thither, his keeper waiting upon him. Where when he came, he stoutly and strongly defended his marriage, affirming by the scriptures of God, by the doctors of the primitive church, by both laws civil and canon, that it is lawful for priests to marry, and that such as have not the gift of continency are bound in pain of damnation to marry. This did he so plainly prove, that the judge could give no sentence of divorce against him, but gave sentence that he should be deprived of his benefice, because he was married.

You do me wrong then, (quoth Dr. Taylor;) and alleged many laws and constitutions for himself; but all prevailed not. For he was again carried into prison, and his livings taken away, and given to others.

Dr. Taylor brought again before Winchester and other Bishops.

After a year and three-quarters, or thereabout, in the which time the Papists got certain old tyrannous laws (which were put down by king Henry VIII. and by king Edward) to be again revived by parliament; so that now they might, ex officio, cite whom they would upon their own suspicion, and charge him with what articles they listed, and, except they in all things agreed to their purpose, burn them. When these laws were once established, they sent for Dr. Taylor, with certain other prisoners, which were again cited before the chancellor and other commissioners about the 22d of January. The purport and effect of which talk between them, because it is sufficiently described by himself in his own letter written to a friend of his, I have annexed the said letter hereunder, as followeth:

A Letter of Dr. Taylor, containing and reporting the Talk had between him and the Lord Chancellor and other Commissioners, the 22d of January.

Whereas you would have me to write the talk between the king and queen's most honourable council and me on Tuesday the 22d of January, so far as I remember: First, my lord chancellor said, You among others are at this present time sent for, to enjoy the king's and queen's majesties favour and mercy, if you will now rise again with us from the fall which we generally have received in this realm, from the which, God be praised, we are now clearly delivered, miraculously. If you will not rise with us now, and receive mercy now offered, you shall have judgment according to your demerit.—To this I answered, that so to rise should be the greatest fall that ever I could receive: for I should so fall from my dear Saviour Christ to Antichrist. For I do believe that the religion set forth in king Edward's days, was according to the vein of the holy scripture, which containeth fully all the rules of our Christian religion, from the which I do not intend to decline so long as I live, by God's grace.

Then Mr. Secretary Bourne said, Which of the religions mean ye of in king Edward's days? for ye know there were divers books of religion set forth in his days. There was a religion set forth in a catechism by my lord of Canterbury: do you mean that you will stick to that?

I answered, My lord of Canterbury made a catechism to be translated into English, which book was not of his own making: yet he set it forth in his own name; and truly that book for the time did much good. But there was after that set forth by the most innocent king Edward (for whom God be praised everlastingly) the whole church service, with great deliberation, and the advice of the best learned men in the realm; and authorized by the whole parliament, and received and published gladly by the whole realm; which book was never reformed but once, and yet by that one reformation it was so fully perfected, according to the rules of our Christian religion, in every behalf, that no Christian conscience could be offended at any thing therein contained: I mean of that book reformed.

Then my lord chancellor said, Didst thou never read the book that I set forth of the sacrament?—I answered, that I had read it.

Then he said, How liketh thou that book? With that, one of the council, whose name I know not, said, My lord, that is a good question: for I am sure that book stopped all their mouths.—Then said I, My lord, I think many things be far wide from the truth of God's word in that book.

Then my lord said, Thou art a very varlet. To that I answered, That is as ill as raca, or fool.

Then my lord said, Thou art an ignorant beetle-brow. To that I answered, I have read over and over again the holy scriptures, and St. Augustine's works through, St. Cyprian, Eusebius, Origen, Gregory Nazianzene, with divers other books, once through; therefore, I thank God I am not utterly ignorant. Besides these, my lord, I professed the civil laws, as your lordship did, and I have read the canon law also.

Then my lord said, With a corrupt judgment thou readest all things ; touching my profession, it is divinity, in which I have written divers books. Then said I, My lord, ye did write one book, De vera Obedientia ; I would you had been constant in that : for indeed you never did declare a good conscience, that I heard of, but in that one book.

Then my lord said, Tut, tut, tut ! I wrote against Bucer in priests' marriages ; but such books please not such wretches as thou art, which hast been married many years.

To that I answered, I am married indeed, and I have had nine children in holy matrimony, I thank God ; and this I am sure of, that your proceedings now at this present in this realm against priests' marriages, is the maintenance of the doctrine of devils, against natural law, civil law, canon law, general counsels, canons of the apostles, ancient doctors, and God's laws.

Then spake my lord of Durham, saying, You have professed the civil law, as you say : then you know that Justinian writeth, that priests should at their taking of orders swear, that they were never married ; and he bringeth in to prove that, Canones Apostolorum.

To that I answered, That I did not remember any such law of Justinian. But I am sure that Justinian writeth in Titulo de indieta Viduitate, in God, That if one would bequeath to his wife in his testament a legacy, under a condition that she should never marry again, and take an oath of her for accomplishing the same, yet she may marry again if he die, notwithstanding the aforesaid conditions and oath taken and made against marriage ; and an oath is another manner of obligation made to God, than is a papistieal vow made to man. Moreover, in the Pandects it is contained, that if a man doth manumit his handmaid, under a condition that she shall never marry ; yet she may marry, and her patron shall lose jus patronatus, for his adding of the unnatural and unlawful condition against matrimony.

Then my lord chancellor said, Thou sayest that priests may be married by God's law ; how provest thou that ?

I answered, By the plain words and sentences of St. Paul, both to Timothy and to Titus, where he speaks most evidently of the marriage of priests, deacons, and bishops ; and Chrysostom writing upon the Epistle to Timothy, saith, It is an heresy to say that a bishop may not be married.

Then said my lord chancellor, Thou liest of Chrysostom ; but thou dost, as all thy companions do, belie ever without shame both the scriptures and the doctors. Didst thou not also say, that by the canon law priests may be married ? which is most untrue, and the contrary is most true.

I answered, We read in the decrees, that the four general councils, (of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon,) have the same authority that the four Evangelists have. And we read in the same decrees, (which is one of the chief books of the canon law,) that the council of Nice, by the means of one Paphnutius, did allow priests' and bishops' marriages : therefore, by the best part of the canon law, priests may be married.

Then my lord chancellor said, Thou falsifiest the general council : for there is express mention in the said decree, that priests should be divorced from their wives which be married. Then said I, If those words be there, as you say, then am I content to lose this great head of mine. Let the book be fetched.

Then spake my lord of Durham, Though they be not there, yet they may be in Ecclesiastica Historia, which Eusebius wrote, out of which book the decree was taken.

To that said I, It is not like that the Pope would leave out any such sentence, having such authority, and making so much for his purpose.

Then my lord chancellor said, Gratian was but a patcher, and thou art glad to snatch up such a patch as maketh for thy purpose.

I answered, My lord, I cannot but marvel that you do call one of the chief Papists that ever was, but a patcher.

Then my lord chancellor said, Nay, I call thee a snatcher and patcher. To make an end, Wilt thou not return again with us to the Catholic church ? And with that he arose.

And I said, By God's grace I will never depart from Christ's church. Then I required that I might have some of my friends to come to me in prison : and my lord chancellor said, Thou shalt have judgment within this week. And so was I delivered again unto my keeper. My lord of Durham would that I should believe as my father and my mother did. I alleged St. Augustine, that we ought to prefer God's word before all men.

Dr. Taylor the fourth time, with Mr. Bradford and Mr. Sanders, brought before Winchester and other Bishops.

Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Sanders, were again called to appear before the bishop of Winchester, the bishops of Norwich, of London, of Salisbury, and of Durham, and there charged again with heresy and schism ; and therefore a determinate answer was required, whether they would submit themselves to the Roman bishop, and abjure their errors ? or else they would, according to their laws, proceed to their condemnation.

When Dr. Taylor and his fellows, Mr. Bradford and Mr. Sanders, heard this, they answered stoutly and boldly, That they would not depart from the truth which they had preached in king Edward's days, neither would they submit themselves to the Romish Antichrist ; but they thanked God for so great mercy, that he would call them to be worthy to suffer for his word and truth.

When the bishops saw them so boldly, constantly, and unmoveably fixed in the truth, they read the sentence of death upon them ; which when they had heard, they most joyfully gave God thanks, and stontly said unto the bishops, " We doubt not but God, the righteous judge, will require our blood at your hands, and the proudest of you all shall repent this receiving again of Antiehrst, and your tyranny that ye now shew against the flock of Christ.

So was Dr. Taylor now condemned, committed to the Clink, and the keepers charged straitly to keep him : For ye have now another manner of charge (quoth the lord chancellor) than ye had before ; therefore look that ye take heed to it.

When the keeper brought him towards the prison, the people flocked about to gaze upon him ; unto whom he said, " God be praised, good people, I am come away from them undefiled, and will confirm the truth with my blood." So he was put in the Clink till it was towards night, and then was removed to the Compter by the Poultry.

When Dr. Taylor had lain in the said Compter in the Poultry a seven-night, or thereabouts, prisoner, the 4th day of February, anno 1555, Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, with others, came to the said Compter to degrade him, bringing with them such ornaments as do appertain to their massing mummery. Now being come, he called for the said Dr. Taylor to be brought unto him, the bishop being then in the chamber where the keeper of the Compter and his wife lay. So Dr. Taylor was brought down from the chamber above that, to the said Bonner ; and at his coming the bishop said, Mr. Doctor, I would you would remember yourself, and turn to your mother holy church ; so may you do well enough, and I will sue for your pardon. Whereunto

Mr. Taylor answered, "I would you and your fellows would turn to Christ: as for me, I will not turn to Antichrist." Well, quoth the bishop, I am come to degrade you: wherefore put on these vestures. No, (quoth Dr. Taylor,) I will not. Wilt thou not? said the bishop; I shall make thee ere I go. Quoth Dr. Taylor, You shall not, by the grace of God. Then he charged him upon his obedience to do it, but he would not do it for him.

So he willed another to put them upon his back; and when he was thoroughly furnished therewith, he set his hands to his side, walking up and down, and said, How say you, my lord, am not I a goodly fool? How say you, my masters, if I were in Cheapside, should not I have boys enow to laugh at these apish toys, and toying trumpery? So the bishop scraped his fingers, thumbs, and the crown of his head, and did the rest of such like devilish observances.

At the last, when he should have given Dr. Taylor a stroke on the breast with his erosier-staff, the bishop's chaplain said, My lord, strike him not, for he will sure strike again. Yea, by St. Peter, will I, (quoth Dr. Taylor;) the cause is Christ's, and I were no good Christian if I would not fight in my Master's quarrel. So the bishop laid his curse upon him, but struck him not. Then Dr. Taylor said, Though you do curse me, yet God doth bless me. I have the witness of my conscience, that ye have done me wrong and violence; and yet I pray God, if it be his will, forgive you: but from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us. And in going up to his chamber, he still said, God deliver me from you! God deliver me from you! And when he came up, he told Mr. Bradford (for they both lay in one chamber) that he had made the bishop of London afraid: For, saith he, laughingly, his chaplain gave him counsel not to strike me with his erosier-staff, for that I would strike again; and truly, (said he, rubbing his hands,) I made him believe I would do so indeed.

The night after that he was degraded, his wife and his son Thomas resorted unto him, and were by the gentleness of the keepers permitted to sup with him. For this difference was ever found between the keepers of the bishops' prisons and the keepers of the king's prisons, that the bishops' keepers were ever cruel, blasphemous, and tyrannous, like their masters; but the keepers of the king's prisons shewed, for the most part, as much favour as they possibly might.

So came Dr. Taylor's wife, his son, and John Hull, his servant, to sup with him; and at their coming in, before supper, they kneeled down and prayed, saying the Litany.

After supper, walking up and down, he gave God thanks for his grace, that had so called him, and given him strength to abide by his holy word; and turning to his son Thomas, "My dear son, (said he,) Almighty God bless thee, and give thee his holy Spirit, to be a true servant of Christ, to learn his word, and constantly to stand by his truth all thy life long. And, my son, see that thou fear God always. Flee from all sin and wicked living; be virtuous, serve God with daily prayer, and apply to thy book. In any wise see that thou be obedient to thy mother, love her and serve her; be ruled by her now in thy youth, and follow her good counsel in all things. Beware of lewd company, of young men that fear not God, but follow their lewd lusts and vain appetites. Fly from whoredom, and hate all filthy living, remembering that I thy father do die in the defence of holy marriage. Another day, when God shall bless thee, love and cherish the poor people, and count that thy chief riches is to be rich in alms; and when thy mother is waxed old, forsake her not; but provide for her to thy power, and see that she lack nothing. For so will God bless thee, and give thee long life on earth, and prosperity; which I pray God to grant thee."

Then turning to his wife, "My dear wife, (quoth he,) continue steadfast in the fear and love of God; keep yourself undefiled from their popish idolatries and superstitions. I have been unto you a faithful yoke-fellow, and so have you been unto me; for the which I pray God to reward you, and doubt not, dear wife, but God will reward it.

"Now the time is come that I shall be taken from you, and you discharged of the wedlock-bond towards me: therefore I will give you my counsel what I think most expedient for you: You are yet a child-bearing woman, and therefore it will be most convenient for you to marry. For doubtless you shall never be at a convenient stay for yourself and our poor children, nor out of trouble, till you be married. Therefore, as soon as God will provide it, marry with some honest faithful man that feareth God. Doubt you not, God will provide an honest husband for you, and he will be a merciful father to you and to my children; whom I pray you to bring up in the fear of God, and in learning, to the uttermost of your power, and keep them from this Romish idolatry."

When he had thus said, they with weeping tears prayed together, and kissed one the other: and he gave to his wife a book of the church-service, set out by king Edward, which he in the time of his imprisonment daily used. And unto his son, Thomas, he gave a Latin book, containing the notable sayings of the old martyrs, gathered out of Ecclesiastica Historia; and in the end of that book he wrote his testament and last vale, as hereafter followeth.

The last Will and Testament of Dr. Taylor.

"I say to my wife, and to my children, The Lord gave you unto me, and the Lord hath taken me from you, and you from me: blessed be the name of the Lord. I believe that they are blessed which die in the Lord. God careth for sparrows, and for the hairs of our heads: I have ever found him more faithful and favourable than is any father or husband. Trust ye, therefore, in him, by the means of our dear Saviour Christ's merit: believe, love, fear, and obey him. Pray to him, for he hath promised to help. Count me not dead, for I shall certainly live, and never die. I go before, and you shall follow after, to our long home. I go to the rest of my children, Susan, George, Ellen, Robert, and Zachary: I have bequeathed you to the only Omnipotent.

"I say to my dear friends of Hadley, and to all others which have heard me preach, that I depart hence with a quiet conscience, as touching my doctrine, for the which I pray you thank God with me. For I have after my little talent declared to others those lessons that I gathered out of God's book, the blessed Bible. Therefore if I or an angel from heaven should preach to you any other gospel than that ye have received, God's great curse upon that preacher.

"Beware, for God's sake, that ye deny not God, neither decline from the word of faith, lest God decline from you, and so ye do everlastingly perish. For God's sake, beware of Popery, for though it appear to have in it unity, yet the same is vanity and antichristianity, and not in Christ's faith and verity.

"The Lord grant all men his good and holy Spirit, increase of his wisdom, contemning the wicked world, hearty desire to be with God and the heavenly company, through Jesus Christ our only mediator, advocate, righteousness, life, sanctification, and hope, Amen. Pray, pray, pray.

"ROWLAND TAYLOR.

"Departing hence in sure hope, without any doubt of eternal salvation, I thank God my heavenly Father, through Jesus Christ my certain Saviour, Amen.

"The Lord is my light and my salvation: whom then shall I fear?" Psa. xxvii.

"God is he that justifieth: who is he that can condemn?" Rom. viii.

"In thee, O Lord, have I trusted: let me never be confounded." Psa. xxx.

On the morrow, after that Dr. Taylor had supped with his wife in the Compter, as is before expressed, which was the fifth day of February, the sheriff of London with his officers came to the Compter by two of the clock in the morning, and so brought forth Dr. Taylor, and without any light led him to the Woolsaek, an inn without Aldgate. Dr. Taylor's wife suspecting that her husband should that night be carried away, watched all night in St. Butolph's church-porch beside Aldgate, having with her two children; the one named Elizabeth, of thirteen years of age, (whom, being left without father or mother, Dr. Taylor had brought up of alms from three years old,) the other named Mary, his own daughter.

Now when the sheriff and his company came against St. Butolph's church, Elizabeth cried, saying, O my dear father! Mother, mother, here is my father led away! Then cried his wife, Rowland, Rowland, where art thou? for it was a very dark morning, that the one could not see the other. Dr. Taylor answered, Dear wife, I am here; and stayed. The sheriff's men would have led him forth; but the sheriff said, Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife: so they stayed.

Then came she to him, and he took his daughter Mary in his arms; and he, his wife, and Elizabeth, kneeled down, and said the Lord's prayer; at which sight the sheriff wept apace, and so did divers others of the company. After they had prayed, he rose up, and kissed his wife, and shook her by the hand, and said, Farewell, my dear wife; be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience. God shall stir up a father for my children. And then he kissed his daughter Mary, and said, God bless thee, and make thee his servant; and, kissing Elizabeth, he said, God bless thee. I pray you all stand strong and steadfast unto Christ and his word, and keep you from idolatry. Then said his wife, God be with thee, dear Rowland; I will, with God's grace, meet thee at Hadley.

And so was he led forth to the Woolsaek, and his wife followed him. As soon as they came there he was put into a chamber, wherein he was kept with four yeomen of the guard and the sheriff's men. Dr. Taylor, as soon as he was come into the chamber, fell down on his knees, and gave himself wholly to prayer. The sheriff then seeing Dr. Taylor's wife there, would in no ease grant her to speak any more with her husband, but gently desired her to go to his house, and take it as her own, and promised her she should lack nothing; and sent two officers to conduct her thither. Notwithstanding, she desired to go to her mother's, whither the officers led her, and charged her mother to keep her there till they came again.

Thus remained Dr. Taylor in the Woolsaek, kept by the sheriff and his company, till eleven of the clock. At which time the sheriff of Essex was ready to receive him; and so they set him on horseback within the inn, the gates being shut.

At the coming out of the gates, John Hull, before spoken of, stood at the rails with Thomas, Dr. Taylor's son. When Dr. Taylor saw them, he called them, saying, Come hither, my son Thomas. And John Hull lifted the child up, and set him on the horse before his father; and Dr. Taylor put off his hat, and said to the people that stood there looking on him, Good people, this is mine own son, begotten of my body in lawful matrimony; and God be blessed for lawful matrimony. Then lifted he up his eyes towards heaven, and prayed for his son, laid his hat upon the child's head, and blessed him; and so delivered the child to John Hull, whom he took by the hand, and said, Farewell, John Hull, the faithfullest servant that ever man had. And so they rode forth, the sheriff of Essex, with four yeomen of the guard, and the sheriff's men leading him.

When they were come almost to Burntwood, one Arthur Faysie, a man of Hadley, (who before-time had been Dr. Taylor's servant,) met with them, and he, supposing him to have been at liberty, said, Master doctor, I am glad to see you again at liberty; and came to him and shook him by the hand. Soft, sir, (quoth the sheriff;) he is a prisoner: what hast thou to do with him? I cry your merey, (said Arthur;) I knew not so much, and I thought it no offence to talk to a true man. The sheriff was very angry with this, and threatened to carry Arthur with him to prison; notwithstanding, he bade him get quickly away, and so they rode forth to Burntwood; where they caused to be made for Dr. Taylor a close hood, with two holes for his eyes to look out at, and a slit for his mouth to breathe at. This they did that no man should know him, nor he speak to any man.

Which practice they used also with others: their own consciences told them, that they led innocent lambs to the slaughter: wherefore they feared, lest if the people should have heard them speak, or have seen them, they might have been much more strengthened by their godly exhortations to stand steadfast in God's word, and to fly the superstitions and idolatries of Papacy.

All the way Dr. Taylor was joyful and merry as one that accounted himself going to a most pleasant banquet or bridal. He spake many notable things to the sheriff and yeomen of the guard that conducted him, and often moved them to weep through his much earnest calling upon them to repent, and to amend their evil and wicked living. Oftentimes also he caused them to wonder and rejoice to see him so constant and steadfast, void of all fear, joyful in heart, and glad to die. Of these yeomen of the guard, three used Dr. Taylor friendly, but the fourth, whose name was Holmes, used him very homely, unkind, and ehurlishly. At Chelmsford met them the sheriff of Suffolk, there to receive him, and to carry him forth into Suffolk: and being at supper, the sheriff of Essex very earnestly laboured him to return to the popish religion, thinking with fair words to persuade him, and said, Good master doctor, we are right sorry for you, considering what the loss is of such a one as ye might be, if ye would: God hath given you great learning and wisdom, wherefore ye have been in great favour and reputation in times past with the council and highest of this realm. Besides this, ye are a man of goodly personage, in your best strength, and by nature like to live many years, and, without doubt, ye should in time to come be in as good reputation as ever ye were, or rather better. For ye are well beloved of all men, as well for your virtues as for your learning; and we think it were great pity you should east away yourself willingly, and so come to such a painful and shameful death. Ye should do much better to revoke your opinions, and return to the Catholic universal church of Rome, acknowledge the pope's holiness to be the supreme head of the church, and to reconcile yourself to him. You may do well yet, if you will; doubt ye not but ye shall find favour at the queen's hands; I and all these your friends will be suitors for your pardon, which no doubt ye shall obtain. This counsel I give you, good master doctor, of good heart and good will towards you; and thereupon drink to you. In like manner said all the yeomen of the guard: upon that condition, master doctor, we will all drink to you.

When they had all drank to him, and the enp was come to him, he stayed a little as one studying what answer he might give. At the last thus he answered and said, Mr. Sheriff, and my masters all, I heartily thank you for your good will; I have hearkened to your words, and marked well your counsels; and, to be plain with you, I do perceive that I have been deceived myself, and am like to deceive a great many of Hadley of their expectation. With that word they all rejoiced. Yea, good master doctor, (quoth the sheriff,) God's blessing on your heart; hold you there still. It is the comfortabest word that we heard you speak yet. What, should ye cast away yourself in vain! Play a wise man's part, and I dare warrant it ye shall find favour. Thus they rejoiced very much at the word, and were very merry.

At the last, Good master doctor, (quoth the sheriff,) what meant ye by this, that ye say ye think ye have been deceived yourself, and think ye shall deceive many one in Hadley?—Would ye know my meaning plainly? (quoth he.)—Yea, (quoth the sheriff,) good master doctor, tell us plainly.—Then said Dr. Taylor, I will tell you how I have been deceived, and as I think I shall deceive a great many: I am, as you see, a man that hath a very great carcase, which I thought should have been buried in Hadley church-yard, if I had died in my bed, as I well hoped I should have done: but herein I see I was deceived; and there are a great number of worms in Hadley church-yard, which should have had jolly feeding upon this carrion, which they have looked for many a day. But now I know we be deceived, both I and they: for this carcase must be burnt to ashes, and so shall they lose their bait and feeding that they looked for.

When the sheriff and his company heard him say so, they were amazed, and looked on one another, marvelling at the man's constant mind, that thus without all fear made but a jest at the cruel torment and death now at hand prepared for him. Thus was their expectation clean disappointed.

Dr. Taylor was at Chelmsford delivered to the sheriff of Suffolk, and by him conducted to Hadley, where he suffered. When they were come to Lanham, the sheriff stayed there two days; and thither came to him a great number of gentlemen and justices upon great horses, which all were appointed to aid the sheriff. These gentlemen laboured Dr. Taylor very sore to reduce him to the Romish religion, promising him his pardon: which, said they, we have here for you. They promised him great promotions, yea, a bishopric, if he would take it. But all their labour and flattering words were in vain; for he had not built his house upon the sand, in peril of falling at every puff of wind, but upon a sure and unmoveable rock, Christ. Wherefore he abode constant and unmoveable unto the end.

After two days, the sheriff and his company led Dr. Taylor towards Hadley; and coming within two miles of Hadley, he desired to alight off his horse. Which done, he leaped and took a frisk or two, as men commonly do in dancing. Why, master doctor, (quoth the sheriff,) how do you now? He answered, Well, God be praised, good master sheriff; never better, for now I know I am almost at home; I lack not past two stiles to go over, and I am even at my Father's house. But, master sheriff, (said he,) shall we not go through Hadley? Yes, (said the sheriff,) you shall go through Hadley. Then said he, O good Lord, I thank thee, I shall yet once ere I die see my flock, whom thou, Lord, knowest I have most heartily loved, and truly taught. Good Lord, bless them, and keep them steadfast in thy word and truth.

When they were now come to Hadley, and came riding over the bridge, at the bridge foot waited a poor man with five small children; who, when he saw Dr. Taylor, he and his children fell down upon their knees, and held up their hands, and cried with a loud voice, and said, O dear father, and good shepherd, Dr. Taylor, God help and succour thee, as thou hast many a time succoured me and my poor children! Such witness had the servant of God of his virtuous and charitable alms given in his life-time; for God would now the poor should testify of his good deeds, to his singular comfort, to the example of others, and confusion of his persecutors and tyrannous adversaries. For the sheriff, and others that led him to death, were wonderfully astonished at this; and the sheriff sore rebuked the poor man for so crying.

The streets of Hadley were beset on both sides the way with men and women, who waited to see him; whom when they beheld so led to death, with weeping eyes and lamentable voices they cried, saying one to another, Ah, good Lord! there goeth our good shepherd from us, that so faithfully hath taught us, so fatherly hath eared for us, and so godly hath governed us. O merciful God! what shall we poor scattered lambs do! What shall come of this most wicked world! Good Lord, strengthen him, and comfort him; with such other most lamentable and piteous voices.—Wherefore the people were sore rebuked by the sheriff, and catch-poles his men, that led him; and Dr. Taylor evermore said to the people, I have preached to you God's word and truth, and am come this day to seal it with my blood.

Coming against the alms-houses, which he well knew, he cast to the poor people money, which remained of what good people had given him in time of his imprisonment. As for his living, they took it from him at his first going to prison, so that he was sustained all the time of his imprisonment by the charitable alms of good people that visited him. Therefore the money that now remained, he put in a glove ready for the same purpose, and, as is said, gave it to the poor alms-men standing at their doors to see him.

And coming to the last of the alms-houses, and not seeing the poor that there dwelt ready at their doors, as the other were, he asked, Is the blind man and blind woman that dwelt here alive? It was answered, Yea, they are there within. Then threw he glove and all in at the window, and so rode forth.

Thus this good father and provider for the poor now took leave of those for whom all his life he had a singular care and study. For this was his custom once a fortnight at least, to call upon sir Anthony Doyle, and others the rich cloth-makers, to go with him to the alms-houses, and there to see how the poor lived, what they lacked in meat, drink, clothing, bedding, or any other necessities. The like did he also to the other poor men that had many children, or were sick. Then would he exhort and comfort them, and, where he found cause, rebuke the unruly; and what they lacked, that gave he after his power; and what he was not able, he caused the rich and wealthy men to minister unto them. Thus shewed he himself in all things an example to his flock, worthy to be followed; and taught by his deed what a great treasure alms is to all such as cheerfully for Christ's sake do it.

At the last, coming to Aldham common, the place assigned where he should suffer, and seeing a great multitude of people gathered thither, he asked, What place is this, and what meaneth it that so many people are gathered hither? It was answered, It is Aldham common, the place where you must suffer: and the people are come to look upon you. Then said he, Thauked be God, I am even at home: and so alighted from his horse, and with both his hands tore the hood from his head.

Now was his head knotted evil-favouredly, and clipped much like as a man would clip a fool's head; which cost the good bishop Bonner bestowed upon him when he degraded him. But when the people saw his reverend and ancient face, with a long white beard, they burst out with weeping tears, and cried, saying, God save thee, good Dr. Taylor! Jesus Christ strengthen thee, and help thee! the Holy Ghost comfort thee! with such other like godly wishes. Then would he have spoken to the people, but the yeomen of the guard were so busy about him, that as soon as he opened his mouth one or other thrust a tipstaff into his mouth, and would in no wise permit him to speak.

Then desired he license of the sheriff to speak; but the sheriff denied it to him, and bade him remember his promise to the council. Well, (quoth Dr. Taylor,) promises must be kept. What this promise was, it is unknown; but the common fame was, that after he and others were condemned, the council sent for them, and threatened them they would cut their tongues out of their heads, except they would promise that at their deaths they would keep silence, and not speak to the people. Wherefore they, desirous to have the use of their tongues, to call upon God as long as they might live, promised silence. For the Papists feared much, lest this mutation of religion from truth to lies, from Christ's ordinances to the popish traditions, should not so quietly have been received as it was, especially this burning of the preachers.

But thanks be to God, who gave to his witnesses faith and patience, with stout and manly hearts to despise all torments; neither was there so much as any one man that once shewed any sign of disobedience towards the magistrates. They shed their blood gladly in the defence of the truth, so leaving example unto all men of true and perfect obedience; which is to obey God more than men, and, if need require it, to shed their own blood rather than to depart from God's truth.

Dr. Taylor perceiving that he could not be suffered to speak, sat down, and seeing one named Soyce, he called him, and said, Soyce, I pray thee come and pull off my boots, and take them for thy labour; thou hast long looked for them, now take them. Then rose he up, and put off his clothes unto his shirt, and gave them away. Which when he had done, he said with a loud voice, Good people, I have taught you nothing but God's holy word, and those lessons that I have taken out of God's blessed book, the holy Bible; and I am come hither this day to seal it with my blood. With that word, Holmes, yeoman of the guard aforesaid, (who had used Dr. Taylor very cruelly all the way,) gave him a great stroke upon the head with a waster, and said, Is that the keeping of thy promise, thou heretic? Then he, seeing they would not permit him to speak, kneeled down and prayed, and a poor woman that was among the people stepped in and prayed with him; but her they thrust away, and threatened to tread her down with horses; notwithstanding, she would not remove, but abode and prayed with him. When he had prayed, he went to the stake, and kissed it, and set himself into a pitch barrel, which they had set for him to stand in; and so stood with his back upright against the stake, with his hands folded together, and his eyes toward heaven; and so he continually prayed.

Then they bound him with chains, and the sheriff called one Richard Donningham, a butcher, and commanded him to set up faggots; but he refused to do it, and said, I am lame, sir, and not able to lift a faggot. The sheriffs threatened to send him to prison; notwithstanding, he would not do it.

Then appointed he one Mulleine, of Carsey, a man for his virtues fit not be a hangman, and Soyce, a drunkard, and Warwick, who in the commotion time in king Edward's days lost one of his ears for his seditious talk; amongst whom also was one Robert King, a deviser of interludes, who albeit was there present, and had doing there with the gunpowder: what he meant and did therein, (he himself saith he did it for the best, and for quick despatch,) the Lord knoweth, who shall judge all.

These four were appointed to set up the faggots, and to make the fire; which they most diligently did; and this Warwick cruelly cast a faggot at him, which hit him upon his head, and brake his face, that the blood ran down his visage. Then said Dr. Taylor, O friend, I have harm enough: what needed that?

Furthermore, sir John Shelton there standing by, as Dr. Taylor was speaking and saying the psalm Miserere, in English, struck him on the lips: Ye knave, said he, speak Latin; I will make thee. At the last they set to fire; and Dr. Taylor holding up both his hands, called upon God, and said, Merciful Father of heaven, for Jesus Christ my Saviour's sake, receive my soul into thy hands. So stood he still without either crying or moving, with his hands folded together, till Soyce with a halbert struck him on the head that the brains fell out, and the dead corpse fell down into the fire.

Thus rendered the man of God his blessed soul into the hands of his merciful Father, and to his most dear and certain Saviour Jesus Christ, whom he most entirely loved, faithfully and earnestly preached, obediently followed in living, and constantly glorified in death.

They that were present, and familiarly conversant with this Dr. Taylor, reported of him, that they never did see in him any fear of death, but especially and above all the rest which besides him suffered at the same time, always shewed himself merry and cheerful in time of his imprisonment, as well before his condemnation as after; he kept one countenance and like behaviour. Whereunto he was the rather confirmed by the company and presence of Mr. John Bradford, who then was in prison and chamber with him.

The same morning when he was called up by the sheriff to go to his burning, about three of the clock in the morning, being suddenly awaked out of his sound sleep, he sat up in his bed, and putting on his shirt, said these words, speaking somewhat thick after his accustomed manner, Ah, whoreson thieves! ah, whoreson thieves! rob God of his honour, rob God of his honour! Afterwards being risen, and tying his points, he cast his arms about a balk which was in the chamber between Mr. Bradford's bed and his; and there hanging by the hands, said to Mr. Bradford, O Mr. Bradford, what a notable sway should I give, if I were hanged! (meaning for that he was a corpulent and big man.) These things I thought good here to note, to set forth and declare to those that shall read this history, what a notable and singular gift of spirit and courage God had given to this godly and blessed martyr.

After that Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, had got the laws and the secular arm on his side, as ye have heard, with full power and authority to reign and rule as he listed, and had brought these godly bishops and reverend preachers aforesaid under foot, namely, the archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, Mr. Latimer, Mr. Hooper, bishop of Worcester, and Gloucester, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Sanders, Dr. Taylor, and Mr. Bradford; all which he had now presently condemned, and some also burned: he supposed now all had been cock-sure, and that Christ had been conquered for ever, so that the people being terrified with example of these great learned men condemned, never would nor durst once stir against their violent religion. Not much unlike in this behalf to the Turks, who when they cannot maintain their sect by good learning and truth of God's word, think by violence of sword to force whom they can to their belief; and that done, afterwards make laws, no man under pain of heresy to dispute, or once to call in question any of their proceedings. Even so Stephen Gardiner and his fellows when they see they cannot prevail by trial of God's word, (neither are disposed simply to seek for truth where it is to be found,) they take exceptions against it, affirming it to be intricate, obscure, and insufficient to be its own judge, and therefore that of necessity it must be judged by the pope's church; and so having kings and queens on their side, they seek not to persuade by the word of God, nor to win by charity; but instead of the law of God they use, as the proverb saith, τῷ νόμῳ χειρῶν, compelling men by death, fire, and sword, as the Turks do, to believe what in very deed they think not. And indeed after flesh and blood this seemeth to be a sure way. Neither, peradventure, are they ignorant how well this way thriveth with the Turks; and therefore they think to practise the same. And thus condemned they these godly learned preachers and bishops aforesaid.

But they were deceived: for within eight or nine days after Stephen Gardiner had given sentence against Mr. Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Sanders, Dr. Taylor, and Mr. Bradford, (being the 8th of February,) six other good men were brought likewise before the bishops for the same cause of religion, to be examined, whose names were William Pigot, butcher, Stephen Knight, barber, Thomas Tomkins, weaver, Thomas Haukes, gentleman, John Lawrence, priest, William Hunter, apprentice.

Stephen Gardiner seeing thus his device disappointed, and that cruelty in this case would not serve to his expectation, gave over the matter as utterly discouraged, and from that day meddled no more in such kind of condemnations, but referred the whole doing thereof to Bonner, bishop of London; who supplied his part completely.

Thus bishop Bonner taking the matter in hand, called before him in his consistory at Paul's, (the lord mayor and certain aldermen sitting with him,) the six persons aforesaid, upon the 8th of February, in the year aforesaid, and on the next day, being the 9th of February, read the sentence of condemnation upon them, as appeareth in Bonner's own registers; such quick speed these men could make in despatching their business. Notwithstanding, because the death of these condemned martyrs did not follow immediately, before the next month of March, I will defer the account till I come to the time and day of their suffering.

In the mean time, what was the cause that their execution was so long deferred after their condemnation, I have not precisely to say, unless peradventure the sermon of Alphonsus, the Spanish friar, and the king's confessor, did some good. For so I find, that when those six persons were cast upon Saturday the 9th of February, upon Sunday following, which was the 10th, the said Alphonsus, a gray friar, preached before the king: in which sermon he did earnestly inveigh against the bishops for burning of men, saying plainly that they learned it not in scripture, to burn any for his conscience; but the contrary, that they should live and be converted, with many other things more to the same purport. But touching the lingering of these men's death, as I have not certainly to affirm, so let it pass.

Upon the 14th of February, Mr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, was sent towards St. David's, there to be condemned and executed. Touching whose martyrdom, forasmuch as it fell not before the month of March, we will defer the history thereof till we come to the day and time of his suffering.

Furthermore, this aforesaid 14th day of February, the lord chancellor and other his fellow bishops, caused the image of Thomas Becket, that old Romish traitor, to be set up over the Mercer's chapel-door in Cheapside, in London, in the form and shape of a bishop, with mitre and crosier. But within two days after his erection his two blessing fingers were broken away, and on the next day, being the 17th of February, his head was stricken off. Whereupon arose great trouble, and many were suspected; among whom one Mr. John Barnes, mercer, dwelling over against the same chapel, was vehemently, by the lord chancellor, charged withal as the doer thereof, and the rather for that he was a professor of the truth. Wherefore he and three of his servants were committed to prison; and at his delivery, (although it could not be proved upon him,) he was bound in a great sum of money as well to build it up again as often as it should be broken down, as also to watch and keep the same. And therefore at this his compelled charges the image was again set up the 2d day of March then next ensuing. But the 14th day of the same month, in the night, the head of that dangerous beast, over whom there was such a charge given, was again the second time broken off: which thing was so heinously taken, that the next day (being the 15th day) there was proclamation made in London, that whosoever would tell who did strike off his head, if he were of counsel, and not the principal doer, he should have not only his pardon, but also one hundred crowns of gold, with hearty thanks. But it was not known who did it.

The 18th of February, queen Mary at length, after long delay, made full answer to the king of Denmark's letter, who had written before two letters to the said queen, in the behalf of Mr. Coverdale, for his deliverance, who at that time went under sureties, and was in great danger, had he not been rescued by the great suit and letters of the said king of Denmark.

The matter and copy of which his suit and letters, as they came to our hands, we have set forth and expressed, whereby the singular love of this good king towards the truth of God's word, and the professors thereof, might the better appear to the world.—Fox, vol. 3, p. 149.

First, this virtuous and godly king Christianus, hearing of the captivity of Miles Coverdale, of whom he had had some knowledge before (being there in Denmark in king Henry the Eighth's time) and lamenting his dangerous case, and partly through the intercession of Mr. Machabens, superintendent in Denmark, who was partly of kin to Mr. Coverdale's wife, made intercession by letters to queen Mary, desiring and requesting the said Miles Coverdale to be sent unto him. The date of which letters was about the kalends of May, anno 1554.

The same month, the 19th day, was a certain intimation set forth and printed in the name of Bonner, wherein was contained a general monition and strait charge given to every man and woman within his dioecse, to prepare themselves against Lent, then near approaching, to receive the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation sent from the pope, Julius III. by Pole, his cardinal and legate de latere, and so receive also the joyful benefit of absolution, being sent first from the cardinal to Bonner, and from him to every of his archdeacons, to be ministered to every private person within his dioecse that would come the said holy time of Lent to his pastor or curate to be confessed, and to receive of him wholesome counsel, penance, and absolution. Signifying, moreover, that as he was authorized by the aforesaid cardinal, so he for the same purpose had endued with the like authority all and singular pastors and curates within his dioecse, to reconcile and liberate from their former heresy and schism, and from the censures of the church, such as would resort unto them. And lest any scruple or doubt, rising peradventure in their conscience, should be any stay or let in this behalf, he hath assigned and deputed therefore through his dioecse certain learned men, to whom they might resort, or else might open their griefs to any of his archdeacons, or else come to his own person, and so should be resolved.

And therefore all manner of doubts and obstacles set aside, he straitly willed and commanded every man and woman to come to confession, and to enjoy this benefit of reconciliation and absolution against the first Sunday next after Easter ensuing, and not to fail. For the which purpose he had specially commanded the pastors and curates of every parish to certify up in writing the names of every man and woman so reconciled.

The lamentable History of Mr. JAMES HALES, Judge.

In the history of Mr. Hooper mention was made of Judge Hales. But here we will report somewhat of the communication between the bishop of Winchester and him; declaring withal how false and untrue the excuse of our adversaries is, which so precisely by the law defend themselves, and say, that in all their doings they did nothing but by the law, to bear them out. Which if it be so, how did they then to Anne Askew? What law had they, when they had condemned her first for a dead woman, then afterwards to rack her? By what law did they call up Mr. Hooper, and imprison him for the queen's debt, when the queen in very deed did owe him fourscore pounds, and kept him a year and a half in prison, and gave him never a penny? By what law did bishop Bonner condemn and burn Richard Mekins, a lad of fifteen years, when the first jury had acquitted him, and he at the stake revoked all heresies, and praised the said Bonner to be a good man? and also having him in prison, would not suffer his father and mother to come to him to comfort their own child? What law had they to put Mr. Rogers in prison, when he did neither preach nor read lecture after the time of the queen's inhibition, and when they had kept him in his own house half a year, being not deprived of any living, yet would not let him have an halfpenny of his own livings to relieve him, his wife, and eleven children? By what law was Thomas Tomkins' hand burnt, and afterwards his body consumed to ashes? What good law or honesty was there to burn the three poor women at Gurnsey, with the infant child falling out of the mother's womb, when they all before their death recanted their words and opinions, and were never abjured before? So here likewise in this case, what order or right of law did Stephen Gardiner follow in troubling and imprisoning judge Hales, when he had done nothing either against God's law or man's law, in proceeding by order of law against certain presumptuous persons, which both before the law, and against the law then in force, took upon them to say their mass, as ye shall hear in these his answers and communication had with Stephen Gardiner here under ensuing.

The Conversation between the Lord Chancellor and Judge Hales, in Westminster Hall, the 6th of October, 1553.

Chan. Mr. Hales, ye shall understand, that like as the queen's highness hath heretofore conceived good opinion of you, especially for that ye stood both faithfully and lawfully in her cause of just succession, refusing to set your hand to the book among others that were against her grace in that behalf; so now, through your own late deserts against certain her highness's doings, ye stand no well in her grace's favour; and therefore before ye take any oath, it shall be necessary for you to make your purgation.

Hales. I pray you, my lord, what is the cause?

Chan. Information is given that ye have indicted certain priests in Kent for saying mass.

Hales. My lord, it is not so, I indicted none; but indeed certain indietments of like matter were brought before me at the last assizes there holden, and I gave order therein as the law required. For I have professed the law, against which in cases of justice I will never, God willing, proceed, nor in any wise dissemble, but with the same shew forth my conscience; and if it were to do again, I would do no less than I did.

Chan. Yea, Mr. Hales, your conscience is known well enough, I know you lack no conscience.

Hales. My lord, you may do well to search your own conscience; for mine is better known to myself than to you. And to be plain, I did as well use justice in your said mass-case by my conscience as by law, wherein I am fully bent to stand in trial to the uttermost that can be objected. And if I have therein done any injury or wrong, let me be judged by the law; for I will seek no better defence, considering chiefly that it is my profession.

Chan. Why; Mr. Hales, although you had the rigour of the law on your side, yet ye might have had regard to the queen's highness's present doings in that case; and further, although ye seem to be more than precise in the law, yet I think ye would be very loth to yield to the extremity of such advantages as might be gathered against your proceedings in the law, as ye have sometimes taken upon you in place of justice, and if it were well tried, I believe ye should not be well able to stand honestly thereto.

Hales. My lord, I am not so perfect, but I may err for lack of knowledge; but both in conscience, and such knowledge of the law as God hath given me, I will do nothing but I will maintain it, and abide in it; and if my goods and all that I have be not able to counterpoise the case, my body shall be ready to serve the turn, for they be all at the queen's highness's pleasure.

Chan. Ah, sir, ye be very quick and stout in your answers! But as it should seem, that which you did was more of a will favouring the opinion of your religion against the service now used, than for any occasion or zeal of justice, seeing the queen's highness doth set it forth as yet, wishing all her faithful subjects to embrace it accordingly: and where you offer both body and goods in your trial, there is no such matter required at your hands, and yet ye shall not have your own will neither.

Hales. My lord, I seek not wilful will, but to shew myself as I am bound in love to God and obedience to the queen's majesty, in whose cause willingly for justice sake, all other respects set apart, I did of late (as your lordship knoweth) adventure as much as I had. And as for my religion, I trust it to be such as pleaseth God, wherein I am ready to adventure as well my life as my substance, if I be called thereto. And so, in lack of mine own power and will, the Lord's will be fulfilled.

Chan. Seeing you be at this point, Mr. Hales, I will presently make an end with you. The queen's highness shall be informed of your opinion and declaration; and as her grace shall thereupon determine, ye shall have knowledge. Until such time, ye may depart as ye came, without your oath, for, as it appeareth, ye are scarce worthy the place appointed.

Hales. I thank your lordship: and as for my vocation, being both a burden and a charge more than ever I desired to take upon me, whensoever it shall please the queen's highness to ease me thereof, I shall most humbly with due contentation obey the same. And so he departed from the bar.

Not many days after this conversation in Westminster-hall, Mr. Hales at the commandment of the bishop was committed to the King's Bench, where he remained until Lent; then was he removed to the Compter in Bread-street, and afterwards from thence was carried to the Fleet.

Being in the Fleet, what it was that he had granted unto the bishops, by their fraudulent assaults and persuasion; namely, of Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, and of judge Portman, as it is thought, overcome at last, I have not to say. This is certain, that shortly after, calling himself better to remembrance, he was brought to great repentance and terror of conscience; insomuch, that for very anguish of heart he was ready with his penknife to kill himself there in the prison; and had no doubt so done, had not the merciful providence of the Lord rescued him miraculously, as ye shall hear.

It happened when supper-time came that he should be called down, Mr. Hales having little mind either to eat or to drink, gat him straightway to bed, where he lay all the night sobbing and groaning, and took little rest or sleep. At length when morning came, about six of the clock he sent his servant for a cup of beer, under pretence as though he were thirsty and desirous to drink. Whether this cause were true or feigned, it is unknown: but this followed, that this man was scarce out of the chamber, when he with his penknife had wounded himself in divers places of his body, and was purposed, no doubt, to have destroyed himself, had not the goodness of the Lord given present help in time of opportunity. Whereby it is evident for all men to understand how God's favour was not absent from the man, although he thought himself utterly forsaken for his denial, as by the sequel may well appear.

For as soon as he had sent his man out of his chamber, (see what God would have done!) even before the chamber door, cftsoons the butler met him; who being desired to fill the drink, and take in the cup, the other returned again unto his master, at the same very time when he was working his own destruction; whereby Mr. Hales at that time was stopped of his purpose, and preserved, not without God's manifest good will and providence.

When Winchester had knowledge of it, he straightway taketh occasion thereby to blaspheme the doctrine of the gospel, which he openly in the star-chamber called doctrine of desperation.

Mr. Hales being within a while after recovered of those wounds, and delivered out of prison, getting himself home unto his house, where he, either for the greatness of his sorrow, or for lack of good counsel, or for that he would avoid the necessity of hearing mass, having all things set in order, a good while before that, pertaining to his testament, casting himself into a shallow river, was drowned therein; which was about the beginning of the month of February, or in the month of January before, anno 1555: into such sorrow of conscience did he fall for having abjured the truth of the gospel, and in any wise dissembling, to escape the violence of persecutors.

History of THOMAS TOMKINS, who first having his Hand burned, after was burned himself, by Bishop Bonner

Mention was made before of six prisoners, brought before bishop Bonner the 8th of February, whose names were Tomkins, Pigot, Knight, Haukes, Lawrence, and Hunter; of the which six aforesaid martyrs, the first was Thomas Tomkins, burned in Smithfield the 16th day of March, anno 1555.

This Thomas Tomkins, a weaver by his occupation, dwelling in Shoreditch, and of the diocese of London, was of such conversation and disposition so godly, that if any woman had come to him with her web, as sometimes they did three and four in a day, he would always begin with prayer; or if any other had come to talk of any matter, he would likewise first begin with prayer. And if any had sought unto him to borrow money, he would shew him such money as he had in his purse, and bid him take it: and when they came to repay it again, so far off was he from seeking any usury at their hand, or strait exaction of his due, that he would bid them keep it longer, until they were better able.

Dr. Bonner, bishop of London, kept the said Tomkins with him in prison half a year; during which time the said bishop was so rigorous unto him, that he beat him bitterly about the face, whereby his face was swelled. Whereupon the bishop caused his beard to be shaven, and gave the barber twelve-pence.

Touching which shaving of Thomas Tomkins' beard, this is more to be added: bishop Bonner having Tomkins with him prisoner at Fulham, in the month of July, did set him with his other work-folks to make hay; and seeing him to labour so well, the bishop sitting him down, said, Well, I like thee well, for thou labourest well; I trust thou wilt be a good Catholic. My lord, (said he,) St. Paul saith, "He that doth not labour, is not worthy to eat." Bonner said, Ah, St. Paul is a great man with thee. And so, after such other talk, the bishop, in a jeering mood, wished his beard off, saying that so he would look like a Catholic. My lord, said Tomkins, before my beard grew, I was, I trust, a good Christian, and so I trust to be, my beard being on. But Bonner in fine sent for the barber, and caused his beard to be shaven off. The very cause was, for that Bonner had plucked off a piece of his beard before.

The rage of this bishop was not so great against him, but the constancy of the party was much greater with patience to bear it; who, although he had not the learning as others have, yet he was so endued with God's mighty Spirit, and so well planted in the perfect knowledge of God's truth, that by no means he could be removed from the confession of truth to impiety and error. Whereupon Bonner the bishop being greatly vexed against the poor man, when he saw that by no persuasions he could prevail with him, devised another practice, not so strange as cruel, further to try his constancy, to the intent that seeing he could not otherwise convince him by doctrine of scriptures, yet he might overthrow him by some forefeeling and terror of death. So having with him Mr. Harpsfield, Mr. Pembleton, Dr. Chedsey, Mr. Willerton, and others standing by, he called for Thomas Tomkins, who coming before the bishop, and standing as he was wont in defence of his faith, the bishop fell from beating to burning. Who, having there a large wax candle of three or four wicks standing upon the table, thought there to represent unto us as it were the old image of king Porcenna. For as he burnt the hand of Scævola, so this Catholic bishop took Tomkins by the fingers, and held his hand directly over the flame, supposing that by the smart and pain of the fire being terrified, he would leave off the defence of his doctrine, which he had received.

Tomkins thinking no otherwise but there presently to die, began to commend himself unto the Lord, saying, "O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit," &c. In the time that his hand was in burning, the same Tomkins afterward reported to one James Hinse, that his spirit was so wrapt that he felt no pain. In the which burning he never shrunk, till the veins shrunk, and the sinews burst, and the blood did spirt in Mr. Harpsfield's face, insomuch that the said Mr. Harpsfield, moved with pity, desired the bishop to stay, saying, that he had tried him enough. This burning was in the hall at Fulham.

And where the bishop thought by that means to drive him from his opinions, it proved much otherwise: for this Christian Scævola so valiantly did despise, abide, and endure that burning, that we have less cause hereafter to marvel at the manfulness of that Roman Scævola. I would to God the other had as well followed the example of that Etruscan tyrant. For he, after the left hand of Scævola was half burned, either satisfied with his punishment, or overcome by his manhood, or driven away by fear, sent him home safe unto his people: whereas Bonner, hitherto not contented with the burning of his hand, rested not until he had consumed his whole body into ashes in Smithfield.

The first Examination of Thomas Tomkins.

This faithful and valiant soldier of God, Thomas Tomkins, after he had remained the space of half a year in prison, about the 8th day of February, was brought with certain others before Bonner, sitting in his consistory, to be examined. To whom first was brought forth a certain bill or schedule subscribed (as it appeareth) with his own hand, the 5th day of the same month last before, containing these words following:

"Thomas Tomkins, of Shoreditch, and of the dioecese of London, hath believed and doth believe that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, but only a token and remembrance thereof, the very body and blood of Christ being only in heaven, and no where else.

By me,

THOMAS TOMKINS."

Whereupon he was asked, whether he did acknowledge the same subscription to be of his own hand? To the which he granted, confessing it to be so. This being done, the bishop went about to persuade him (with words rather than with reasons) to relinquish his opinions, and to return again to the unity of the Catholic church, promising, if he would so do, to remit all that was past. But he firmly denied so to do. When the bishop saw he could not so convince him, he brought forth and read to him another writing, containing articles and interrogatories, whereunto he should come the next day and answer; in the mean time he should deliberate with himself what to do; and so the next day, being the ninth day of March, at eight of the clock in the morning, to be present in the same place again, to give his determinate answer what he would do in the premises, and then either to revoke and reclaim himself, or else in the afternoon of the same day to come again, and have justice, as he called it, ministered unto him. The copy of which articles here followeth:

Articles objected and ministered, the 8th day of February, against Thomas Tomkins, with his own hand subscribing to the same.

Thou dost believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God and his holy word, really, truly, and in very deed, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, as touching the substance thereof, which was conceived in the womb of the Virgin Mary, and hanged upon the cross, suffering passion and death there for the life of the world.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that after the consecration of the bread and wine prepared for the use of the sacrament of the altar, there doth remain the substance of material bread and material wine, not changed nor altered in substance by the power of Almighty God, but remaining as it did before.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that it is an untrue doctrine, and a false belief, to think or say that in the sacrament of the altar there is, after consecration of the bread and wine, the substance of Christ's natural body and blood, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that thy parents, kinsfolks, and acquaintance, and also thy godfathers and godmother, and all people, did err and were deceived, if they did believe that in the sacrament of the altar there was, after the consecration, the body and blood of Christ, and that there did not remain the substance of material bread and wine.

I do so believe.—By me,

THOMAS TOMKINS.

The Second Examination of Thomas Tomkins.

The next day being the 9th of February, at eight of the clock before noon, the said Thomas Tomkins (according to the former commandment) was brought again into the place aforesaid, before the bishop and his assistants, where the aforesaid articles were propounded unto him; wherunto he answered as follows:

To the first he said, that he did so believe, as in the same is contained.

To the second he said, that it was only bread and a participation of Christ's death and passion, and so do the scriptures teach.

To the third he said, and did believe, it was a false doctrine to believe and think as is contained in this article.

To the fourth, he did also believe the same.

After this answer, he did also subscribe his name to the said articles. Whereupon the bishop drawing out of his bosom another confession subscribed with Tomkins's own hand, and also that article that was the first day objected against him, caused the same to be openly read, and then willed him to revoke and deny his said opinions; the which he utterly refused to do, and therefore was commanded to appear before the bishop again in the same place at two of the clock in the afternoon.

The bishop repeateth again the confession of Thomas Tomkins, written before by the said bishop of London, and subscribed by the said Tomkins, the 26th of September, anno 1554, which is this :

"I Thomas Tomkins, of the parish of Shoreditch, in the diocese of London, having confessed and declared openly heretofore to Edmund, bishop of London, mine ordinary, that my belief hath been many years past, and is at this present, that the body of our Saviour Jesus Christ is not truly and in very deed in the sacrament of the altar, but only in heaven, and so in heaven that it cannot now indeed be really and truly in the sacrament of the altar.

"And, moreover, having likewise confessed and declared to my said ordinary openly many times, that although the church, called the Catholic church, hath allowed, and doth allow, the mass and sacrifice made and done therein as a wholesome, profitable, and godly thing; yet my belief hath been many years past, and is at this present, that the said mass is full of superstition, plain idolatry, and unprofitable for my soul, and so I have called it many times, and take it at this present.

"Having also likewise confessed and declared to my said ordinary, that the sacrament of baptism ought to be only in the vulgar tongue, and not otherwise ministered, and also without any such ceremonies as accustomedly are used in the Latin church, and otherwise not to be allowed.

"Finally, being many times and oft called openly before my said ordinary, and talked withal touching all my said confessions and declarations, both by the said mine ordinary and divers other learned men, as well his chaplains as others, and counselled by all them to embrace the truth, and to recant mine error in the premises, which they told me was plain heresy and manifest error; do testify and declare hereby, that I do and will continually stand to my said confession, declaration, and belief, in all the premises, and every part thereof, and in no wise recant or go from any part of the same. In witness whereof I have subscribed and passed this writing the 26th day of September, the year aforesaid.

"By me, THOS. TOMKINS aforesaid."

The last Appearance of Thomas Tomkins before Bonner and the Commissioners.

The same day and place, at two o'clock in the afternoon, he was the last time brought before the bishops of London, Bath, and St. David's, with others; where he was earnestly exhorted by the said bishop of Bath, to revoke and leave off his opinions. Unto whom he answered, My lord, I was born, and brought up in ignorance until now of late years; and now I know the truth, wherein I will continue unto the death.

Then Bonner caused all his articles and confessions to be again openly read, and so in his accustomed manner persuaded with him to recant. To whom he finally said, My lord, I cannot see but that you would have me forsake the truth, and to fall into error and heresy. The bishop seeing he would not recant, did proceed in his law, and so gave sentence of condemnation upon him.

Then he delivered him to the sheriff of London, who carried him straight unto Newgate, where he remained most joyous and steadfast until the 16th day of March next after; on which day he was by the said sheriff conveyed into Smithfield, and there sealed up his faith in the flaming fire, to the glory of God's holy name, and confirmation of the weak.

A notable History of WILLIAM HUNTER, a young Man of Nineteen Years, pursued to death by Justice Brown, for the Gospel's sake, worthy of all young Men and Parents to be read.

The 26th day of the said month of March, the year aforesaid, followed the martyrdom of William Hunter, a godly young man, of the age of nineteen years, and born of godly parents; by whom he was not only instructed in true religion and godliness, but also confirmed by them unto death, after a rare and strange example, worthy to be noted and had in admiration of all parents. Wherein may appear a singular spectacle, not only of a marvellous fortitude in the party so young, but also in his parents, to behold nature in them striving with religion, and overcome of the same. Whereby Christian parents may learn what is to be done, not only in their children, but also in themselves, if need at any time do require, or godliness should demand, the duty of a Christian man against natural affection. Example whereof in the sequel of this history we have here present before our eyes. Which history, as it was faithfully drawn out by Robert Hunter his own brother, (who being present with his brother William, and never left him till his death, sent the true report unto us,) we have here with like faithfulness placed and recorded the same, as followeth :

William Hunter, being an apprentice in London in the first year of queen Mary, was commanded at the Easter next following to receive the communion at a mass, by the priest of the parish where he dwelt, called Coleman-street; which because he refused to do, he was very much threatened that he should be brought before the bishop of London. Wherefore William Hunter's master (one Thomas Taylor, a silk-weaver) required William Hunter to go and depart from him, lest that he should come in danger because of him, if he continued in his house. For the which cause William Hunter took leave of his master, and thence came to Burntwood, where his father dwelt, with whom he afterwards remained about the space of half a quarter of a year.

After this it happened, within five or six weeks, that William going into the chapel of Burntwood, and finding there a Bible lying on a desk, did read therein. In the mean time there came in one father Atwell, a sumner, which hearing William read in the Bible, said to him, What meddlest thou with the Bible? Knowest thou what thou readest; and canst thou expound the scriptures?

To whom William answered and said, Father Atwell, I take not upon me to expound the scriptures, except I were dispensed withal: but I, finding the Bible here when I came, read in it to my comfort.

To whom father Atwell said, It was never a merry world since the Bible came abroad in English.

To which words William answered, saying, Father Atwell, say not so, for God's sake: for it is God's book, out of which every one that hath grace may learn to know both what things please God, and also what displease.

Then said father Atwell, Could we not tell before this time, as well as now, how God was to be served?

William answered, No, father Atwell, nothing so well as we may now, if that we might have his blessed word amongst us still as we have had.—It is true, said father Atwell, if it be as you say.

Well, said William Hunter, it liketh me very well, and I pray God that we may have the blessed Bible amongst us continually.

To which words father Atwell said, I perceive your mind well enough: you are one of them that misliketh the queen's laws; and therefore you came from London, I hear say. You learned these ways at London: but for all that, said father Atwell, you must turn another leaf, or else you, and a great number more heretics, will broil for this gear, I warrant you.

To which words William said, God give me grace that I may believe his word, and confess his name, whatsoever come thereof.

Confess his name! (quoth old Atwell;) no, no, ye will go to the devil all of you, and confess his name.

What! (said William;) you say not well, father Atwell.

At which words he went out of the chapel in a great fury, saying, I am not able to reason with thee; but I will fetch one straightway which shall talk with thee, I warrant thee, thou heretic. And he, leaving William Hunter reading in the Bible, straightway brought one Thomas Wood, who was then vicar of Southwell, who was at an ale-house over against the said chapel; who hearing old Atwell say that William Hunter was reading of the Bible in the chapel, came by and by to him, and finding him reading in the Bible, took the matter very heinously, saying, Sirrah! who gave thee leave to read in the Bible, and to expound it?

Then William answered, I expound not the scriptures, sir, but read them for my comfort.

What meddlest thou with them at all? (said the vicar.) It becometh not thee, nor any such, to meddle with the scriptures.

But William answered, I will read the scriptures, God willing, while I live: and you ought not, master vicar, to discourage any man for that matter, but rather exhort men diligently to read the scriptures, for your discharge and their own.

Unto which the vicar answered, It becometh thee well to tell me what I have to do! I see thou art an heretic by thy words.

William said, I am no heretic for speaking the truth.—But the vicar said, It is a merry world when such as thou art shall teach us what is the truth! thou art meddling, father Atwell tells me, with the 6th of John, wherein thou mayest perceive how Christ saith, “Except that ye eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.”

William said, I read the 6th of John, indeed; howbeit, I make no exposition on it.

Then said father Atwell, When you read it, I said that you there might understand how that in the sacrament of the altar is Christ's very natural body and blood: unto the which you answered, how that you would take the scriptures as they are, and that you would meddle with no great exposition, except that ye were dispensed withal.

Ah, (said the vicar,) What say you to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Believest thou not in it, and that the bread and wine are transubstantiated into the very body and blood of Christ?

William answered, I learn no such thing in the 6th of John, as you speak of.

Why, (said the vicar,) dost thou not believe in the sacrament of the altar?

I believe, (said William Hunter,) all that God's word teacheth.

Why, (said the vicar,) thou mayest learn this which I say plainly in the 6th of John.

Then said William, You understand Christ's words much like the carnal Capernites, which thought that Christ would have given them his flesh to feed upon; which opinion our Saviour Christ corrected, when he said, “The words which I speak to you are spirit and life.”

Now, (quoth the vicar,) I have found you out: now I see that thou art an heretic indeed, and that thou dost not believe in the sacrament of the altar.

Then said William Hunter, Whereas you doubt my belief, I would it were tried whether that you or I would stand faster in our faith.

Yea, thou heretic, (said the vicar,) wouldst thou have it so tried?—William Hunter answered, That which you call heresy, I serve my Lord God withal.

Then said the vicar, Canst thou serve God with heresy?—But William answered, I would that you and I were even now fast tied to a stake, to prove whether that I or you would stand strongest to our faith.—But the vicar answered, It shall not be so tried.—No, quoth William, I think so; for if I might, I think I know who would soonest recant: for I durst set my foot against yours even to the death.

That we shall see, quoth the vicar; and so they departed, the vicar threatening William much how that he would complain of him.

Immediately after, this vicar of Wiede told Mr. Brown of the conversation which William Hunter and he had together. Which when Mr. Brown understood, immediately he sent for William's father, and the constable, one Robert Salmon: for immediately William Hunter and the vicar had reasoned together, he took his leave of his father, and fled, because Wood the vicar threatened him. Now when the constable and William's father were come, and were before Mr. Brown, he asked where William Hunter was? His father answered, saying, If it you please, sir, I know not where he is. No! quoth Mr. Brown; I will make thee tell where he is, and fetch him forth also, ere I have done with thee. Sir, said William's father, I know not where he is, nor where to seek for him.

Then said Mr. Brown, Why didst thou not bring him when thou hadst him? I promise thee, if thou wilt not fetch him, I will send thee to prison till I shall get him. Wherefore see that thou promise me to fetch him, or else it is not best to look me in the face any more, nor yet to rest in Burntwood. Well, quoth Mr. Brown to William's father, see that thou seek him forth, and bring him to me.

William's father answered, Sir, would you have me seek my son to be burned?

If thou bring him to me, quoth Mr. Brown, I will deal well enough for that matter; thou shalt not need to care for the matter. Fetch him, and thou shalt see what I will do for him. Moreover, if thou lackest money, quoth he, thou shalt have some; and bade the constable, Mr. Salmon, to give him a crown; but William's father took none of him. Howbeit, Mr. Brown would never rest till William's father had promised him to seek out his son.

And thus Mr. Brown sent the constable home again, and William's father, commanding him to seek out William Hunter, and then to come again and bring him to him.

After that old father Hunter had ridden two or three days' journey to satisfy Mr. Brown's expectation, it happened that William met with his father in the highway as he travelled, and, first seeing his father, came to him and spake to him, and told him how he thought that he sought for him; and then his father confessing it, wept sore, and said that Mr. Brown charged him to seek him, and bring him to him: Howbeit, said he, I will return home again, and say I cannot find you. But William said, Father, I will go home with you, and save you harmless, whatsoever cometh of it. And thus they came home together; but William, as soon as he was come home, was taken by the said constable, and laid in the stocks till the next day.

Mr. Brown, hearing that William Hunter was come home, sent for him to the constable, who brought him immediately to Mr. Brown. Now when William was come, Mr. Brown said to him, Ah, sirrah, are ye come! and then by and by he commanded the Bible to be brought, and opened it, and then began to reason with William on this manner, saying, I hear say you are a scripture-man, and can reason much of the sixth of John, and expound as pleaseth you; and turned the Bible to the 6th of St. John, and then he laid to his charge what an exposition he made when the vicar and he talked together. And William said, He urged me to say so much as I did.—Well, quoth Mr. Brown, because you can expound that place so well, how say you to another place? turning to the 22d of St. Luke. And Mr. Brown said, Look here, for Christ saith, that the bread is his body.

To which William answered, The text saith how Christ took bread, but not that he changed it into another substance; but gave that which he took, and brake that which he gave, which was bread, as is evident by the text; for else he should have had two bodies, which to affirm I see no reason, said William.

At which answer Mr. Brown was very angry, and took up the Bible and turned the leaves, and then flung it down again in such a fury, that William could not well find the place again whereof they reasoned.

Then Mr. Brown said, Thou naughty boy, wilt thou not take things as they are, but expound them as thou wilt? Doth not Christ call the bread his body plainly, and thou wilt not believe that the bread is his body after the consecration? Thou goest about to make Christ a liar.

But William Hunter answered, I mean not so, sir, but rather more earnestly to search what the mind of Christ is in that holy institution, wherein he commendeth unto us the remembrance of his death, passion, resurrection, and coming again, saying, "This do in the remembrance of me." And also though Christ call the bread his body, as he doth also say that he is a vine, a door, &c. yet is not his body turned into bread, no more than he is turned into a door or vine: wherefore Christ calleth the bread his body by a figure of speech.

At that word Mr. Brown said, Thou art a villain indeed; wilt thou make Christ a liar yet still? and was in such fury with William, and so raged, that William could not speak a word but he crossed him, and scoffed at every word. Wherefore William, seeing him in such fury, desired him that he would either hear him quietly, and suffer him to answer for himself, or else send him away.

To which Mr. Brown answered, Indeed I will send thee to-morrow to my lord of London, and he shall have thee under examination; and thus left off the talk, and wrote a letter immediately, and sent William Hunter with the constable to Bonner, bishop of London, who received William.

After that he had read the letter, and the constable returned home again, the bishop caused William to be brought into a chamber, where he began to reason with him in this manner: I understand, William Hunter, (quoth he,) by Mr. Brown's letter, how that you have had certain communication with the vicar of the Wiede, about the blessed sacrament of the altar, and how that ye could not agree; whereupon Mr. Brown sent for thee to bring thee to the Catholic faith, from the which, he saith, thou art gone. Howbeit, if thou wilt be ruled by me, thou shalt have no harm for any thing that thou hast said or done in this matter. William answered, saying, I am not fallen from the Catholic faith of Christ, I am sure, but do believe it, and confess it with all my heart.

Why, quoth the bishop, how sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Wilt thou not recant thy saying, which thou confessedst before Mr. Brown, how that Christ's body is not in the sacrament of the altar, the same that was born of the Virgin Mary?

To which William answered, saying, My lord, I understand that Mr. Brown hath certified you of the talk which he and I had together, and thereby ye know what I then said to him, the which I will not recant, by God's help!

Then said the bishop, I think thou art ashamed to bear a faggot, and recant openly, but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame; but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no farther, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.

William answered and said, My lord, if you will let me alone, and leave me to my conscience, I will go to my father and dwell with him, or else with my master again; and so if nobody will disquiet or trouble my conscience, I will keep my conscience to myself.

Then, said the bishop, I am content, so that thou wilt go to the church, and receive, and be shaven, and so continue a good Catholic Christian.—No, quoth William, I will not do so for all the good in the world.

Then, quoth the bishop, if you will not do so, I will make you sure enough, I warrant you.—Well, quoth William, you can do no more than God will permit you.

Well, quoth the bishop, wilt thou not recant indeed by no means?—No, quoth William, never while I live, God willing.

Then the bishop commanded his men to put William in the stocks in his gate-house, where he sat two days and nights, only with a crust of brown bread and a cup of water.

At the two days' end the bishop came to him, and finding the cup of water and the crust of bread still by him upon the stocks, said to his men, Take him out of the stocks, and let him break his fast with you. Then they let him forth off the stocks; but would not suffer him to eat with them, but called him heretic: and he said, he was as loth to be in their company as they were to be in his.

After the breakfast, the bishop sent for William, and demanded whether he would recant or no? But William made him answer, how that he never would recant that which he had confessed before men, as concerning his faith in Christ.

Then the bishop said, that he was no Christian, but he denied the faith in which he was baptized. But William answered, I was baptized in the faith of the holy Trinity, the which I will not go from, God assisting me with his grace.

Then the bishop sent him to the convict prison, and commanded the keeper to lay irons upon him as many as he could bear; and moreover, asked him how old he was? and William said that he was nineteen years old.

Well, said the bishop, you will be burned ere you be twenty years old, if you will not yield yourself better than you have done yet. William answered, God strengthen me in his truth. And then he parted, the bishop allowing him a halfpenny a day to live on in bread or drink.

Thus he continued in prison three-quarters of a year: in which time he had been before the bishop five times, besides the time when he was condemned in the consistory in Paul's the 9th day of February, at which time his brother Robert Hunter was present, when and where he heard the bishop condemn him and five others more.

And then the bishop calling William, asked him if he would recant? and so read to him his examination and confession, as is above rehearsed, and then rehearsed how that William confessed that he did believe that he received Christ's body spiritually when he did receive the communion. Dost thou mean, quoth the bishop, that the bread is Christ's body spiritually?

William answered, I mean not so, but rather when I receive the holy communion rightly and worthily, I do feed upon Christ spiritually through faith in my soul, and am made partaker of all the benefits which Christ hath brought unto all faithful believers through his precious death, passion, and resurrection; and not that the bread is his body, either spiritually or corporally.

Then said the bishop to William, Dost thou not think (holding up his cap) that for example here of my cap, thou mayest see the squareness and colour of it, and yet that not to be the substance, which thou judgest by the accidents?

William answered, If you can separate the accidents from the substance, and shew me the substance without the accidents, I could believe.—Then said the bishop, Thou wilt not believe that God can do any thing above man's capacity. Yes, said William, I must needs believe that: for daily experience teacheth all men that thing plainly. But our question is not what God can do, but what he will have us to learn in his holy supper.

Then the bishop said, I always have found thee at this point, and I see no hope in thee to reclaim thee into the catholic faith, but thou wilt continue a corrupt member; and then pronounced sentence upon him, how that he should go from that place to Newgate for a time, and so from thence to Burntwood, where, said he, thou shalt be burned.

Then the bishop called for another, and so when he had condemned them all, he called for William Hunter, and persuaded him, saying, If thou wilt yet recant, I will make thee a free man in the city, and give thee 40l. in good money, to set up thine occupation withal; or I will make thee steward of my house, and set thee in office; for I like thee well, thou hast wit enough, and I will prefer thee, if thou recant.

But William answered, I thank you for your great offers: notwithstanding, my lord, (said he,) if you cannot persuade my conscience with scriptures, I cannot find in my heart to turn from God, for the love of the world; for I count all things worldly but loss and dung, in respect of the love of Christ.

Then said the bishop, If thou diest in this mind, thou art condemned for ever.—William answered, God judgeth righteously, and justifieth them whom man condemneth unjustly.

Thus William and the bishop departed; William and the rest to Newgate, where they remained about a month, and afterwards were sent down, William to Burntwood, and the others into divers places of the country.

Now when William was come down to Burntwood, (which was the Saturday before the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, that followed on Monday after,) William remained till the Tuesday after, because they would not put him to death then, for the holiness of the day. In the mean time, William's father and mother came to him, and desired heartily of God that he might continue unto the end in that good way which he had begun; and his mother said to him, That she was glad that ever she was so happy as to bear such a child, which could find in his heart to lose his life for Christ's name sake.

Then William said to his mother, For my little pain which I shall suffer, which is but short, Christ hath promised me, mother, a crown of joy; may you not be glad of that, mother? With that his mother kneeled down on her knees, saying, I pray God strengthen thee, my son, to the end; yea, I think thee as well bestowed as any child that ever I bare.

At which words, Mr. Higbed took her in his arms, saying,

I rejoice (and so said the others) to see you in this mind; and you have a good cause to rejoice. And his father and his mother both said, That they were never of other mind; but prayed for him, that as he had begun to confess Christ before men, he likewise might so continue to the end.

William's father said, I was afraid of nothing, but that my son should have been killed in the prison by hunger and cold, the bishop was so hard to him. But William confessed, after a month, that his father was charged with his board, that he lacked nothing, but had meat and clothing enough, yea, even out of the court, both money, meat, clothes, wood, and coals, and all things necessary.

Thus they continued in their inn, whither resorted many people of the country to see those good men which were there; and many of William's acquaintance came to him, and reasoned with him, and he with them, exhorting them to come away from the abomination of popish superstition and idolatry.

Thus passing away Saturday, Sunday, and Monday; on Monday at night it happened that William had a dream about two o'clock in the morning, which was this: How that he was at the place where the stake was pitched, where he should be burned, which (as he thought in his dream) was at the town's end where the butts stood; which was so indeed. And also he dreamed, that he met with his father as he went to the stake; and also that there was a priest at the stake, which went about to have him recant. To whom he said, as he thought in his dream, how that he bade him, Away, false prophet! and how that he exhorted the people to beware of him, and such as he was: which things came to pass indeed. It happened that William made a noise to himself in his dream; which caused Mr. Higbed and the others to awake him out of his sleep, to know what he lacked. When he awaked, he told them his dream.

Now when it was day, the sheriff, Mr. Broeket, called on his men to set forward to the burning of William Hunter. Then came the sheriff's son to him, and embraced him, saying, William, be not afraid of these men which are here present with bows, bills, and weapons, ready to bring you to the place where you shall be burned. To whom William answered, I thank God I am not afraid; for I have east my count what it will cost me already. Then the sheriff's son could speak no more to him for weeping.

Then William Hunter plucked up his gown, and stepped over the parlour groundsel, and went forward cheerfully, the sheriff's servant taking him by one arm, and his brother by another; and thus going in the way he met with his father, according to his dream; who spake to his son, weeping and saying, God be with thee, son William: and William said, God be with you, good father, and be of good comfort; for I hope we shall meet again, when we shall be merry. His father said, I hope so, William; and so departed. So William went to the place where the stake stood, even according to his dream, where all things were very unready. Then William took a wet broom faggot, and, kneeling down thereon, he read the 51st Psalm, till he came to these words, "The sacrifice of God is a contrite spirit; a contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."

Then said Mr. Tyrill of the Braches (called William Tyrill,) Thou liest, thou readest false; for the words are an humble spirit. But William said, The translation saith, a contrite heart. Yea, quoth Mr. Tyrill, the translation is false; ye translated books as ye list yourselves, like heretics. Well, quoth William, there is no great difference in those words.

Then said the sheriff, Here is a letter from the queen: if thou wilt recant, thou shalt live; if not, thou shalt be burned. No, quoth William, I will not recant, God willing. Then William arose, and went to the stake, and stood upright to it. Then came one Richard Ponde, a bailiff, and made fast the chain about William. Then said Mr. Brown, Here is not wood enough to burn a leg of him.

Then said William, Good people, pray for me; and make speed and despatch me quickly; and pray for me while you see me alive, good people, and I will pray for you likewise.

Now pray for thee! quoth Mr. Brown; I will pray no more for thee than I will pray for a dog. To whom William answered, Mr. Brown, now you have that which you sought for, and I pray God, it be not laid to your charge in the last day; howbeit, I forgive you. Then said Mr. Brown, I ask no forgiveness of thee. Well, said William, if God forgive you, I shall not require my blood at your hands.

Then said William, Son of God, shine upon me! and immediately the sun in the element shone out of a dark cloud so full in his face, that he was constrained to look another way; whereat the people much mused, because it was dark a little time before. Then William took up a faggot of broom, and embraced it in his arms. Then the priest (which William dreamed of) came to his brother Robert with a popish book, to carry to William, that he might recant; which book his brother would not meddle with.

Then William seeing the priest, and perceiving how he would have shewed him the book, said, Away, thou false prophet! Beware of them, good people, and come away from their abominations; lest that you be partakers of their plagues. Then quoth the priest, Look, how thou earnest here, so shalt thou burn in hell. William answered, Thou liest, thou false prophet! Away, thou false prophet, away!

Then was there a gentleman who said, I pray God have mercy upon his soul! The people said, Amen, Amen. Immediately fire was made.

Then William cast his Psalter right into his brother's hand; who said, William, think on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraid of death. And William answered, I am not afraid. Then lifted he up his hands to heaven, and said, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit! and casting down his head again into the smothering smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his blood to the praise of God.

Here followeth the History of Mr. HIGBED and Mr. CAUSTON, two worthy Gentlemen of Essex, which for their sincere Confession of their Faith, under Bonner, Bishop of London, were martyred and burned in Essex, anno 1555.

Although the condemnation of Mr. Higbed and Mr. Causton followed after the condemnation of those other martyrs which were condemned with Tomkins and Hunter, above-mentioned, yet because the time of their execution was before the burning of the aforesaid four martyrs, forsomuch that they suffered the same day that William Hunter did, which was the 26th of March, I thought therefore next after the story of the said William Hunter, following the order of time, here to place the same.

This Mr. Higbed and Mr. Causton, two worshipful gentlemen in the county of Essex, the one at Hornden-of-the-Hill, the other of the parish of Thundurst, being zealous and religious in the true service of God; as they could not dissemble with the Lord their God, nor flatter with the world, so in the time of blind superstition and wretched idolatry, they could not long lie hid and obscure in such a number of malignant adversaries, accusers, and servants of this world, but at length they were perceived and informed on to the aforesaid Edmund Bonner, bishop of London. By reason whereof, by commandment, they were committed to the officers of Colchester to be safely kept, and with them also a servant of Thomas Causton, who in this praise of Christian godliness was nothing inferior to his master.

Bonner, the aforesaid bishop, perceiving these two gentlemen to be of worshipful estate, and of great estimation in that county, lest any tumult should thereby arise, came thither himself, accompanied by Mr. Fecknam and certain others, thinking to reclaim them to his faction: so that great labour was taken therein, as well by terrors and threatenings, as by large promises and flattering, and all fair means, to reduce them again to the unity (as they termed it) of the mother church.

In fine, when nothing could prevail to make them assent to their doings, at length they came to this point, that they required certain respite to consult with themselves what was best to be done. Which time of deliberation being expired, and they remained still constant and unmoveable in their professed doctrine, and setting out also their confession in writing, the bishop seeing no good to be done in tarrying any longer there, departed thence, and carried them both to London, and with them certain other prisoners, which about the same time in those quarters were apprehended.

It was not long after this, but these prisoners being at London committed to strait prison, and there attempted sundry ways by the bishop and his chaplains to revoke their opinions; at length, when no persuasions would serve, they were brought forth to open examination at the consistory in Paul's the 17th day of February, anno 1555. Where they were demanded, as well by the said bishop, as also by the bishop of Bath and others, whether they would recant their errors and perverse doctrine, as they termed it, and so come to the unity of the popish church? which when they refused to do, the bishop assigned them likewise the next day to appear again, being the 18th of February.

On which day, among many other things there said and passed, he read unto them severally certain articles, and gave them respite until the next day to answer unto the same, and so committed them again to prison.

Upon the first day of March they were again brought before the bishop, and there exhibited their answers to the articles aforesaid.

Then the bishop beginneth first with Thomas Causton: Because ye shall not be suddenly trapped, and that men shall not say that I go about to seek snares to put you away; I have hitherto respited you, that you should weigh and consider with yourself your state and condition, and that you should, while ye have time and space, acknowledge the truth, and return to the unity of the Catholic church. Then the bishop reading their articles and answers to the same, asked them if they would recant? Which when they denied, they were again dismissed, and commanded to appear the next Wednesday after, at two o'clock in the afternoon, there to receive their definitive sentence against them; which thing, as it seemeth, was yet deferred.

Another Examination of Mr. Causton and Mr. Higbed.

The next Friday, being the 8th day of March, the said Thomas Causton was first called to examination before the bishop, Fecknam, and Dr. Stempe, being in his palace, and there, after certain exhortations to recant his former profession, and to be conformable to the unity of their church, they promised him willingly to receive him again.

To whom he answered, You go about to catch us in snares and gins. But mark, by what measure ye measure us, look you to be measured with the same again at God's hands.

The bishop still persuaded with him to recant. To whom he answered, No, I will not abjure. Ye said, that the bishops that were lately burned be heretics: but I pray God make me such an heretic as they were.

The bishop then leaving Mr. Causton, called for Mr. Higbed, using with him the like persuasions that he did with the other. But he answered, I will not abjure; for I have been of this mind and opinion that I am now these sixteen years; and do what ye can ye shall do no more than God will permit ye to do; and with what measure you measure us, look for the same again at God's hands.

Then Fecknam asked him his opinion in the sacrament of the altar? To whom he answered, I do not believe that Christ is in the sacrament as ye will have him, which is of man's making.

Both their answers thus severally made, they were again commanded to depart for that time, and to appear the next day in the consistory at Paul's, between the hours of one and three of the clock at afternoon.

At which day and hour, being the 9th day of March, they were both brought thither; where the bishop caused Mr. Thomas Causton's articles and answers first to be read openly, and after exhorted him to recant and abjure his heretical opinions, and to come home now at the last to their mother the Catholic church, and save himself.

But Mr. Thomas Causton answered again, and said, No, I will not abjure; for I came not hither for that purpose. And therewithal did exhibit in writing unto the bishop (as well in his own name as also in Thomas Higbed's name) a confession of their faith, to which they would stand; and required leave to read the same: which, after great suit, was obtained, and so he read it openly in the hearing of the people, as followeth:

The Confession and Faith of Thomas Causton, and Thomas Higbed, which they delivered to the Bishop of London, before the Mayor and Sheriffs, and in the presence of all the people there assembled, anno 1555, the ninth of March, and were condemned for the same in the said Consistory in Paul's Church, the year and day aforesaid.

1. First, we believe and profess in baptism to forsake the devil, and all his works and pomps, and the vanities of this wicked world, with all the sinful lusts of the flesh.

2. We believe all the articles of our Christian faith.

3. We believe, that we are bound to keep God's holy will and commandments, and to walk in the same all the days of our life.

4. We believe, that there is contained in the Lord's Prayer all things necessary both for body and soul, and that we are taught thereby to pray to our heavenly Father, and no other saint or angel.

5. We believe that there is a Catholic church, even the communion of saints, built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, (as St. Paul saith,) Christ being the head corner stone: for the which church Christ gave himself, to make it to himself a glorious congregation, without spot.

6. We believe, that this church of herself, and by her own merits, is sinful, and must needs say, Father, forgive us our sins; but through Christ and his merits she is freely forgiven; for he in his own person (saith St. Paul) hath purged her sins, and made her faultless in his sight. Besides whom there is no saviour (saith the prophet:) Neither is there salvation (saith St. Peter) in any other name.

7. We believe, as he is our only Saviour, so he is our only Mediator. For the apostle St. Paul saith, There is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus. Wherefore seeing none hath this name, God and Man, but Jesus Christ, therefore there is no Mediator but him.

8. We believe, that this church of Christ is and hath been persecuted, the words of Christ saying, "As they have persecuted me, so shall they persecute you: for the disciple is not above his Master. For it is not only given unto you to believe in Christ," (saith St. Paul,) "but also to suffer for his sake: for all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution."

9. We believe, that the church of Christ teacheth the word of God, truly and sincerely, putting nothing to, nor taking any thing from; and also doth minister the sacraments according to the primitive church.

10. We believe, that this church of Christ suffereth all men to read the scriptures according to Christ's commandment, saying, Search the scriptures; for they testify of me. We read also out of the Acts, that when St. Paul preached, the audience daily searched the scriptures whether he preached truly or no. Also the prophet David teacheth all men to pray with understanding: For how shall the unlearned (saith St. Paul) say Amen, at the giving of thanks, when they understand not what is said? And what is more allowed than true faith, which, St. Paul saith, cometh by hearing of the word of God?

11. We believe, that the church of Christ teacheth, that God ought to be worshipped according to his word, and not after the doctrine of men: For in vain (saith Christ) ye worship me, teaching nothing but the doctrine of men. Also we are commanded of God by his prophet, saying, Walk not in the traditions and precepts of your elders; but walk (saith he) in my precepts: do that I command you, put nothing thereunto, neither take any thing from it. Likewise saith Christ, You shall forsake father and mother, and follow me. Whereby we learn, that if our elders teach otherwise than God commanded, in that point we must forsake them.

12. We believe, that the supper of the Lord ought not to be altered and changed, forasmuch as Christ himself, being the wisdom of the Father, did institute it. For it is written, "Cursed is he that changeth my ordinances, and departeth from my commandments, or taketh any thing from them." Now we find by the scriptures, that this holy supper is sore abused:

First, In that it is given in one kind, where Christ gave it in both.

Secondly, In that it is made a private mass, where Christ made it a communion: for he gave it not to one alone, but to all the apostles in the name of the whole church.

Thirdly, In that it is made a sacrifice for the quick and the dead; whereas Christ ordained it for a remembrance of the everlasting sacrifice, which was his own body offered upon the altar of the cross once for all; as the holy apostle saith, "Even the full and perfect price of our redemption: And where there is remission of sin," saith he, "there is no more sacrifice for sin."

Fourthly, In that it is worshipped contrary to the commandment, saying, "Thou shalt worship nothing which is made with hands."

Fifthly, In that it is given in an unknown tongue, whereby the people are ignorant of the right use whereof, how Christ died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, by whom we be set at peace with God, and received to his favour and mercy by his promise, wherof this sacrament is a sure seal and witness.

Besides this, it is hanged up, and shut in a box, yea, many times so long that worms breed in it, and so it putrefieth; whereby the rude people have an occasion to speak irreverently. Therefore they that thus abuse it, bring up the slander, and not we, which pray daily to God to restore it to the right use, according to Christ's institution.

Now concerning Christ's words, "This is my body," we deny them not; but we say, that the mind of Christ in them must be searched out by other open scriptures, whereby we may come to the spiritual understanding of them, which shall be most to the glory of God: for as the holy apostle saith, "There is no scripture that hath any private interpretation." Besides this, the scriptures are full of the like figurative speeches; as, for example, Christ saith, "This cup is the new testament in my blood." "The rock is Christ," saith St. Paul. "Whosoever receiveth a child in my name," saith our Saviour Jesus Christ, "receiveth me."

Which sentences must not be understood after the letter, lest we do err, as the Capernaïtes did, which thought that Christ's body should have been eaten with their teeth, when he spake of the eating thereof. Unto whom Christ saith, "Such a fleshly eating of my body profiteth nothing: it is the Spirit (saith our Saviour Jesus Christ) that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: for my words are spirit and life." Thus we see that Christ's words must be understood spiritually, and not literally. Therefore he that cometh to this worthy supper of the Lord, must not prepare his jaw, but his heart: neither tooth nor belly; but believe, saith St. Augustine, and thou hast eaten it. So that we must bring with us a spiritual hunger, and, as the apostle saith, try and examine ourselves, whether our conscience do testify unto us that we do truly believe in Christ, according to the scriptures: Wherefore if we be truly certified, being new born from our old conversation in heart, mind, will, and deed, then may we boldly with this marriage-garment of our faith come to the feast.

In consideration whereof we have invincible scriptures, as of Christ himself: "This do in remembrance of me." And St. Paul: "As often" saith he, "as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall remember the Lord's death until he come." Here is no change, but bread still. And St. Luke affirmeth the same. Also Christ hath made a just promise, saying, "Me you shall not have always with: you I leave the world and go to my Father; for if I should not depart, the Comforter which I will send cannot come unto you." So according to his promise he is ascended, as the evangelists testify. Also, St. Peter saith, that "heaven shall keep him until the last day also."

Now, as touching his omnipotent power, we confess and say with St. Augustine, that Christ is both God and Man. In that he is God, he is every where; but in that he is Man, he is in heaven, and can occupy but one place: whereunto the scriptures do agree. For his body was not in all places at once when he was here: for it was not in the grave when the woman sought it, as the angel saith; neither was it at Bethania where Lazarus died, by Christ's own words, saying, "I am glad I was not there." And thus we conclude with the scriptures, that Christ is in his holy supper sacramentally and spiritually in all them that worthily receive it, and corporally in heaven, both God and Man.

And further we make here our protestation before God, (whom we call to record in this matter,) that this which we have said is neither of stubbornness nor wilful mind, as some judge of us; but even of very conscience truly, we trust, grounded on God's holy word: for before we took this matter in hand, we besought God from the bottom of our hearts, that we might do nothing contrary to his holy and blessed word. And in that he hath thus shewed his power in our weakness, we cannot worthily praise him; unto whom we give hearty thanks, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

When he had thus delivered and read their confession, the bishop still persisting, (sometimes in fair promises, sometimes threatening to pronounce judgement,) asked them whether they would stand to this their confession and other answers? To whom Causton said, Yea, we will stand to our answers written with our hands, and to our belief therein contained. After which answer, the bishop began to pronounce sentence against him.

Causton said, that it was much rashness, and without all love and mercy, to give judgment without answering to their confession by the truth of God's word, whereunto they submitted themselves most willingly. And therefore I, quoth Causton, because I cannot have justice at your hand, but that you will thus rashly condemn me, do appeal from you to my lord cardinal.

Then Dr. Smith said, that he would answer their confession. But the bishop, not suffering him to speak, willed Harpsfield to say his mind for the stay of the people; who, taking their confession in his hand, neither touched nor answered one sentence thereof.

Which done, the bishop pronounced sentence, first against the said Thomas Causton: and then calling Thomas Higbed, caused his articles and answers likewise to be read. In the reading whereof, Higbed said, Ye speak blasphemy against Christ's passion, and ye go about to trap us with your subtleties and snares. And though my father and mother, and other my kinsfolk, did believe as you say, yet they were deceived in so believing. And further, where you say that my lord, named Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, and others specified in the said articles, be heretics; I do wish that I were such an heretic as they were and be.

Then the bishop asked him again, whether he would turn from his error, and come to the unity of their church? To whom he said, No, I would ye should recant; for I am in the truth, and you in error.

Well, quoth the bishop, if you will return, I will gladly receive you.

No, said Higbed, I will not return as you will have me, to believe in the sacrament of the altar, your god.

Whereupon the bishop proceeded, and gave judgment upon him, as he had done before upon Thomas Causton. When all this was thus ended, they were both delivered to the sheriffs, and so by them sent to Newgate, where they remained by the space of fourteen days, praised be God, not so much in afflictions as in consolations.

For the increase whereof they earnestly desired all their good brethren and sisters in Christ to pray, that God for his Son's sake would go forth with that great mercy which already he had begun in them, so that they might persevere unto the end, to the praise of the eternal God, and comfort of all their brethren.

These fourteen days, after the condemnation, once expired, they were the 23d day of March fetched from Newgate at four o'clock in the morning, and so led through the city to Aldgate, where they were delivered unto the sheriff of Essex, and there being fast bound in a cart, were shortly after brought to their several appointed places of burning; that is to say, Thomas Higbed to Hornden-on-the-Hill, and Thomas Causton to Rayley, both in the county of Essex, where they did most constantly, the 26th day of the same month, seal this their faith with the shedding of their blood, to the glory of God and great rejoicing of the godly. And thus much touching the apprehension, examination, confession, condemnation, and burning, of these constant martyrs.

WILLIAM PYGOT, STEPHEN KNIGHT, and JOHN LAWRENCE, with their Examination and Martyrdom.

In the story before of Thomas Tomkins and his fellows, mention was made of six which were examined and condemned together by bishop Bonner, the 9th day of February; of the which six condemned persons, two (which were Tomkins and William Hunter, as ye heard) were executed, the one upon the 26th of February, and the other upon the 26th day of March. Other three, to wit, William Pygot and Stephen Knight, suffered on the 20th day, and John Lawrence the 29th day, of the said month of March.

Touehing which three martyrs, we have now something to say of their examinations. It was first demanded of them, what their opinion was of the sacrament of the altar? Whereunto they severally answered, and also subscribed, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very substance of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, but a special partaking of the body and blood of Christ; the very body and blood of Christ being only in heaven, and no where else. This answer thus made, the bishop caused certain articles to be read unto them, tending unto the same effect as did the articles before of Tomkins and of Causton.

Do you think and steadfastly believe, said he, that it is a catholic, faithful, christian, and true doctrine, to teach, preach and say, That in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is, without any substance of bread and wine there remaining, by the omnipotent power of almighty God and his holy word, really, truly, and in very deed, the true and natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, the self-same in substance (though not in outward form and appearance) which was born of the Virgin Mary, and suffered upon the cross? yea, or nay?

Whether do you think, and steadfastly believe, that your parents, kinsfolk, friends, and acquaintance, here in this present realm of England, before your birth, a great while, and also after your birth, professing and believing the said doctrine and faith concerning the said sacrament of the altar, had a true faith, and were faithful and true Christian people, or no?

Whether do you think, and steadfastly believe, that your godfathers and godmother, professing and believing the same doctrine and faith concerning the said sacrament of the altar, had a true Christian faith, and were faithful and true Christian people, or no?

Whether do you think, and steadfastly believe, that your own self in times past, being of the age of 14 years and above, did think and believe concerning the said sacrament of the altar in all points as your said parents, kinsfolk, friends, acquaintance, godfathers, and godmother, did then think and believe them, or no?

Whether do you think, and steadfastly believe, that our sovereigns the king and queen of this realm of England, and all the nobility, clergy, and laity of this realm, professing and believing the said doctrine and faith, as other Christian realms do, concerning the said sacrament of the altar, have a true Christian faith, and believe as the Catholic and true church of Christ hath always believed, preached, and taught, or no?

Whether do you think, and steadfastly believe, that our Saviour Christ and his holy Spirit hath been, is, and shall be, with his Catholic church, even to the world's end, governing and ruling the same in all things, especially in the necessary points of Christian religion, not suffering the same to err, or to be deceived therein?

Whether is it true, that you being suspected or infamed to be culpable and faulty in speaking against the sacrament of the altar, and against the very true presence of Christ's natural body, and the substance thereof in the said sacrament, and thereupon called before me upon complaint made to me against you, have not been a good space in my house, having freely meat and drink, and also divers times instructed and informed, as well by one being our ordinary, as also by my chaplains and divers other learned men, some whereof were bishops, some deans, and some archdeacons, and every one of them learned in divinity, and minding well unto you, and desiring the safeguard of your soul, and that you should follow and believe the doctrine of the Catholic church as before concerning the said sacrament of the altar; and whether you did not, at all times since your said coming to me, utterly refuse to follow and believe the said doctrine concerning the sacrament?

Whether can you now find in your hearts and conscience to conform yourself in all points to the said faith and Catholic church concerning the said sacrament of the altar, faithfully, truly, and plainly, without any dissimulation, believing therein as our said sovereigns, with the nobility, clergy, and laity, of this realm, and other Christian realms, and other persons aforesaid, and also the said Catholic church, have and do believe in that behalf?

In ease you so cannot, what ground have you to maintain your opinion, and who is of the same opinion with you, and what conference have you had therein with any, what comfort and what relief have you had therein by any of them, and what are their names and surnames, and their dwelling places?

Their answers to these articles did not differ much from Tomkins, and other like martyrs above-mentioned.

Their answers being exhibited, they were commanded to appear again the next day, at eight of the clock in the morning, and in the mean while to bethink themselves what they would do.

The next day in the morning, being the 9th of February, before their open appearance, the bishop sent for William Pygot and Stephen Knight into his great chamber in his palace, where he exhorted them to recant, and deny their former profession.

Who answered, that they were not persuaded in their consciences to return and abjure their opinions, whereunto they had subscribed. Within a while after they were all three (with Thomas Tomkins and William Hunter afore-named) brought openly into the consistory the 9th day of February aforesaid, and there had the same articles propounded unto them, which were before propounded unto the aforesaid Thomas Tomkins, and thereunto also subscribed these words, "I do so believe."

The bishop also used certain talk unto John Lawrence only; whereunto he answered in this manner, That he was a priest, and was consecrated and made a priest about eighteen years past, and that he was some time a black friar professed; that also he was assured unto a maid, whom he intended to have married.

And being again demanded his opinion upon the sacrament? he said, that it was a remembrance of Christ's body, and that many have been deceived in believing the true body of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar, and that all such as do not believe as he doth do err. And after this, they were all of them commanded to appear again at afternoon.

At which hour they came thither again, and there after the accustomed manner were exhorted to recant and revoke their doctrine, and receive the faith. To which they firmly answered, they would not, but would stick to that faith that they had declared and subscribed unto, for that they did believe that it was no error, but that the contrary thereof was very heresy.

When the bishop saw that neither his fair flatterings, nor yet his cruel threatenings, could prevail, he gave them severally their judgments. And because John Lawrence had been one of their anointed priests, he was by the bishop there (according to their order) solemnly degraded.

Their sentence of condemnation and his degradation ended, they were committed unto the custody of the sheriffs of London, who sent them unto Newgate, where they remained with joy together, until they were carried down into Essex, and there, the 28th day of March, the said William Pygot was burned at Braintree, and Stephen Knight at Maldon, who at the stake kneeling upon the ground, said this prayer which here followeth:

“O Lord Jesus Christ, for whose love I leave willingly this life, and desire rather the bitter death of thy cross, with the loss of all earthly things, than to abide the blasphemy of thy most holy name, or to obey men in breaking thy holy commandment; thou seest, O Lord, that where I might live in worldly wealth to worship a false god, and honour thine enemy, I choose rather the torment of the body, and the loss of this life, and have counted all things but vile, dust, and dung, that I might win thee; which death is dearer unto me than thousands of gold and silver. Such love, O Lord, hast thou laid up in my breast, that I hunger for thee as the deer that is wounded desireth the soil. Send thy holy Comforter, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and strengthen this piece of weak earth, which is empty of all strength of itself. Thou rememberest, O Lord, that I am but dust, and able to do nothing that is good: therefore, O Lord, as of thine accustomed goodness and love thou hast bidden me to this banquet, and accounted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongst thine elect; even so give me strength, O Lord, against this thine element, which as to my sight it is most irksome and terrible, so to my mind it may at thy commandment, as an obedient servant, be sweet and pleasant; that, through the strength of thy holy Spirit, I may pass through the rage of this fire into thy bosom, according to thy promise, and for this mortal receive an immortal, and for this corruption put on incorruption. Accept this burnt-sacrifice and offering, O Lord, not for the sacrifice, but for thy dear Son's sake, my Saviour, for whose testimony I offer this free-will offering with all my heart and with all my soul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my sins, as I forgive all the world. O sweet Son of God, my Saviour, spread thy wings over me. O blessed and Holy Ghost, through whose merciful inspiration I am come hither, conduct me into everlasting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Amen.”

The Death and Martyrdom of John Lawrence, Priest.

The next day, being the 29th day of this month, the said John Lawrence was brought to Colechester, and there being unable to go, (for that as well his legs were sore worn with heavy irons in prison, as also his body weakened with evil keeping,) was borne to the fire in a chair, and so sitting was consumed.

At the burning of this Lawrence, he sitting in the fire, young children came about the fire, and cried as well as young children could speak, saying, Lord, strengthen thy servant, and keep thy promise! Lord, strengthen thy servant, and keep thy promise! Which thing, as it is rare, so it is no small manifestation of the glory of God, which wrought this in the hearts of these little ones; nor yet a little commendation to their parents, who from their youth brought them up in the knowledge of God and his truth.

The History of Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. David's, in Wales, who most valiantly gave his life for the testimony of the truth, March 30, anno 1555.

The next day after, which was the 30th day of the said month of March, followed the martyrdom of the bishop of St. David's in Wales, called Robert Farrar, who was the next bishop in this catalogue of Christian martyrs that suffered after Mr. Hooper. This aforesaid Farrar, by the favour and good-will of the lord protector, was first called and promoted to that dignity. This man I may well call twice a martyr, not only for the cruel death of the fire which he suffered in the days of queen Mary, but also for divers other injuries and molestations in king Edward's time, which he no less firmly than unworthily sustained at the hands of his enemies after the fall of the duke of Somerset. Of these his vexations and troubles, with the wrangling articles and informations laid against him, to the number of fifty-six, and of the malice conceived against him by certain covetous canons of the church of Carmarthen, it is not necessary to make particular mention here: we shall therefore proceed to what more immediately relates to his martyrdom.

After that the aforesaid Mr. Farrar, bishop of St. David's, had been long detained in custody under sureties in the reign of king Edward, not for any crime, but by reason that he had been promoted by the duke of Somerset; and now after his fall he found fewer friends to support him against such as hunted after his bishopric: at length, after the decease of king Edward, by the coming in of queen Mary, the state of religion began to be changed; whereby a new trouble arose upon him, being now accused and examined, not for any matter of præmunire, but for his faith and doctrine. Whereupon he was called before the bishop of Winchester with Mr. Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Sanders, and others aforesaid, the 4th of February. On which day he should also with them have been condemned: but because leisure did not then so well serve the bishop, his condemnation was deferred, and he sent to prison again, where he continued until the 14th day of the said month of February. What his examinations and answers were before the said bishop of Winchester, so much as came to our hands, I have here annexed.

The Answer of Robert Farrar, Bishop of St. David's, before Winchester and others.

At his first coming and kneeling before my lord chancellor, the bishop of Durham, and the bishop of Worcester, who sat at the table, and Mr. Rochester, Mr. Southwell, Mr. Bourne, and others, standing at the table's end, the lord chancellor said unto him:

Win. Now, sir, have you heard how the world goeth here?
Far. If it like your honour, I know not.

Win. What say you? Do you not know things abroad, notwithstanding you are a prisoner?—Far. No, my lord, I know not.

Win. Lo, what a froward fellow is this!

Far. If it please your lordship, how should I know any thing abroad, being a prisoner?

Win. Have you not heard of the coming in of the lord cardinal?

Far. I know not my lord cardinal; but I heard that a cardinal was come in, but I did not believe it, and I believe it not yet.

Worcester. I pray your lordship, tell him yourself, that he may know what is done.

Win. The queen's majesty and the parliament hath restored religion to the same state it was in at the beginning of the reign of our king Henry VIII. Ye are in the queen's debt, and her majesty will be good unto you, if you will return to the Catholic church.

Far. In what state I am concerning my debts to the queen's majesty, in the court of Exchequer, my lord treasurer knoweth; and the last time that I was before your honour, and the first time also, I shewed you, that I had made an oath never to consent nor agree that the bishop of Rome should have any power or jurisdiction within this realm; and further I need not rehearse to your lordship, you know it well enough.

Bourne. You were once abjured for heresy in Oxford.

Far. That was I not.

Bourne. You were.

Far. I was never; it is not true.

Bourne. You went from St. David's to Scotland.

Far. That I did not.

Bourne. You did.

Far. That did I never; but I went from York into Scotland.

Bourne. Ah, so said I, you went with Barlow.

Far. That is true, but never from St. David's.

Bourne. You carried books out of Oxford to the archbishop of York, L. Lee.

Far. That I did not.

Bourne. You did.

Far. I did not; but I carried old books from St. Oswald's to the bishop of York.

Bourne. You supplanted your master.

Far. That did I never in my life.

Bourne. By my faith you did.

Far. Forsooth, I did not, never in my life; but did shield and save my master from danger, and that I obtained of king Henry VIII. for my true and faithful service; I thank God therefore.

Bourne. My lord, (saith Mr. B. to my lord chancellor,) he hath an ill name in Wales as ever had any.

Far. That is not so; whosoever saith so, they shall never be able to prove it.

Bourne. He hath deceived the queen in divers sums of money.

Far. That is utterly untrue; I never deceived king nor queen of one penny in my life, and you shall never be able to prove what you say.

Win. Thou art a false knave.

Then Farrar stood up unbidden (for all that while he kneeled) and said, No, my lord, I am a true man, I thank God for it. I was born under king Henry VII. I served king Henry VIII. and king Edward VI. truly, and have served the queen's majesty that now is, truly, with my poor heart and word: more I could not do; and I was never false, nor shall be, by the grace of God.

Win. How sayest thou, wilt thou be reformable?

Far. My lord, if it like your honour, I have made an oath to God, and to king Henry the Eighth, and also to king Edward, and in that to the queen's majesty, the which I can never break while I live

Durham. You have made another oath before.

Far. No, my lord, I never made another oath before.

Dur. You made a vow.

Far. That did I not.

Win. You made a profession to live without a wife, as becometh the holy priesthood.

Far. No, my lord, if it like your honour, that did I never: I made a profession to live chastely; not without a wife.

Worcester. You were sworn to him that was master of your house.

Far. That was I never.

Win. Well, you are a froward knave; we will have no more to do with you, seeing that you will not come; we will be short with you, and that you shall know within this se'nnight.

Far. I am as it pleaseth your honour to call me; but I cannot break my oath, which your lordship yourself made before me, and gave in example, the which confirmed my conscience. Then I can never break that oath whilst I live, though I should die for it.

Durham. Well, saith he, he standeth upon his oath; call another.

My lord chancellor then did ring a bell: and Mr. Farrar said, I pray God save the king and queen's majesties long to continue in honour to God's glory and their comforts, and the comfort of the whole realm; and I pray God save all your honours. And so departed.

After these examinations thus ended, bishop Farrar so remained in prison uncondemned till the 14th day (as is aforesaid) of February, and then was sent down into Wales, there to receive sentence of condemnation. Who then upon the 26th of February, in the church of Carmarthen, being brought by Griffith Leyson, Esqr. sheriff of the county of Carmarthen, was there personally presented before Henry, the bishop of St. David's, and Constantine, the public notary; which Henry there and then discharged the said sheriff, and received him into his own custody, further committing him to the keeping of Owen Jones, and thereupon declared unto the said Mr. Farrar the great merey and clemency that the king and queen's highness' pleasure was to be offered unto him, which he there did offer unto the said Mr. Farrar; that is to say, that if he would submit himself to the laws of this realm, and conform himself to the unity of the universal Catholic church, he should be received and pardoned. After that, seeing the said Mr. Farrar to give no answer to the premises, the said bishop ministered unto him these articles following:

Articles devised against Bishop Farrar.

First, Whether he believeth the marriage of priests lawful by the laws of God, and holy church, or not?

2. Item, Whether he believeth, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration duly pronounced by the priest, the very body and blood of Christ is really and substantially contained, without the substance of bread and wine?

Unto which articles the said bishop required the said Mr. Farrar to answer, upon his allegiance. To which he said, he would answer when he saw a lawful commission, and would wake no further answer at that time.

Whereupon the said bishop taking no advantage upon the same answer, committed him to the said keeper to be kept in prison until a new monition, and in the mean time to deliberate with himself for his further answer to the premises.

Another Examination of the Bishop of St. David's, before H. Morgan, (the pretended bishop of St. David's,) George Constantine, his register, and others, the last of February 1555.

This day and place, Morgan (the pretended bishop of St. David's) sitting as judge, ministered unto bishop Farrar, there personally present before him, certain articles and interrogatories in writing; which being openly read and ministered unto him, the said bishop Farrar refused to answer, till he might see his lawful commission and authority. Whereupon the aforesaid pretended bishop of St. David's did pronounce him as contumax; and for the punishment of this his contumacy to be counted pro confesso; and so did pronounce him in writing. Which being done, he committed the said bishop to the custody of Owen Jones, until Monday next, being the 4th of March, then to be brought again into the same place, between one and two.

Other Appearances of the said Bishop Farrar before Morgan.

Item, The day and place appointed, the said bishop appearing again before the pretended bishop, humbly submitting himself as ready to answer to the articles and positions above-mentioned, gently required the copy of the articles, and a competent term to be assigned unto him to answer for himself; which being granted unto him, and the Thursday next being assigned unto him between one and three to answer precisely and fully, so he was committed again to custody, as above.

On Thursday, as was appointed, (which was the 7th of March,) the said bishop personally again appeared, where he exhibited a certain bill in writing, containing in it his answer unto certain articles objected and ministered unto him before. Then after, Henry, the pretended bishop of St. David's, offered him again the said articles as before.

First, That he willed him, being a priest, to renounce matrimony.

Secondly, To grant the natural presence of Christ in the sacrament, under the forms of bread and wine.

Thirdly, That the mass is a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Fourthly, That general councils, lawfully congregated, never did nor can err.

Fifthly, That men are not justified before God by faith only, but that hope and charity are also necessarily required to justification.

Sixthly, That the Catholic church, which only hath authority to expound scriptures, and to define controversies of religion, and to ordain things appertaining to public discipline, is visible, and like unto a city set upon a mountain for all men to understand.

To these articles thus objected to him, he refused to subscribe, affirming that they were invented by man, and pertain nothing to the Catholic faith.

After this, the bishop above-named delivered unto him the copy of the articles, assigning him Monday next following to answer and subscribe to the same, either affirmatively or negatively.

Upon which Monday, being the 11th of March, he appearing again before the bishop and the aforesaid notary, George Constantine, exhibited in a written paper his mind and answer to the aforesaid articles, which the bishop had twice now objected against him before; to which articles and answers he did so subscribe. Then the bishop assigned the next Wednesday, in the forenoon, to hear his final and definitive sentence.

The which day and place the said bishop and true servant of God, Mr. Farrar, personally there appearing, was demanded by Henry, the pretended bishop of St. David's, whether he would renounce and recant his heresies, schisms, and errors, as he called them, which hitherto he had maintained; and if he would subscribe to the Catholic articles, otherwise than he had done before?

After this, the said godly bishop, Mr. Farrar, did exhibit a certain schedule written in English, appealing withal by express words of mouth from the bishop, as from an incompetent judge, to cardinal Pole, &c.

All which notwithstanding, the said bishop, proceeding in his rage, pronounced the definitive sentence against him; by which sentence he pronounced him an heretic excommunicate, and to be given up forthwith to the secular power, namely, to the sheriff of the town of Carmarthen, Mr. Leyson.

Thus this godly bishop being condemned and degraded, was committed to the secular power; who not long after was brought to the place of execution in the town of Carmarthen, where he in the market-place, on the south side of the market-cross, the 30th day of March, being the Saturday next before Passion-Sunday, most valiantly sustained the torments and passion of the fire.

Toucheing which constancy of this blessed martyr, this is worthy to be noted, that one named Richard Jones, a knight's son, coming to Mr. Farrar, a little before his death, seemed to lament the painfulness of the death he had to suffer; unto whom the bishop answered, That if he saw him once to stir in the pains of his burning, he should then give no credit to his doctrine. And as he said, so he right well performed the same; for so patiently he stood, that he never moved, but even as he stood, holding up his stumps, so still he continued, till one Richard Gravel with a staff dashed him upon the head, and so struck him down.

The History of one RAWLINS WHITE, burned at Cardiff in Wales, about the month of March, for the Testimony of Christ's Gospel.

This Rawlins was by his calling and occupation a fisherman, living and continuing in the said trade by the space of twenty years at the least, in the town of Cardiff, being, as a man of his vocation might be, one of a very good name, and well accounted among his neighbours. As touching his religion at the first, it cannot otherwise be known but that he was a great partaker of the superstition and idolatry that then was used, I mean in the reign of king Henry VIII. But after that God of his mercy had raised up the light of his gospel, through the blessed government of king Edward VI. here in this realm of England, this Rawlins began partly to dislike that which before he had embraced, and to have some good opinion of that which before by the iniquity of the time had been concealed from him; and the rather to bring this good purpose and intent of his to pass, he began to be a diligent hearer, and a great searcher out of the truth.

But because the good man was altogether unlearned, and withal very simple, he knew no ready way how he might satisfy his great desire. At length it came in his mind to take a special remedy to supply his necessity, which was this: He had a little boy which was his own son, which child he sent to school to learn to read English. Now after the little boy could read indifferently well, his father every night after supper, summer and winter, would have the boy to read a piece of the holy scripture, and now and then of some other good book. In which kind of virtuous exercise the old man had great delight and pleasure; so that Rawlins within few years in the said time of king Edward, through the help of his little son, (a special minister appointed by God, no doubt, for that purpose,) and through much conference besides, so profited, that he was able not only to resolve himself touching his own former blindness and ignorance, but was also able to admonish and instruct others; and therefore when occasion served he would go from one place to another visiting such as he had best hope in. By which his doing he became in that country both a notable and open professor of the truth, being at all times, and in all such places, not without the company of his little boy, whom (as I have said) he used as an assistant to this good purpose. And, to this his great industry and endeavour in the holy scripture, God did also add in him a singular gift of memory, so that by the benefit thereof he would and could do that in vouching and rehearsing of the text, which men of riper and more profound knowledge, by their notes and other helps of memory, could very hardly accomplish. Insomuch that he, upon the alleging of scripture, very often would cite the book, the leaf, yea, and the very sentence; such was the wonderful working of God in this simple and unlearned father.

Now when he had thus continued in his profession the space of five years, king Edward died; upon whose decease queen Mary succeeded, and with her all kind of superstition and papistry crept in. Which thing being once perceived, Rawlins did not altogether use open instruction and admonition, (as before he was wont,) and therefore oftentimes in some private place or other he would call his trusty friends together, and with earnest prayer and great lamentation pass away the time; so that by his virtuous instructions, being without any blemish of error, he converted a great number, which number no doubt had greatly increased, had not the cruel storm of persecution been raised.

The extremity and force whereof at the last so pursued this good father Rawlins, that he looked every hour to go to prison; whereupon many of those which had received comfort by his instructions did resort unto him, and by all means possible began to persuade him to shift for himself, and to dispose of his goods by some reasonable order to the use of his wife and children, and by that means he should escape that danger which was hanging over his head.

But Rawlins, nothing abashed for his own part through the iniquity of the times, and nothing at all moved with these their fleshly persuasions, thanked them most heartily for their good will, and told them plainly, that he had learned one good lesson touching the confession and denial of Christ; advertising them, that if he upon their persuasion should presume to deny his master Christ, Christ in the last day would deny and utterly condemn him: and therefore, quoth he, I will by favourable grace confess and bear witness of him before man, that I may find in him everlasting life.

Notwithstanding which answer, his friends were very importunate with him: howbeit, father Rawlins continued still in his good purpose so long, till at the last he was taken up by the officers of the town, as a man suspected of heresy. Upon which apprehension he was conveyed before the bishop of Llandaff that then was, the said bishop lying then at his house besides Chepstow; by whom, after divers combats and conflicts with him and his chaplains, this good father Rawlins was committed to prison in Chepstow. But this his keeping, whether it were by the bishop's means, or through the favour of his keeper, was not so severe but that, if he had so listed, he might have escaped oftentimes.

But that notwithstanding, he continued still, insomuch that at the last he by the aforementioned bishop was removed from Chepstow to the castle of cardiff, where he continued by the space of one whole year. And albeit that he was thus troubled and imprisoned, to his own undoing in this world, and to the utter decay of his poor wife and children; yet was his heart so set to the instruction and furtherance of others in the way of salvation, that he was never in quiet but when he was persuading or exhorting such of his familiar friends as commonly came unto him. Insomuch, that on the Sundays, and other times of leisure, when his friends came to visit him, he would pass away the time in prayer and exhortation, admonishing them always to beware of false prophets which come in sheep's clothing.

Now when he had continued in Cardiff castle by the space of one whole year, the aforementioned bishop of Llandaff caused him to be brought again from the castle of Cardiff unto his own house beside Chepstow; and while he continued there, the bishop tried many ways to reduce him to some conformity. But when all means, either by their threatening words or flattering promises, were to no purpose, the bishop willed him to advise, and be at a full point with himself, either to recant his opinions, or else to abide the rigour of the law; and thereupon gave him a day of determination. Which day being come, the bishop with his chaplains went into his chapel, not without a great number of other by-dwellers that came to behold the manner of their doings. When the bishop with his retinue were placed in order, poor Rawlins was brought before them.

The bishop, after a great deliberation in addressing himself, declared the cause of his sending, which was for that he was a man well known to hold heretical opinions, and that through his instruction many were led into blind error. In the end he exhorted him to consider his own estate wherein he stood. For (said the bishop) Rawlins, you have oftentimes since your first trouble, both here in my house and elsewhere, been travailed withal touching your opinions, and that notwithstanding ye seem altogether obstinate and wilful. Now hereupon we thought good to send for you, to see if there were any conformity in you; so that the matter is come to this point, That if you will shew yourself repentant for that which you have done against God and the prince's law, we are ready to use favour towards you; but if by no means we can persuade you touching your reformation, we are minded at this time to minister the law unto you; and therefore advise with yourself what you will do.

When the bishop had made an end of his long tale, this good father Rawlins spake boldly to him, and said, My lord, I thank God I am a Christian man, and I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God; and if I do, I desire to be reformed out of the word of God, as a Christian man ought to be.

In the end, when Rawlins would in no wise recant his opinions, the bishop told him plainly, that he must proceed against him by the law, and condemn him as a heretic.

Proceed in your law, a-God's name, said Rawlins; but for an heretic you shall never condemn me while the world standeth.

But (said the bishop to his company) before we proceed any further with him, let us pray unto God that he would send some spark of grace upon him! and it may so chance, that God through our prayer will here turn and convert his heart.

When Rawlins heard the bishop say so, Ah, my lord, (quoth he) now you deal well, and like a goodly bishop, and I thank you most heartily for your great charity and gentleness. Christ saith, "Where two or three be gathered together in my name, I will be in the midst of them: and there be more than two or three of you. Now if it be so that your request be godly and lawful, and that ye pray as ye should pray, without doubt God will hear you. And therefore, my lord, go to, do you pray to your God, and I will pray to my God. I know that my God will both hear my prayer, and perform my desire.

By and by the bishop and his company fell to prayer; and Rawlins, turning himself to a pew that stood somewhat near him, fell down upon his knees, covering his face with his hands; and when they had prayed awhile, the bishop and his company arose from prayer. And then also arose Rawlins, and came before the bishop.

Then said the bishop, Now, Rawlins, how is it with thee? Wilt thou revoke thy opinions or no? Surely (said Rawlins) my lord, Rawlins you left me, and Rawlins you find me, and by God's grace Rawlins I will continue. Certainly if your petitions had been just and lawful, God would have heard them: but you honour a false god, and pray not as ye should pray; and therefore hath not God granted your desire. But I am a poor simple man, as you see, and God hath heard my complaint, and I trust he will strengthen me in his own cause.

The bishop, when he perceived that this hypocrisy of theirs took none effect, then with hot words he reproved him, and forthwith was ready to read the sentence. Howbeit, upon some advice given to him by his chaplains that were there present, he thought best first to have a mass, thinking that indeed by so doing some wonderful work should be wrought in Rawlins; and thereupon a priest began a mass.

In the mean time poor Rawlins betook himself to prayer in a secret place thereby, until such time as the priest came to the saering, as they term it, which is a principal part of their idolatry. When Rawlins heard the saering bell ring, as the use was, he arose out of his place, and came to the choir-door, and there standing awhile, turned himself to the people, speaking these words, Good people, if there be any brethren amongst you, or, at the least, if there be but one brother amongst you, the same one bear witness at the day of judgment, that I bow not to this idol, (meaning the host that the priest held over his head.)

The mass being ended, Rawlins was soon called for again: to whom the bishop used many persuasions. But the blessed man continued so steadfast in his former profession, that the bishop's talk was altogether in vain.

Whereupon the bishop caused the definitive sentence to be read; which being ended, Rawlins was dismissed, and from thence he was by the bishop's commandment carried again to Cardiff, there to be put into the prison of the town, called Cockmarel, a very dark, loathsome, and most vile prison.

Rawlins in the mean time passed away the time in prayer, and chiefly in singing psalms; which kind of godly exercise he always used both at Cardiff castle, and in all other places.

Now after he had thus continued a prisoner in Cockmarel prison in Cardiff, as is aforesaid, a good space, about three weeks before the day wherein he suffered, the head officers of the town, that had the charge of his execution, were determined to burn him, because they would be sooner rid of him; having not indeed a writ of execution awarded, as by the law they should have. Whereupon one H. Lewes, the recorder of the town that then was, seeing that they went about to burn him without any warrant by writ, came to them and told them, that if they did burn him before they had the writ, De Hereticis comburendis, the wife of the said Rawlins would upon just cause, by law, call their doings into question.

Immediately upon this advertisement they sent to London for the writ above-named; upon the receipt whereof they made some speed to the execution of the said Rawlins.

Now when the day was come, wherein the good father should perform and accomplish the last act of this his worthy conflict, he was the night before willed to prepare himself. Now when he perceived his time was no less near than it was reported unto him, he sent forthwith to his wife, and willed her by the messenger, that in any wise she should make ready and send unto him his wedding garment, (meaning a shirt,) which afterward he was burned in. Which request or rather commandment of his, his wife with great sorrow and grief of heart did perform, and early in the morning did send it to him; which he received most gladly and joyfully.

Now when the hour of his execution was come, this good and constant father Rawlins was brought out of prison, having on his body the long shirt, which he called his wedding garment, and an old russet coat which he was wont to wear; besides this, he had upon his legs an old pair of leather buskins, which he had used long before. And thus being brought out of prison, he was accompanied, or rather guarded, with a great company of armed men. Which sight when he beheld, Alas! (quoth he,) what meaneth all this? All this needed not; by God's grace, I will not start away: but I will with all my heart and mind give unto God most hearty thanks, that he hath made me worthy to abide all this for his holy name's sake.

So he came to a place in his way where his poor wife and children stood weeping and making great lamentation; the sudden sight of whom so pierced his heart, that the tears trickled down his face. But he soon after, as though he had misliked this infirmity of his flesh, began to be as it were altogether angry with himself; insomuch that striking his breast with his hand, he used these words, Ah, flesh, stayest thou me so! wouldst thou fain prevail! Well, I tell thee, do what thou canst, thou shalt not, by God's grace, have the victory. By this time this poor innocent came to the very altar of his sacrifice (I mean the place appointed for his death,) and there found a stake ready set up, with some wood toward the making of the fire. Which when he beheld, he set forward himself very boldly; but in going toward the stake, he fell down upon his knees, and kissed the ground; and in rising again, the earth a little sticking on his nose, he said these words, Earth unto earth, and dust unto dust; thou art my mother, and unto thee I shall return.

Then went he cheerfully and very joyfully, and set his back close unto the stake; and when he had stood there awhile, he cast his eyes upon the person who wrote this account, and called him unto him, and said, I feel a great fighting between the flesh and the spirit, and the flesh would very fain have his swing: and therefore I pray you, when you see me any thing tempted, hold your finger up to me, and I trust I shall remember myself.

As he was thus standing with his back close unto the stake, a smith came with a great chain of iron; whom when he saw, he cast up his hand with a loud voice, and gave God great thanks. Then the smith cast the chain about him, and as he was making it fast on the other side, Rawlins said unto him, I pray you, good friend, knock in the chain fast: for it may be that the flesh may strive mightily.

But God, of thy great merey, give me strength and patience to abide the extremity!

Now when the smith had made him sure to the stake, the officers began to lay on more wood, with a little straw and reed; wherein the good old man was no less occupied than the best: for as far as he could reach his hands, he would pluck the straw and reed, and lay it about him in places most convenient for his speedy despatch; which thing he did with such a cheerful countenance and familiar gesture, that all men there present were in a manner astonished.

Thus when all things were ready, so that there lacked nothing but the putting to of the fire, directly over against the stake in the face of Rawlins, there was a standing erected, whereon stepped up a priest, addressing himself to speak to the people, which were many in number, because it was market-day. When Rawlins perceived him, and considered the cause of his coming, he reached a little straw unto him, and made two little stays, and set them under his elbows. Then went the priest forward in his sermon, wherein he spake of many things touching the authority of the church of Rome. In the mean time, Rawlins gave such good ear and attention, that he seemed nothing at all moved or disquieted. At the last the priest came to the sacrament of the altar, and there he began to inveigh against Rawlins's opinions; in which his invective he cited the common place of Scripture, and thereupon made a clerly interpretation.

Now when Rawlins perceived that he went about not only to teach and preach the people false doctrine, but also to confirm it by scripture, he suddenly started up, and beckoned his hand to the people, saying twise, Come hither, good people, and hear not a false prophet preaching; and then said unto the preacher, Ah, thou naughty hypocrite, dost thou presume to prove thy false doctrine by scripture! Look in the text what followeth: did not Christ say, "Do this in remembrance of me?" After which words, the priest, being rather amazed with this interruption, forthwith held his peace.

Then some that stood by cried out, Put fire! set to fire! Which being set to, the straw and reed by and by east up both a great and sudden flame; in which flame this good and blessed man bathed his hands so long, until such time as the sinews shrunk, and the fat dropped away, saving that once he did as it were wipe his face with one of them. All this while, which was somewhat long, he cried with a loud voice, O Lord, receive my soul! O Lord, receive my spirit! until he could not open his mouth. At last the extremity of the fire was so vehement against his legs, that they were consumed almost before the rest of his body was burned, which made the whole body fall over the chain into the fire sooner than it would have done. During which time of his burning, it cannot be said that he felt any great pain, considering, that not without his perfect memory he abode both quietly and patiently, even unto the departing of his life.

Thus died this godly old man Rawlins, for the testimony of God's truth, and is now rewarded with the crown of eternal life.

It is recorded furthermore of the said good father Rawlins by this reporter, that as he was going to his death, and standing at the stake, he seemed in a manner to be altered in nature: for as before he was wont to go stooping or rather crooked, through the infirmity of age, having a sad countenance, and very feeble complexion, and withal very soft in speech and gesture, now he went and stretched up himself not only bolt upright, but also bore withal a most pleasant and comfortable countenance, not without great courage both in speech and behaviour. He had about his head a kerchief, the hairs of his head (somewhat appearing beneath his kerchief) and also his beard, were more inclining to white than to gray, which gave such a show and countenance to his whole person, that he seemed to be altogether angelical.

It is also said by this reporter, that a little before the fire flashed up to his body, many of his friends came to him, and took him by the hand, amongst whom the reporter of this story held him so long by the hand, till the flame of the fire arose, and forced them asunder. In the mean time, the priest, of whom I spake afore, cried out and said, That it was not lawful for any man to shake him by the hand, because he was an heretic, and condemned by the church.

The chief cause of his trouble, was his opinion touching the sacrament of the altar. He was at the time of his death of the age of threescore years, or thereabouts.

In March 1555, pope Julius died; concerning whose deeds, to make a full declaration, it would not be so tedious to the reader as horrible to all good ears. Under this Julius flourished the archbishop of Beneventanus, a Florentine, named Johannes, a Casadean of the pope's chamber, and chief legate to the Venetians: who well declaring the fruit of that filthy see, so far forgot both honesty and nature, that he shamed not only to play the filthy Solomite himself, and to boast openly of the same, but also took upon him most impudently in Italian metre, to all men's ears, to set forth the praise and commendation of that beastly iniquity, saying, that he himself never used other; and this book was printed at Venice by one Trojanus Navus: and yet the pope could suffer this so great iniquity and shameless beastliness even in his own chamber, who could not abide the true doctrine of Christ in Christian books.

Amongst other pranks and deeds of the aforesaid pope, in his jubilee, and in the synod of Trent, and in confirming of the idol of Loretto, this is also reported of him in his life, that he delighted greatly in pork-flesh and peacocks. Upon a time when he was admonished by his physician to abstain from all swine's flesh, for that it was hurtful for his gout, and yet would not follow his counsel; the physician afterwards gave warning to his steward, that he should set no more pork-flesh before him. Whereupon when the pope perceived the said pork-flesh to be lacking in his accustomed service, Where, said he, is my pork? And when the steward had answered that his physician had forbidden any pork to be served; then the pope, bursting out into a great rage, said these words, Bring me, said he, my pork-flesh, al dispetto de Dio; that is, in the despite of God.

At another time, he sitting at dinner, pointing to a peacock upon his table, which he had not touched, Keep, said he, this cold peacock for me against supper, and let me sup in the garden; for I shall have guests. So when supper came, and amongst other hot peacocks he saw not his cold peacock brought to his table, the pope, after his wonted manner, fell into an extreme rage, &c. Whereupon one of his cardinals sitting by desired him, saying, Let not your holiness, I pray, be so moved with a matter of so small weight. Then the pope answering again, What (said he) if God was so angry for an apple, that he east our first parents out of paradise for the same; why may not I, being his viceroy, be angry then for a peacock, since a peacock is a greater matter than an apple?

Behold here, good reader, the holiness of this blasphemous pope! And yet thou shalt see here what affection was borne to him here in England, by the dirges, hearses, and funerals, commanded to be had and celebrated in all churches, by the queen and her council, as may appear by the copy of their letters here following :

A Letter from the Bishop of Winchester (being Lord Chancellor) unto Bonner, Bishop of London, touching the celebrating of the Pope's Funeral.

"After my hearty commendations to your good lordship, the king and queen's majesty having certain knowledge of the death of the pope's holiness, thought good there should be as well solemn obsequies said for him throughout the realm, as also these prayers, (which I send you herein enclosed,) used at mass-time in all places at this time of vacation ; and therefore willed me to signify their pleasures unto you in this behalf, that thereupon ye might proceed to the full accomplishment thereof, by putting the same in due execution within your own diocese, and sending word to the rest of the bishops to do the like in theirs.

Thus doubting not but that your lordship will use such diligence in this matter at this time as shall be necessary, I bid your lordship heartily well to fare.—From my house at Asher, the 10th of April, 1555.

"Your assured friend and brother,
"STEPHANUS WINTON, Chan."

Upon this commandment, on Wednesday in Easter week there were hearses set up, and dirges sung, for the said Julius, in divers places. At which time it chanced a woman to come into St. Maguns' church, at the bridge foot in London, and there seeing a hearse and other preparation, asked what it meant ? and others that stood by said, that it was for the pope, and that she must pray for him. Nay, quoth she, that will I not, for he needeth not my prayers : and seeing he could forgive us all our sins, I am sure he is clean himself : therefore I need not pray for him. She was heard speak these words by certain that stood by ; which by and by carried her unto the cage at London bridge, and bid her cool herself there.

A Spectacle for all Christians to behold, and to take heed of the like blasphemous Doctrines.

By many and sundry ways Almighty God hath admonished men of all nations in these our later years, to embrace, and not violently to repugn against, the light of his gospel : as first, by preaching of his word ; secondly, by the blood of the martyrs ; and thirdly, by terrible examples shewed from time to time upon his adversaries. In the number of whom cometh here to be remembered the notable working of God's hand upon a certain priest in Kent, named Nightingal, parson of Crondal, besides Canterbury ; who upon Shrove-Sunday, which was about the third day of the said month of March, and year of our Lord aforesaid, rejoicing not a little at this alteration of religion, began to make a sermon to his parishioners, taking his text out of the words of St. John, "He that saith that he hath no sin, is a liar, and the truth is not in him," &c. And so upon the same very impertinently declared to them all such articles as were set forth by the pope's authority, and by the commandment of the bishops of this realm ; saying, moreover, unto the people, Now, masters and neighbours, rejoice and be merry, for the prodigal son is come home : for I know that the most part of you be as I am, for I know your hearts well enough. And I shall tell you what hath happened in this week past : I was before my lord cardinal Pole's grace, and he made me as free from sin as I was at the font-stone ; and on Thursday last being before him, he hath appointed me to notify (I thank him for it) the same unto you : and I will tell you what it is. And so reading the pope's bull of pardon that was sent into England, he said, he thanked God that ever he had lived to see that day ; adding, moreover, that he believed that by the virtue of that bull he was clean from sin, as that night that he was born. And immediately upon the same fell suddenly down out of the pulpit, and never stirred hand nor foot !

Testified by Robert Austen, of Cartham, who both heard and saw the same, and is witnessed also by the whole country round about.

VARIOUS PERSONS TROUBLED FOR RELIGION.

In the beginning of April, and the 2d day of the said month, died in prison John Awcock, who after was buried in the fields, as the manner of the Papists was to deny their Christian burial to such as died out of their popish anti-christian church.

On the 1st day of April, anno 1555, a letter was sent to the sheriff of Kent, to apprehend Thomas Wodgate and William Maynard, for preaching secretly, and to send them up to the council.

The 7th of the said month, another letter was sent to the said sheriff for the apprehension of one Harnwich, who went about with a boy with him, preaching from place to place.

The 15th of April, a letter was directed to sir Nicholas Hare and sir Thomas Cornwallis, willing them to examine Mr. Flower, alias Branch, what he meant to wear about his neck written, Deum time, Idolum fuge ; and whom else he knew to wear the like, praying them also to speak to Bonner, bishop of London, speedily to proceed against him for his religion according to the laws, and that the justices of peace of Middlesex should likewise proceed against him for shedding of blood in the church, according to the statute, so as if he continued his opinion, he might be executed at the farthest by the latter end of this week, and that his right hand be, the day before his execution, or the same day, stricken off.

The 22d of April, there was a like letter sent to the justices of peace of Middlesex, with a writ for the execution of the said Flower, commanding them to see his hand stricken off before his burning.

The 29th of April, Mr. Robert Hornbcy, servant then to the lady Elizabeth, was vented before the council for his religion ; and standing constantly to the truth, notwithstanding their threats and other persuasions, was therefore committed to the Marshalsea.

A Declaration of the Life, Examination, and Burning of GEORGE MARSH, who suffered Martyrdom for the profession of the Gospel of Christ, at Westminster, the 24th day of April, anno 1555.

George Marsh was born in the parish of Deane, in the county of Lancaster, and was well brought up in learning an honest living by his parents ; who afterwards, about the 25th year of his age, took to wife an honest maiden of the country ; with whom he continued, earning their living upon a farm, having children between them lawfully begotten ; and then God taking his wife out of this world, he being most desirous of godly studies, (leaving his household and children in good order,) went unto the university of Cambridge, where he studied and much increased in learning and godly virtues, and was a minister of God's holy word and sacraments, and for a while was curate to Laurence Saunders.

In which condition of life he continued for a space, earnestly setting forth God's true religion, to the defacing of Antichrist's false doctrine, by his godly readings and sermons, as well there and in the parish of Dean, as elsewhere in Lancashire.

Whereupon at length, by detraction of certain adversaries, he was apprehended, and kept in close prison by George Cotes, then bishop of Chester, in strait prison in Chester, within the precinct of the bishop's house, about the space of four months, being not permitted to have relief and comfort of his friends; but charge being given to the porter to mark who they were that asked for him, and to signify their names unto the bishop, as by the particular description of his story, testified and recorded with his own pen, more evidently may appear in the process hereunder :

The Handling, Treating, and Examination of George Marsh, being sent first by the Earl of Derby to Dr. Cotes, Bishop of Chester.

On the Monday before Palm-Sunday, which was the 12th day of March, it was told me at my mother's house, that Roger Wrinstone, with other of Mr. Barton's servants, did make diligent search for me in Bolton, and when they perceived that I was not there, they gave strict charge to Robert Ward and Robert Marsh to find and bring me to Mr. Barton the day next following, with others to be brought before the honourable earl of Derby, to be examined in matters of religion, &c.

I knowing this by relation of divers of my friends, was diversely affected : my mother and other my friends advertising me to fly, and to avoid the peril, which thing I had intended afore after a week then next ensuing, if this in the mean while had not chanced ; seeing that if I were taken, and would not recant in matters of religion, (as they thought I would not, and as, God strengthening and assisting me with his holy Spirit, I never will,) it would not only have put them to great sorrow, heaviness, and losses, with costs and charges, to their shame and rebuke in this world, but also mine own self, after troubles and painful imprisonment, unto shameful death.

This considered, they advised me and counselled me to depart and fly the country, as I had intended to have done, if this had not happened. To whose counsel my weak flesh would gladly have consented, but my spirit did not fully agree ; thinking and saying thus to myself, that if I fled so away, it would be thought that I did not only fly the country, and my nearest and dearest friends, but much rather from Christ's holy word, according as these years past I had with my heart, or at least with my outward living, professed, and with my mouth and word taught, according to the small talent given me of the Lord. I being thus with their counsel and advice, and the cogitations and counsels of mine own mind, drawn as it were divers ways, went from my mother's house, saying, that I would come again at evening.

In the mean time, I ceased not by earnest prayer to ask counsel of God (who is the giver of all good gifts) and of other my friends, whose godly judgments and knowledge I much trusted unto. After this, I met with one of my said friends on Deane Moor, about sun going down ; and after we had consulted together of my business, not without hearty prayer kneeling on our knees, we departed. I not fully determined what to do, but taking my leave with my friend, said, I doubted not but God, according as our prayer and trust was, would give me such wisdom and counsel as should be most to his honour and glory, the profit of my neighbours and brethren in the world, and obtaining of mine eternal salvation by Christ in heaven.

This done, I returned to my mother's house again, where had been divers of Mr. Barton's servants seeking after me ; who, when they could not find me, straitly charged my brother and William Marsh to seek me that night, and to bring me to Smethhills the next day : who being so charged, were gone to seek me.—Thus intending afore to have been all night with my mother, but then considering that my tarrying there would disquiet her with her household, I departed from thence, and went beyond Deane church, and there tarried all night with an old friend of mine, taking ill rest, and consulting much with myself of my trouble.

So at my first awaking, one came to me from a faithful friend of mine with letters, which I never read, nor yet looked on, who said this : My friend's advice was that I should in no wise fly, but abide and boldly confess the faith of Jesus Christ. At whose word I was so confirmed and established in my conscience, that from thenceforth I consulted no more whether it were better to fly or tarry ; but was at a point with myself, that I would not fly, but go to Mr. Barton, who did seek for me, and there present myself, and patiently bear such cross as it should please God to lay upon my shoulders. Whereupon my mind and conscience afore being much unquieted and troubled, was now merry and quiet.

So I arose betimes in the morning, and after I had said the English Litany, as my custom was, with other prayers, kneeling on my knees by my friend's bedside, I prepared myself to go towards Smethhills ; and as I was going thitherward, I went into the house of Henry Widdowes, of my mother-in-law, of Ralph Yeton, and of the wife of Thomas Richardson, desiring them to pray for me, and have me commended to all my friends, and to comfort my mother, and be good to my little children ; for, as I supposed, they should not see my face any more before the last day. And so took my leave of them, not without tears shed on both parts, and came to Smethhills about nine of the clock, and presented myself afore Mr. Barton ; who shewed me a letter from the earl of Derby, wherein he was commanded to send me with others to Latham.

Whereupon he charged my brother and William Marsh to bring and deliver me the next day by ten o'clock, before the said earl or his council. I made earnest suit with other special friends, which I had there at the same time, to Mr. Barton, that he would take some one of them or them all, bound by recognizance or otherwise for mine appearing before the said earl, or his said council, that my brother and William Marsh might be at home, because it was the chiefest time of seeding, and their ploughs could not go if they were not at home ; but nothing could be obtained.

So we went to my mother's, and there I dined and shifted part of my clothes ; and so praying, took my leave of my mother, the wife of Richard Marsh, and both their households, they and I both weeping, and so departed from them, and went toward Latham, and were all night a mile and an half on this side Latham. So the next day, which was Wednesday, we arose, prayed, and came to Latham betimes, and tarried there till four of the clock at afternoon.

Then was I called by Roger Mekinson to my lord and his council, and so I was brought into the chamber of presence, where was present sir William Nores, sir Pierce Alec, Mr. Shereburn, the parson of Grapnal, Mr. More, with others. Where when I had tarried a little while, my lord turned him toward me, and asked what was my name ? I answered, Marsh.

Then he asked, whether I was one of those that sowed evil seed and dissension amongst the people? Which thing I denied, desiring to know mine accusers, and what could be laid against me; but that I could not know.

Then, said he, he would with his council examine me themselves, and asked me whether I was a priest? I said, No. Then he asked me, what had been my living? I answered, I was a minister, served a cure, and taught a school. Then said my lord to his council, This is a wonderful thing: afore he said he was no priest, and now he confesseth himself to be one. I answered, By the laws now used in this realm, as far as I do know, I am none.

Then they asked me, who gave me orders, or whether I had taken any at all? I answered, I received orders of the bishop of London and Lincoln.

Then said they one to another, Those be of these new heretics; and asked me what acquaintance I had with them? I answered, I never saw them but at the time when I received orders.

They asked me how long I had been curate, and whether I had ministered with a good conscience? I answered, I had been curate but one year, and had ministered with a good conscience, I thanked God; and if the laws of the realm would have suffered me, I would have ministered still; and if the laws at any time hereafter would suffer me to minister after that sort, I would minister again.

Whereat they murmured, and the parson of Grapnal said, this last communion was the most devilish thing that ever was devised.

They then asked me, what my belief was? I answered, I believed in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, according as the scriptures of the Old and New Testament do teach, and according as the four symbols or creeds, that is, to wit, the creed commonly called Apostolorum, the creed of Nice council, of Athanasius, and of Austin and Ambrose, do teach.

And after a few words, the parson of Grapnal said, But what is thy belief in the sacrament of the altar?

I answered, I believe that whosoever, according to Christ's institution, did receive the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood, did eat and drink Christ's body and blood with all the benefits of his death and resurrection, to their eternal salvation; for Christ, said I, is ever present with his sacrament.

Then asked they me, whether the bread and wine, by the virtue of the words pronounced by the priest, were changed into the flesh and blood of Christ? and that the sacrament, whether it were received, or reserved, was the very body of Christ?

Whereunto I made answer, I knew no further than I had shewed already. For my knowledge is unperfect, said I; desiring them not to ask me such hard and unprofitable questions, whereby to bring my body into danger of death, and to suck my blood. Whereat they were not a little offended, saying they were no blood-suckers, and intended nothing to me but to make me a good Christian.

So after many other questions, which I avoided as well as I could, remembering the saying of Paul, "Foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing they do but engender strife;" my lord commanded me to come to the board, and gave me pen and ink in my hand, and commanded me to write mine answers to the questions of the sacrament above named; and I wrote as I had answered before. Whereat he being much offended, commanded me to write a more direct answer, saying, I should not choose but to do it.

Then I took the pen and wrote, That further I knew not. Whereat he being sore grieved, after many threatenings, said, I should be put to shameful death like a traitor, with such other like words; and sometimes giving me fair words, if I would turn and be conformable as others were, how glad he would be.

In conclusion, after much ado, he commanded me to ward, in a cold, windy, stone house, where was little room; where I lay two nights without any bed, saving a few great canvass tent-clothes, and a pair of sheets, but no woollen clothes; and so continued till Palm-Sunday, occupying myself as well as I could in meditation, prayer, and study: for no man could be suffered to come to me, but my keeper twice a day, when he brought me meat and drink.

On Palm-Sunday after dinner I was sent for to my lord and his council, (saving sir William Nores and sir Pierce Alea were not then present in place,) amongst whom was sir John Beram, and the vicar of Prescott. So they examined me yet once again of the sacrament. And after I had communed apart with the vicar of Prescott a good space concerning that matter, he returned to my lord and his council with me, saying, That answer which I had made before, and then did make (as it is above written) was sufficient for a beginner, and as one which did not profess a perfect knowledge in that matter, until such time as I had learned further. Wherewith the earl was very well pleased, saying, he doubted not but by the means and help of the vicar of Prescott I would be conformable in other things. So after many fair words he commanded I should have a bed, with fire, and liberty to go amongst his servants, so that I would do no harm with my communication amongst them.

And so after much other communication I departed, much more troubled in my spirit than afore, because I had not with more boldness confessed Christ, but in such sort as mine adversaries thereby thought they should prevail against me; whereat I was much grieved. For hitherto I went about as much as in me lay to rid myself out of their hands; if by any means without open denying of Christ and his word that could be done.

This considered, I cried more earnestly unto God by prayer, desiring him to strengthen me with his holy Spirit with boldness to confess him; and to deliver me from their enticing words, and that I might not be spoiled through their philosophy and deceitful vanity, after the traditions of men and ordinances of the world, and not after Christ.

And so after a day or two I was sent for to the vicar of Prescott, and the parson of Grapnal; where our communication was concerning the mass; and he asked what offended me in the mass? I answered, the whole mass did offend me, first, because it was in a strange language, whereby the people were not edified, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. and because of the manifold and intolerable abuses and errors contained therein, contrary to Christ's priesthood and sacrifice.

Then they asked me, in what place thereof? and I named certain places; which places they went about with gentle and far-sought interpretations to mitigate, saying, those places were understood far otherwise than the words did purport, or than I did take them.

I answered, I did understand them as they did purport, and as their own books do comment and gloss upon them.

They said, Sacrificium or Oblatio did not in the mass signify any thing else than either a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, or else a memorial of a sacrifice or oblation. So they caused a mass-book to be sent for, and shewed me where in some places the mass was written, Sacrificium laudis. Whereto I answered, that it followed not therefore that in all places it signified a sacrifice or oblation of praise or thanksgiving ; and although it did, yet was not a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving to be offered for the sins of the people, for that did Christ by his own passion once offer on the cross : where the words of the mass were, that the priest did offer an oblation and sacrifice for the sins and offences both of himself and of the people ; for them that were dead, and for the salvation of the living ; and that the commixtion of the body and blood of Christ was health both of body and soul.

The vicar answered, That was to be understood of the commixtion of Christ's body and blood with his church or people. So after much exhortation unto me that I should be conformable to the true Catholic church, (which as they meant was the Romish church,) I departed, not consenting unto them.

So within a day or two came to me Mr. More, bringing with him certain articles, whereunto Dr. Crome had consented and subscribed in the presence of certain witnesses in the days of king Henry VIII. and willed me to read them over ; and asked me whether I would consent and subscribe unto those articles ? And after communication had of one or two of the said articles, I confessed plainly I would in no wise consent and subscribe to those articles ; for that would be against mine own conscience. And so he departed from me.

So within a short space after, which was on Shier-Thurs-day, the said parson and vicar sent for me again, saying, my lord would be at a short point with me ; for if I would not consent and subscribe unto four articles drawn out of the articles aforesaid, I must go to prison straightways.

The first was, Whether the mass now used in the church of England was according to Christ's institution, and with faith, reverence, and devotion, to be heard and seen ?

The second, Whether the Almighty, by the words pronounced by the priest, did change the bread and wine after the words of consecration into the body and blood of Christ, whether it were received or reserved ?

Thirdly, Whether the lay people ought to receive but under the form of bread only, and that the one kind was sufficient for them ?

Fourthly, Whether confession to the priest now used in England were godly and necessary ?

These four questions or articles they delivered me in writing, and bade me go to my chamber and subscribe my answers with mine own hand, and come again. So within one half hour I came to them again, and delivered them the questions, with mine answer. The first I denied. The second I answered, as I did to my lord afore, and as is above written. To the third I answered, that the lay-people by Christ's institution ought to receive under both kinds, and that it sufficeth not them to receive under the one kind only. Fourthly, that though auricular confession were a commodious mean to instruct the rude people, yet it was not necessary, nor commanded of God.

They much exhorted me then to leave mine opinions, saying, I was much deceived, understanding the scriptures amiss ; and much counselled me to follow the Catholic church of Christ, and to do as others did. I answered, my faith in Christ conceived by his holy word I neither could nor would deny, alter, or change, for any living creature, whatsoever he were ; desiring them to speak to my lord, that during my life and imprisonment my poor friends might be suffered to relieve me with necessary things according to their powers. And so, after much exhortation of them, to do and believe as the Catholic church did, we departed ; I from thenceforth continuing in the porter's ward, not coming forth of my chamber, saving at noon and night while I dined and supped.

Upon one of the Easter holidays Mr. Shereburn and Mr. More sent for me, persuading me much to leave mine opinions ; saying, all the bringers-up and favourers of that religion had evil luck, and were either put to death, or in prison and in danger of life. Again, the favourers of the religion now used had wondrous good luck and prosperity in all things ; with many other worldly reasons of man's wisdom ; for, as for the scriptures, Mr. Shereburn confessed himself ignorant.

I answered, I believed and leaned only to the scriptures, not judging things by prosperity or adversity. But they earnestly advised me to refuse mine opinions, and not to let for any worldly shame.

I answered, that what I did, I did not for the avoiding of any worldly shame, saying, my soul and life were dearer to me than the avoiding of any worldly shame : neither yet did I it for any vain praise of the world, but in reverent fear of God.

Then Mr. More questioned with me of receiving the sacrament under the one kind. I said, Christ's institution was plain, that all men should drink of the cup. Then he told me of the 24th of Luke, and the 20th of the Acts, where was but mention of breaking bread only ; whereof he gathered, that they received the sacrament but under one kind.

That I denied, saying, those places either did not speak of the celebration of the Lord's supper, or else under the name of breaking bread was signified and meant the receiving of the sacrament both of the body and blood of Christ, according to his institution. So after much communication of that matter, Mr. Shereburn said, It was great pity that I, being a well-favoured young man, and one that might have good living and do good, would so foolishly cast myself away, sticking so hard to such foolish opinions.

I answered as afore I had done to my lord and to his council, that my life, mother, children, brethren, sisters, and friends, with other delights of my life, were as dear and sweet unto me as unto any other man, and that I would be as loath to lose them as another would, if I might hold them with good conscience, and without the ignominy of Christ : and seeing I could not do that, my trust was, that God would strengthen me with his holy Spirit to lose them all for his sake. For I take myself, said I, for a sheep appointed to be slain, patiently to suffer what cross soever it shall please my merciful Father to lay on me. And so after I had desired them, that if I were committed to prison, my friends might be suffered to relieve me, they departed.

Mr. More after this brought unto me a book of one Alphonsus, a Spanish friar, of all heresies wherewith the church of Rome (which he called Christ's true church) had been troubled since Christ's time, willing me to read and take counsel of that book ; and appointed me a place, where this author did write against them that say, the lay-people ought to receive under both kinds.

This author I perceived did vehemently write against Luther, Melanethon, Pelican, and other German divines, in all points defending the blasphemous abuses and enormities of the Romish church, condemning as detestable heresies whatsoever was written, taught, or believed, contrary to the same, using for his strongest and surest arguments the consent, agreement, and determination, of the Romish church. So within a few days Mr. More came to me again, asking me how I liked the book ?—I said, the author of the book did in all points, being a Papist, allow the rites and abuses of the Romish church; and shewed him farther, that this author, without authority, and contrary both to the scriptures and old doctors, did condemn for heresy the lay-people receiving of this sacrament under both kinds, whereas this author witnesseth his own self, Christ's church nine hundred years after Christ used the contrary.

So in conclusion he rebuked me, saying, I was unlearned, and erred from the Catholic faith, stubborn, and stood altogether in mine own conceit.—I answered, For my learning, I acknowledge myself to know nothing but Jesus Christ, even him that was crucified, and that my faith was grounded upon God's holy word only, and such as I doubted not pleased God, and as I would stand in until the last day, God assisting me; and that I did not say or do any thing either of stubbornness, self-wilfulness, vain-glory, or any other worldly purpose, but with good conscience, and in the fear of God; and desired them to speak to my lord and his council, that I might find some gentleness and mercy at their hands. He made me short answer. Then I said, I commit my cause unto God, who hath numbered the hairs of my head, and appointed the days of my life, saying, I am sure, God, which is a righteous judge, would make inquisition for my blood, according as he hath promised. Then he took his book from me, and departed.

I continued still in ward until Low-Sunday, and after dinner, my keeper, Richard Scott, came to me into my chamber, and told me that two young men were come to carry me to Lancaster; and so delivered me unto them, a great company, both of my lord's servants and others, accompanying and bringing me on the way, counselling like as is aforesaid.

To whom I made plain answer, that in matters of faith I would give place to no earthly creature. So they comforted me, and said that they were sorry for me; saying, If I knew mine opinion to be good, I did well; and so they departed, willing my bringers to treat me honestly.

My bringers by the way shewed me they were willed and advised to bind me, and that they desired first to see me; and after they had looked on me sitting at dinner, they answered they would take charge of me, being loose: for, they said, I seemed to be an honest man.

The first night we were all night at Broughton, and the second day we came to Lancaster betimes at afternoon, and so they kept me all night with them of their gentleness, and on the morrow delivered me to the gaoler, who brought me into the highest prison.

After that the said George came to Lancaster castle, and there being brought with other prisoners unto the sessions, was made to hold up his hand with the malefactors. The earl of Derby had the following conversation with him.

Communication between George Marsh and the Earl of Derby.

I said unto my lord, I had not dwelled in the country these three or four years past, and came home but lately to visit my mother, children, and other my friends, and to have departed out of the country before Easter then next, and to have gone out of the realm. Wherefore I trusted, seeing nothing could be laid against me wherein I had offended against the laws of this realm, his lordship would not with captious questions examine me, to bring my body into danger of death, to the great discomfort of my mother; but suffer me to avoid peaceably, seeing I might have fled out of the country, and yet of mine own will came to his lordship.

He said to his council, he had heard tell of me above at London; and intended to make search for me, and take me either at Lancashire or above at London; and asked me into what land I would have gone?

I answered, I would have gone either into Germany, or else into Denmark. He said to his council, In Denmark they used such heresy as they have done in England; but as for Germany, (he said,) the emperor had destroyed them.

So after such like words I said unto him, my trust was, that his lordship, being of the honourable council of the late king Edward, consenting and agreeing to acts concerning faith towards God and religion, under great pain, would not so soon after consent to put poor men to shameful death, as he had threatened me, for embracing the same with so good a conscience. He answered, that he, with the lord Windsor and lord Daeres, with one more whose name I have forgotten, did not consent to those acts, and that the names of them four would be to be seen as long as the parliament house stood. Then my lord did rehearse the evil luck of the dukes of Northumberland and Suffolk, with others, because they favoured not the true religion; and again, the good hap and prosperity of the queen's highness, because she favoured the true religion: thereby gathering the one to be good, and of God, and the other to be wicked, and of the devil, and said that the duke of Northumberland confessed so plainly.

While I was (saith Marsh) in ward at Latham, divers at sundry times came unto me. Some said unto me, that all my fellows had recanted, and were gone home, whereas indeed that was not so; for I saw divers of them divers times after. Others said, that it was reported amongst my lord's household, that I had consented and agreed in all things with my lord and his council.

Furthermore, while I was at Lancaster, at this session many came to me to talk with me: some of good-will towards me, but without knowledge, gave me such counsel as Peter gave Christ as he went up to Jerusalem, when he took him aside and began to rebuke him, saying, Master, favour thyself, this thing shall not be unto thee. But I answered with Christ's sharp answer unto Peter again, who turned about and said unto Peter, "Come after me, Satan." And perceiving that they were an hinderance unto me, and that they savoured not the things which are of God, but the things that are of men, I made them plain answer, that I neither could nor would follow their counsel, but that, by God's grace, I would both live and die with a pure conscience, and according as hitherto I had believed and professed. For we ought in no wise to flatter and bear with them, though they love us never so well, which go about to pluck us away from the obedience that we owe unto God and to his word, but after Christ's example sharply to rebuke them for their counsel.

Some others, yea, even strangers, also came to me, far unlike to these, who after sober communication had, consented with me in all things, lamenting much my troublous estate, giving me comfortable words, and some money too, and resorted to me oftentimes for the space of two, three, or four days. There came also many priests to me, by two, three, four, five, or six, at once, whose months it was a thing easy enough to stop; for the priests, which is much to be lamented, be not always the greatest clerks, and best learned in the law of God: at their departing, they either consented with me, or else had nothing to say against me, saying, they could find no fault with my words. My communication with them was about the sacrament. There came also into the prison to me Mr. Westby, Mr. Ashton of Hill, Mr. Ashton of Chaterton, and many more, both gentlemen and others, to my great comfort. Unto whom I had good occasion to utter a great part of my conscience: for God so strengthened me with his spirit of boldness, according to my humble request and prayer before, (everlasting thanks be given him,) that I was nothing afraid to speak to any that came to me, no, not even to judges themselves, before whom I was thrice arraigned at the bar amongst the thieves, with irons on my feet, and put up my hand as others did; but yet with boldness I spake unto them, so long as they would suffer me.

They also sent for me the fourth time into their chamber, where, amongst other things, they laid it straitly to my charge, that I had reported that I knew a whole mass of good gentlemen in Lancashire of mine opinion, and straitly charged me, upon pain of allegiance to the queen's grace, to shew who they were. (But I denied that I had spoken any such thing, as it was indeed a false forged lie of some wicked wretches.) After that, they threatened and rebuked me, for my preaching to the people out of the prison, as they called it, and for my praying and reading so loud that the people in the streets might hear. The truth is, I and my prison-fellow Warbarton, every day kneeling on our knees, did read morning and evening prayer, with the English Litany every day twice, both before noon and after, with other prayers more, and also read every day certain chapters of the Bible, commonly toward night: and we read also these things with so high and loud a voice, that the people without in the streets might hear us, and would oftentimes, namely, in the evenings, come and sit down in our sights under the windows, and hear us read, wherewith others being offended, complained.

All this while George Marsh was not yet brought before the bishop, whose name was Dr. Cotes, placed the same time in the bishopric of Chester. Of whose coming then into Lancaster, the said George Marsh reporteth as followeth:

How the Bishop came to Lancaster, and of his doings there.

The bishop being at Lancaster, there set up and confirmed all blasphemous idolatry, as holy-water casting, procession, gadding, matins mumbling, children confirming, mass hearing, setting up idols, with such heathenish rites forbidden by God; but no gospel preaching, which Christ, God's Son, so earnestly commanded. He was informed of me, and willed to send for and examine me. Which thing he refused to do, saying, he would have nothing to do with heretics so hastily.

And instead of his liberality towards me, poor prisoner, he sent for the gaoler, and rebuked him, because he suffered me to fare so well, willing him to have me more strictly kept and dieted. But if his lordship were tabled but one week with me, I do think he would judge our fare but slender enough.

Also he, and his chaplains, and chancellor, did find fault with the schoolmaster and others, for speaking to me, as to a most heinous heretic, and also with the gaoler for suffering them. Such is the merey that those religious fathers shew to the friendless and comfortless in their adversities. If we may know the tree by the fruits, as Christ saith, no man can judge such for any other but for enemies to Christ and his true religion. God lay it never to their charge, but forgive them, and turn their hard hearts, if it be his will.

The Troubles and Examination of George Marsh, under Dr. Cotes, Bishop of Chester.

Ye heard before how George Marsh, being first imprisoned at Latham, and afterwards translated unto Lancaster, was troubled by the earl. Again, within few days after, the said Marsh was removed from Lancaster, and coming to Chester, was sent for by Dr. Cotes, then bishop, to appear before him in his hall, nobody being present but the twain; and then he asked him certain questions concerning the sacrament: who made such answer as the bishop seemed therewith to be content, saving, that he utterly denied transubstantiation, and allowed not the abuse of the mass, nor that the lay-people should receive under one kind only, contrary to Christ's institution; in which point the bishop went about to persuade him: howbeit, God be thanked, all in vain. Much other talk he had with him, to move him to submit himself to the universal church of Rome; and when he saw he could not prevail, he sent him to prison again. And after being there, came to him divers times one Massie, a fatherly old man, one Wrench, the schoolmaster, one Hensham, the bishop's chaplain, and the archdeacon, with many more; who with all probability of words and philosophy, or worldly wisdom and deceitful vanity, after the tradition of men, and the beggarly ordinances and laws of the world, but not after Christ, went about to persuade him to submit himself to the church of Rome, and to acknowledge the pope to be head thereof, and to interpret the scriptures none otherwise than that church did; with many such arguments and persuasions of fleshly wisdom.

To whom the said George Marsh answered, that he did acknowledge and believe (though much evil be withal annexed) one holy catholic and apostolic church, without which there is no salvation, and that this church is but one, because it ever hath, doth, and shall confess and believe one only God, and him only worship, and one only Messiah, and in him only trust for salvation; which church also is ruled and led by one Spirit, one word, and one faith, and that this church is universal or catholic, because it ever hath been since the world's beginning, is, and shall endure to the world's end, and comprehending within it all nations, kindreds, and languages, degrees, states, and conditions of men; and that this church is builded only upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner-stone, and not upon the Romish laws and decrees, the bishop of Rome being the supreme head.

And where they said the church did stand in ordinary succession of bishops, being ruled by general councils, holy fathers, and the laws of holy church, and so had continued by the space of fifteen hundred years and more; he made answer, that the holy church, which is the body of Christ, and therefore most worthy to be called holy, was before any succession of bishops, general councils, or Romish decrees; neither yet was bound to any time or place, ordinary succession, general councils, or traditions of fathers; neither had any supremacy over empires and kingdoms; but that it was a little poor flock, dispersed and scattered abroad.

He shewed and proved unto them also, by the flood of Noah, the destruction of Sodom, the Israelites' departing out of Egypt, by the parables of the sower, of the king's son's marriage, of the great supper, and by other plain sentences of scripture, that this church was of none estimation, and little in comparison of the church of hypocrites and wicked worldlings.

He was thrust at with all violence of craft and subtlety; but yet the Lord upheld him and delivered him. Everlasting thanks be to that merciful and faithful Lord, which suffereth us not to be tempted above our might, but in the midst of our troubles strengtheneth us with his most holy Spirit of comfort and patience, giving us a mouth and wisdom how and what to speak, which all his adversaries are not able to resist.

Another Appearance of George Marsh before the Bishop.

Now after that the said bishop had taken his pleasure in punishing his prisoner, and often reviling him, giving taunts and odious names of heretic, &c. he caused him to be brought forth into the chapel in the cathedral church of Chester, called our Lady's chapel, before him the said bishop, at two of the clock in the afternoon, who was there placed in a chair for that purpose, and Fulk Dutton, mayor of the said city, and others.

Then they caused the said George Marsh to take an oath upon a book, to answer truly unto such articles as should be objected against him. Upon which oath taken, the chancellor laid unto his charge, that he had preached and openly published most heretically and blasphemously, within the parish of Deane, Eccles, Bolton, Berry, and many other parishes within the bishop's diocese, in the months of January, February, or some other time of the last year, proceeding directly against the pope's authority and Catholic church of Rome, the blessed mass, the sacrament of the altar, and many other articles. Unto all which in sum he answered, that he neither heretically nor blasphemously preached or spake against any of the said articles; but simply and truly, as occasion served, and (as it were thereunto forced in conscience) maintained the truth touching the same articles, as all you now present did acknowledge the same in the time of the late king Edward VI.

Then they examined him severally of every article, and bade him answer directly yea or nay, without circumstance, for they were come to examine, and not to dispute at that present.

Then he answered them unto every article very modestly, according to the doctrine by public authority received and taught in this realm at the death of the said king Edward; whose answers were every one noted by the registrar. After this, the company for that time brake up, and he was returned to his prison.

The final Appearance of George Marsh before the Bishop.

Within three weeks after this, or thereabouts, in the said chapel, the said bishop and others before-named there being assembled, the said George Marsh was brought by the keeper and others with bills and divers weapons before them; where first the said chancellor, by way of an oration, declared unto the people present the said bishop's charge and burning charity, who even like as a good shepherd doth see to his flock, that none of his sheep have the scab or other disease for infecting other clean sheep, but will save and cure the said scabbed sheep; so his lordship had sent for the said George Marsh there present, as a scabbed sheep, and had weeded him out for corrupting others, and had done what he could in shewing his charitable disposition towards the said Marsh, to reduce him from his haughty heresies; but all that he could do would not help: so that he was now determined, if the said Marsh would not relent and abjure, to pronounce and give sentence definitive against him. Wherefore he bade the said George Marsh to be now well advised what he would do, for it stood upon his life; and if he would not at that present forsake his heretical opinions, it would be, after the sentence given, too late, though he would never so gladly desire it.

Then the said chancellor first asked him, whether he were not of the bishop's diocese? To which he answered, that he knew not how large his diocese was, for his continuance was at Cambridge. But then they replied, and asked whether he had not lately been at Deane parish, in Lancashire, and there abode? And he answered, Yea.

Then the chancellor read all his former answers that he had made in that place at his former examination, and at every one he asked him, whether he would stick to the same, or, no? To which he answered again, Yea, yea.

How say you then to this? (quoth the chancellor :) in your last examination, amongst many other damnable and schismatical articles, you said, That the church and doctrine taught and set forth in king Edward's time, was the true church, and the doctrine of the true church; and that the church of Rome is not the true and catholic church.

I so said indeed, quoth Marsh, and I believe it to be true. Here also others took occasion to ask him, (for that he denied the bishop of Rome's authority in England,) whether Linus, Anacletus, and Clement, that were bishops of Rome, were not good men? and he answered, Yes, and divers others: But, said he, they claimed no more authority in England than the bishop of Canterbury doth at Rome; and I strive not, quoth he, with the place, neither speak I against the person of the bishop, but against his doctrine, which in most points is repugnant to the doctrine of Christ.

Thou art an arrogant fellow indeed then, said the bishop: in what article is the doctrine of the church of Rome repugnant to the doctrine of Christ?

To whom George Marsh answered and said, O my lord, I pray you judge not so of me: I stand now upon the point of my life and death, and a man in my case hath no cause to be arrogant, neither am I, God is my record. And as concerning the disagreement of the doctrine, among many other things, the church of Rome erreth in the sacrament. For where Christ in the institution thereof did as well deliver the cup as the bread, saying, "Drink ye all of this," (and Mark reporteth that they did drink of it :) in like manner St. Paul delivered it unto the Corinthians: and in the same sort also was it used in the primitive church by the space of many hundred years. Now the church of Rome doth take away one part of the sacrament from the laity. Wherefore, if I could be persuaded in my conscience by God's word, that it were well done, I could gladly yield in this point.

Then said the bishop, Non disputandum est cum heretico, that is, "There is no disputing with an heretic." And therefore, when all his answers were read, he asked him whether he would stand to the same; being as they were, said he, full of heresy! or else forsake them, and come unto the Catholic church?

To whom he made this full answer, and said, That he held no heretical opinion, but utterly abhorred all kinds of heresy, although they most untruly so did slander him. And he desired all the people present to bear him witness, (if hereafter any would slander him, and say that he held any grievous heresy,) that in all articles of religion he held none other opinion than was by law most godly established, and publicly taught in England, at the death of king Edward VI. and in the same pure religion and doctrine he would, by God's grace, stand, live, and die.

And here the chancellor spake to one Leach, which stood near unto Marsh, and bade him stand farther from him; for his presence did him no good.

This being done, the bishop took a writing out of his bosom, and began to read the sentence of condemnation: but when the bishop had read almost half thereof, the chancellor called him, and said, Good, my lord, stay, stay; for if ye proceed any further, it will be too late to call it again. And so the bishop stayed. Then his popish priests, and many other of the ignorant people, called upon Marsh, with many earnest words, to recant, and amongst others, one Pulleyn, a shoemaker, said to him, For shame, man! remember thyself, and recant.—They bade him kneel down and pray, and they would pray for him. So they kneeled down, and he desired them to pray for him, and he would pray for them.

The bishop then asked him again, whether he would not have the queen's mercy in time? and he answered, he did gladly desire the same, and did love her grace as faithfully as any of them; but yet he durst not deny his Saviour, Christ, for losing his mercy everlasting, and so win everlasting death.

Then the bishop put his spectacles again upon his nose, and read forward his sentence about five or six lines; and there again the chancellor, with a smiling countenance, called to the bishop, and said, Yet, good my lord, once again stay; for if that word be spoken, all is past, and no relenting will then serve: and the bishop, pulling off his spectacles, said, I would stay if it would be.

How sayest thou, quoth he, wilt thou recant? Many of the priests and ignorant people bade him do so, and to call to God for grace; and pulled him by the sleeve, and bade him recant and save his life.

To whom he answered, I would as fain live as you, if in so doing I should not deny my Master, Christ, and again he should deny me before his Father in heaven.

So the bishop read out his sentence unto the end, and straight after said unto him, Now will I no more pray for thee than I will for a dog. And Marsh answered, that notwithstanding he would pray for his lordship. And after this, the bishop delivered him unto the sheriffs of the city. Then his late keeper bade him Farewell, good George! with weeping; which caused the officers to carry him to prison at the north gate, where he was closely kept until the time he went to his death, during which time he had small comfort or relief of any worldly creature. For being in the dungeon or dark prison, none that would do him good could speak with him, or at least durst so do for fear of accusation: and some of the citizens which loved him in God for the gospel's sake, whereof there were but a few, although they were never acquainted with him, would sometimes in the evening, at a hole upon the wall of the city, that went into the said dark prison, call to him, and ask him how he did. He would answer them most cheerfully, that he did well, and thanked God most highly that he would vouchsafe of his mercy to appoint him to be a witness of his truth, and to suffer for the same, wherein he did most rejoice; beseeching him, that he would give him grace not to faint under the cross, but patiently bear the same to his glory, and comfort of his church; with many other godly sayings at sundry times, as one that most desired to be with Christ. Once or twice he had money cast him in at the same hole, about ten pence at one time, and two shillings at another; for which he gave God thanks, and used the same to his necessity.

When the time and day appointed came that he should suffer, the sheriffs of the city, whose names were Amry and Couper, with their officers, and a great number of poor simple barbers, with rusty bills and poll-axes, went to the north gate, and there took out the said George Marsh, who came with them most humbly and meekly, with a lock upon his feet. And as he came upon the way towards the place of execution, some folks proffered him money, and looked that he should have gone with a little purse in his hand, (as the manner of felons was accustomed in that city in times past, at their going to execution, to the end to gather money to give unto a priest to say trentals or masses for them after their death, whereby they might, as they thought, be saved;) but Marsh said, he would not as then be troubled with money, but willed some good man to take the money, if the people were disposed to give any, and to give it unto the prisoners or poor people. So he went all the way unto his death with his book in his hand, looking upon the same; and many of the people said, This man goeth not unto his death as a thief, or as one that deserveth to die.

Now when he came to the place of execution without the city, near unto Spittle-Boughton, one Cawdrey (being then a deputy chamberlain of Chester) shewed Marsh a writing under a great seal, saying, that it was a pardon for him if he would recant. Whereat Marsh answered, that he would gladly accept the same; and said farther, that he loved the queen: but forasmuch as it tended to pluck him from God, he would not receive it upon that condition.

After that he began to speak to the people, shewing the cause of his death, and would have exhorted them to stick unto Christ.—Whereupon one of the sheriffs said, George Marsh, we must have no sermoning now.—To whom he said, Master, I cry you mercy: and so kneeling down, made his prayers, and then put off his clothes unto his shirt; and then was he chained to the post, having a number of faggots under him, and a thing made like a firkin, with pitch and tar in the same, over his head; and by reason the fire was unskilfully made, and that the wind did drive the same to and fro, he suffered great extremity in his death, which, notwithstanding, he bore very patiently.

Wherein this is to be noted, That when he had been a long time tormented in the fire without moving, having his flesh so broiled and puffed up, that they which stood before him underneath could not see the chain wherewith he was fastened, and therefore supposed no less but he had been dead, notwithstanding, suddenly, he spread abroad his arms, saying, Father of heaven, have mercy upon me! and so yielded his spirit into the hands of the Lord!

Upon this, many of the people said that he was a martyr, and died marvellously patient and godly. Which thing caused the bishop shortly after to make a sermon in the cathedral church, and therein affirmed, That the said Marsh was an heretic, burnt like an heretic, and was a firebrand in hell.

In recompense of this his good and charitable sermon, within short time after the just judgment of God appeared upon the said bishop, recompensing him in such wise, that not long after he turned up his heels and died. Upon what cause his death was gendered, I have not here precisely to pronounce, because the rumour and voice of the people is not always to be followed: notwithstanding, such a report went in all men's mouths, that he died of the foul disease.

A Letter Exhortatory of George Marsh to the faithful Professors of Laughton.

“Grace be unto you, and peace be multiplied, in the knowledge of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

“I thought it my duty to write unto you, my beloved in the Lord at Laughton, to stir up your minds, and to call to your remembrance the words which have been told you before, and to exhort you, (as that good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, Barnabas, did the Antiochians,) that with purpose of heart ye continually cleave unto the Lord, and that ye stand fast, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, whereof (God be thanked) ye have had plenteous preaching unto you by your late pastor, Mr. Saunders, and other faithful ministers of Jesus Christ; which now, when persecution ariseth because of the word, do not fall away like shrinking children, and forsake the truth, being ashamed of the gospel wherof they have been preachers, but are willing and ready for your sakes, which are Christ's mystical body, to forsake not only the chief and principal delights of this life, (I do mean their native countries, friends, living, &c.) but also to fulfil their ministry to the utmost, that is with their painful imprisonments and blood-sheddings, if need shall require, to confirm and seal Christ's gospel, whereof they have been ministers; and, as St. Paul saith, they are ready not only to be cast into prison, but also to be killed, for the name of the Lord Jesus.

"Whether these, being that good salt of the earth, that is, true ministers of God's word, by whose doctrine, being received through faith, men are made savoury unto God, and which themselves lose not their saltness now when they be proved with the boisterous storms of adversity and persecution; or others, being that unsavoury salt which hath lost its saltness, that is, those ungodly ministers which do fall from the word of God into the dreams and traditions of Antichrist: whether of these, I say, be more to be credited and believed, let all men judge.

"Wherefore, my dearly beloved, receive the word of God with meekness that is grafted in you, which is able to save your souls; and see that ye be not forgetful hearers, deceiving yourselves with sophistry, but doers of the word; whom Christ doth liken to a wise man, which buildeth his house on a rock, that when the great rain descended, and the floods came, and beat upon the house, it fell not, because it was grounded upon a rock: that is, when Satan, with all his legion of devils, with all their subtle suggestions, and the world, with all the mighty princes thereof, with their crafty counsels, do furiously rage against us, we faint not, but abide constant in the truth, being grounded upon a most sure rock, which is Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel, against which the gates of hell (that is, the power of Satan,) cannot prevail.

"And be ye followers of Christ and his apostles, and receive the word in much affliction, as the godly Thessalonians did: for the true followers of Christ, and the apostles, be they which receive the word of God. They only receive the word of God, which both believe it, and also frame their lives after it, and be ready to suffer all manner of adversity for the name of the Lord, as Christ and all the apostles did, and as all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must do: for there is none other way into the kingdom of heaven, but through much tribulation. And if we suffer any thing for the kingdom of heaven's sake, and for righteousness sake, we have the prophets, Christ, the apostles, and martyrs, for an ensample to comfort us: for they did all enter into the kingdom of heaven at the strait gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, which few do find. And unless we will be content to deny our own selves, and take up the cross of Christ and his saints, it is an evident argument that we shall never reign with him.

"And again, if we can find in our hearts patiently to suffer persecution and tribulations, it is a sure token of the righteous judgment of God, that we are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which we also suffer. 'It is verily, (saith the apostle,) a righteous thing with God, to recompense tribulation to them that trouble us, and rest to us that be troubled:' for after this life, the godly being delivered from their tribulations and pains, shall have a most quiet and joyful rest; whereas the wicked and ungodly contrariwise shall be tormented for evermore with intolerable and unspeakable pains, as Christ, by the parable of the rich glutton and wretched Lazarus, doth plainly declare. These ought we to have before our eyes always, that in the time of adversity and persecution, (whereof all that will be the children of God shall be partakers, and wherewith it hath pleased God to try some of us already,) we may stand steadfast in the Lord, and endure even unto the end, that we may be saved. For unless we, like good warriors of Jesus Christ, will endeavour ourselves to please him, who hath chosen us to be soldiers, and fight the good fight of faith even unto the end, we shall not obtain that crown of righteousness which the Lord, that is a righteous judge, shall give to all them that love his coming. Let us therefore receive with meekness the word that is grafted in us, which is able to save our souls; and ground ourselves on the sure rock, Christ. 'For (as the apostle saith) other foundation can no man lay, besides that which is laid already, which is Jesus Christ. If any man build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, timber, hay, stubble, every man's work shall appear: for the day shall declare it, and it shall be shewed in the fire. And the fire shall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work that he hath builded upon abide, he shall receive a reward: if any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss; but he shall be saved himself, nevertheless yet as it were through fire.'

"By fire here doth the apostle understand persecution and trouble; for they which do truly preach and profess the word of God, which is called the word of the cross, shall be railed upon and abhorred, hated, thrust out of company, persecuted, and tried in the furnace of adversity, as gold and silver tried in the fire.

"By gold, silver, and precious stones, he understandeth them that in the midst of persecution abide steadfast in the word. By timber, hay, and stubble, are meant such as in time of persecution do fall away from the truth. And when Christ doth purge his floor with the wind of adversity, these scatter away from the face of the earth like light chaff, which shall be burned with unquenchable fire. If they then which do believe, do in time of persecution stand steadfastly in the truth, the builder (I do mean the preacher of the word) shall receive a reward, and the work shall be preserved and saved: but if it so be that they go back and swerve, when persecution ariseth, the builder shall suffer loss, that is to say, shall lose his labour and cost, but yet he shall be saved, if he, being tried in the fire of persecution, do abide fast in the faith.

"Wherefore, my beloved, give diligent heed that ye, as living stones, be builded upon this sure rock, and be made a spiritual house and a holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable unto God by Jesus Christ. For we are the true temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in us, if so be that we continue in the doctrine of the gospel. We are also an holy and royal priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices and oblations; for the sacrifices of the new testament are spiritual, and of three manners:

"The first is the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which St. Paul doth call the fruit of those lips which confess the name of God.

"The second is mercy towards our neighbours, as the prophet Hosea saith, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice. Read the five-and-twentieth chapter of Matthew.

"The third is, when we make our body a quick sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God; that is, when we mortify and kill our carnal lusts, and so bring our flesh, through the help of the Spirit, under the obedience of God's holy law. This is a sacrifice to God most acceptable, which the apostle calleth our reasonable serving of God. And let us be sure that unless we do now at this present take better heed to ourselves, and use thankfully the grace of God offered to us by the gospel preached these years past, whereby we are brought to the knowledge of the truth; unless, I say, we keep Christ and his holy word dwelling by faith in the house and temple of our hearts, the same thing that Christ threatened unto the Jews, shall also happen unto us: that is, the unclean spirit of ignorance, superstition, idolatry, infidelity, and unbelief, the mother and head of all vices, which by the grace of God was cast out of us, bringing with him seven other spirits worse than himself, shall to our utter destruction return again unto us; and so shall we be in worse case than ever we were before. For if we, after we have escaped from the filthiness of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, be yet tangled therein again and overcome, then is the latter end worse than the beginning; and it had been better for us not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after we have known it, to turn from the holy commandment given to us. For it is then happened unto us according to the true proverb, 'The dog is turned to his vomit again, and the sow that was washed to wallowing in the mire.'

"Wherefore, my beloved in Christ, let us (on whom the ends of the world are come) take diligent heed unto ourselves, that now, in these last and perilous times, in the which the devil is come down, and hath great wrath, because he knoweth his time is but short, and whereof the prophets, Christ, and the apostles, have so much spoken, and given us an earnest forwarning, we withhold not the truth in unrighteousness, believing, doing, or speaking any thing against our knowledge and conscience, or without faith. For if we so do, for whatsoever cause it be, it is a wilful and obstinate infidelity, and a sin unto death; and as our Saviour Christ saith, 'If ye believe not, ye shall die in your own sins.' For unless we hold fast the word of life, both believing it, and also bringing forth fruit worthy of repentance, we shall, with the unprofitable fig-tree, which did but cumber the ground, be cut down, and our talent taken from us, and given unto another that shall put it to a better use: and we, through our own unthankfulness put from the mercy of God, shall never be able to pay our debts, that is to say, we shall altogether be lost and undone. For the earth, that drinketh in rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them that dress it, receiveth blessing of God: but that ground that beareth thorns and briars, is reprov'd, and is high unto cursing, whose end is, to be burned.

"Nevertheless, dear friends, we trust to see better of you, and things which accompany salvation, and that ye being the good ground, watered with the moistness of God's word plentifully preached among you, will with a good heart hear the word of God and keep it, bringing forth fruit with patience. And be none of those forgetful and hypoeritish hearers, which, although they hear the word, yet the devil cometh and eateth away that which was sown in their heart; either having no root in themselves, endure but a season, and, as soon as tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by they were offended; either with the cares of this world, and deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and so are unfruitful. Read the parable of the sower, and among other things note and mark, that the most part of the hearers of God's word are but hypoerites, and hear the word without any fruit or profit, yea, only to their greater condemnation; for only the fourth part of the seed doth bring forth fruit. Therefore let not us, that be ministers or professors and followers of God's word, be discouraged, though that very few do give credit, and follow the doctrine of the gospel, and be saved.

"Whosoever therefore hath ears to hear, let him hear; for whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath: that is to say, they that have a desire of righteousness, and of the truth, shall be more and more illuminated of God; on the contrary part, they that do not covet after righteousness and truth, are more hardened and blinded, though they seem unto themselves most wise. For God doth here follow an example of a loving father, which when he seeth that fatherly love and correction doth not help forwards his children, useth another way. He ceaseth to be beneficial unto them, and to minister unto them fatherly correction: he giveth them over unto themselves, suffering them to live as they list themselves.

"But we trust to see better of you, my dearly beloved, and that ye, like very Gaderenites, for fear to lose your worldly substance or other delights of this life, will not banish away Christ and his gospel from among you; but that ye with all diligence of mind will receive the word of God, taught you by such ministers as now, when persecution ariseth because of the word, are not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord Jesus, but are content to suffer adversity with the gospel, and therein to suffer trouble as evil-doers, even unto bonds. And if ye refuse thus to do, your own blood will be upon your own heads. And as ye have had plentiful preaching of the gospel, more than others have had; so ye shall be sure, if ye repent not, and bring forth fruit worthy of repentance, to be sorer plagued, and to receive greater vengeance at God's hand than others, and the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and be given to another nation, which will bring forth the fruits thereof.

"Wherefore, my dearly beloved in Christ, take good heed to yourselves, and ponder well in your minds, how fearful and horrible a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God. And see that ye receive not the word of God in vain, but continually labour in faith, and declare your faith by your good works, which are infallible witnesses of the true justifying faith, which is never idle, but worketh by charity. And see that ye continually give yourselves unto all manner of good works: amongst the which the chiefest are, to be obedient to the magistrates, sith they are the ordinance of God, whether they be good or evil, unless they command idolatry and ungodliness, i. e. things contrary unto true religion. For then ought we to say with Peter, We ought more to obey God than man. But in any wise we must beware of tumult, insurrection, rebellion, or resistance.

"The weapon of a Christian in this matter, ought to be the sword of the Spirit, which is God's word and prayer, coupled with humility and due submission, and with readiness of heart rather to die than to do any ungodliness. Christ also doth teach us, that all power is of God, yea, even the power of the wicked, which God causeth oftentimes to reign, for our sins and disobedience towards him and his word. Whosoever then doth resist any power, doth resist the ordinance of God, and so purchase to himself utter destruction and undoing.

"We must also by all means be promoters of unity, peace, and concord. We must honour and reverence princees, and all that be in authority, and pray for them, and be diligent to set forth their profit and commodity.

"Secondly, We must obey our parents, or them that be in their rooms, and be careful for our households, that they be provided for and fed, not only with bodily food, but much rather with spiritual food, which is the word of God.

"Thirdly, We must serve our neighbours by all means we can, remembering well the saying of Christ, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye likewise unto them; for this is the law and the prophets.'

"Fourthly, We must diligently exercise the necessary work of prayer for all estates; knowing that God therefore hath so much commanded it, and hath made so great promises unto it, and doth so well accept it. After these works, we must learn to know the cross, and what affection and mind we must bear towards our adversaries and enemies, whatsoever they be, to suffer all our adversities and evils patiently, to pray for them that hurt, persecute, and trouble us: and by thus using ourselves, we shall obtain an hope and certainty of our vocation, that we be the elect children of God.

"And thus I commend you, brethren, unto God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build further, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified; beseeching you to help Mr. Saunders and me, your late pastors, and all them that be in bonds for the gospel's sake, with your prayers to God for us, that we may be delivered from all them that believe not, and from unreasonable and froward men, and that this our imprisonment and affliction may be to the glory and profit of our Christian brethren in the world, and that Christ may be magnified in our bodies, whether it be by death or by life.

"Salute from me all the faithful brethren: and because I write not several letters to them, let them either read or hear these my letters. The grace of our Lord be with you all. Amen.—The 28th of June, by the unprofitable servant of Jesus Christ, and now also his prisoner,

"GEORGE MARSH.

"Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Pray, pray, pray: never more need."

Another Letter of the said George Marsh, to certain of his dearly beloved Friends at Manchester, in Lancashire.

"Grace be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

"After salutations in Christ to you, with thanks for your friendly remembrances of me, desiring and wishing unto you, not only in my letters, but also in my daily prayers, such consolation in spirit and taste of heavenly treasures, that ye may thereby continually work in faith, labour in love, persevere in hope, and be patient in all your tribulations and persecutions, even unto the end and glorious coming of Christ; these shall be earnestly to exhort and beseech you in Christ, as ye have received the Lord Jesus, even so to walk, rooted in him, and not to be afraid of any terror of your adversaries, be they never so many and mighty, and you on the other side never so few and weak: for the battle is the Lord's. And as in times past God was with Abraham, Moses, Isaac, David, the Maccabees, and others, and fought for them, and delivered all their enemies into their hands; even so hath he promised to be with us also unto the world's end, and so to assist, strengthen, and help us, that no man shall be able to withstand us. For as I was with Moses, so will I be with thee, saith God, and will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Be strong and bold, neither fear nor dread: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest. Now if God be on our side, who can be against us?

"In this our spiritual warfare is no man overcome, unless he traitorously leave and forsake his Captain; either cowardly cast away his weapons, or willingly yielded himself to his enemies, either fearfully turn his back and fly. Be strong therefore in the Lord, dear brethren, and in the power of his might, and put on all the armour of God, that ye may be able to stand steadfast against the crafty assaults of the devil.

"Now what weapons ye must fight withal, learn of St. Paul, a champion both much exercised, and also most valiant and invincible. For we must think none other, but that the life of man is a perpetual warfare upon earth, as the examples of all godly men throughout all ages do declare.

The valiant warrior St. Paul being delivered into the hands of the ungodly, and that so many times, and also from so many extreme perils and dangers of death, as he his own self doth witness, is fain to commit himself in the end to the rough waters of the sea, where he was in great peril and jeopardy of his own life: yet was God always (to the great comfort of all that hear of it) most ready to comfort and succour him, and gloriously delivered him out of all his troubles; so that no man that invaded him could do him any harm, and in the end he was compelled to say, I have finished my course, the time of my departing is at hand, I long to be loosed, and to be with Christ, which is the best of all, most heartily desiring death.

"These things be written for our learning and comfort, and be to us a sure obligation, that if we submit ourselves to God and his holy word, no man shall be able to hurt us, and that he will deliver us from all troubles, yea, from death also, until such time as we covet and desire to die. Let us therefore run with patience unto the battle that is set before us, and look unto Jesus the captain and finisher of our faith, and after his example, for the reward's sake that is set out unto us, patiently to bear the cross, and despise the same. For all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution.

"Christ was no sooner baptized, and declared to the world to be the Son of God, but Satan was by and by ready to tempt him; which thing we must look for also; yea, the more we shall increase in faith and virtuous living, the more strongly will Satan assault us; whom we must learn, after the example of Christ, to fight against, and overcome with the holy and sacred scriptures of the word of God (which are our heavenly armour) and sword of the Spirit. And let the fasting of Christ, while he was tempted in the wilderness, be unto us an example of sober living, not for the space of forty days, (as the Papists do fondly fancy of their own brains,) but as long as we are in the wilderness of this wretched life assaulted of Satan, who like a roaring lion walketh about, and ceaseth not, seeking our destruction.

"Neither can the servants of God at any time come and stand before God, that is, lead a good life, and walk innocently before God, but Satan cometh also among them; that is, he daily accuseth, findeth fault, vexeth, persecuteth, and troubleth the godly; for it is the nature and property of the devil always to hurt, and to do mischief, unless he be forbidden of God; for unless God doth permit him, he can do nothing at all, not so much as enter into a filthy hog.

"Let us, therefore, knowing Satan's deceits and rancour, walk the more warily, and take upon us the shield of faith, whereby we may be able to quench and to overcome all the fiery and deadly darts of the wicked. Let us take to us the helmet of salvation, and sword of the Spirit, (which is the word of God,) and learn to use the same according to the example of our grand captain, Christ. Let us fast and pray continually. For this frantie kind of devils go not out otherwise, as Christ doth teach us, but by faithful prayer and fasting, which is true abstinence and soberness of living, if we use the same according to the doctrine of the gospel and word of God. Fasting is acceptable to God, if it be done without hypocrisy, that is to say, if we use it to this intent, that thereby this mortal body and disobedient carcase may be tamed and brought under the subjection of the spirit: and again, if we fast to this intent, that we may spare wherewith to help and succour our poor needy brethren.

"To fasting and prayer must be joined alms, and mercy towards the poor and needy; and that our alms may be acceptable unto God, three things are chiefly required:

"First, That we give with a cheerful and joyful heart; for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver.

"Secondly, That we give liberally, putting aside all niggardship, knowing that he that soweth little, shall reap little, and he that soweth plenteously, shall reap plenteously. Let every man therefore do according as he is able. The poorest caitiff in the world may give as great and acceptable an alms in the sight of God as the richest man in the world can do. The poor widow that did offer but two mites, which make a farthing, did highly please Christ; insomuch, that he affirmed with an oath that she of her penny had added more to the offerings of God than all the rich men, which of their superfluity had cast in very much. For if there be first a willing mind, as St. Paul saith, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that a man hath not.

"Thirdly, We must give without hypocrisy and ostentation, not seeking the praise of men, or our own glory or profit. And although the scriptures in some places make mention of a reward to our alms and other good works, yet ought we not to think that we do merit any thing; but rather we ought to acknowledge, that God in his mere mercy rewardeth in us his own gifts. For what hath he that giveth alms, that he hath not received? He then that giveth to a poor man any manner of thing, giveth not of his own, but of those goods which he hath received of God. What hast thou, saith the apostle, that thou hast not received? If thou hast received it, why rejoicest thou, as though thou hadst not received it?

"This sentence ought to be had in remembrance of all men. For if we have nothing but that which we have received, what can we deserve? or, what need we to dispute and reason of our own merits?—it cometh of the free gift of God, that we live, that we love God, that we walk in his fear: where is our deserving then? We must also in this our spiritual warfare arm ourselves with continual prayer; a very necessary, strong, and invincible weapon; and after the example of Christ, and all other godly men, cry heartily unto God in faith in all our distresses. Let us go boldly to the seat of grace, where we shall be sure to receive mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. For now is pride and persecution increased: now is the time of destruction and wrathful displeasure.

"Wherefore, my dear brethren, be ye fervent in the law of God, and jeopard ye your lives, if need shall require, for the testament of the fathers, and so shall ye receive great honour, and an everlasting name. Remember Abraham: was not he found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness? Joseph in time of his trouble kept the commandment, and was made a lord of Egypt. Phinehas was so fervent for the honour of God, that he obtained the covenant of an everlasting priesthood. Joshua, for the fulfilling of the word of God, was made the captain of Israel. Caleb bare record before the congregation, and received an inheritance. David also in his merciful kindness obtained the throne of an everlasting kingdom. Elias, being zealous and fervent in the law, was taken up into heaven. Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, remained steadfast in the faith, and were delivered out of the fire. In like manner, Daniel, being unguilty, was saved from the mouth of the lions.

"And thus ye may consider throughout all ages, since the world began, that whosoever put their trust in God were not overcome. Fear not ye then the words of ungodly men; for their glory is but dung and worms: to-day they are set up, and to-morrow are they gone, for they are turned into earth, and their memorial cometh to nought. Wherefore let us take good hearts unto us, and quit ourselves like men in the law: for if we do the things that are commanded us in the law of the Lord our God, we shall obtain great honour therein.

"Beloved in Christ, let us not faint because of affliction, wherewith God trieth all them that are sealed unto life everlasting; for the only way into the kingdom of God is through much tribulation. For the kingdom of heaven is like a city builded and set upon a broad field, and full of all good things; but the entrance is narrow and sudden, full of sorrow and travel, perils and labours; like as if there were a fire at the right hand, and a deep water at the left, and as it were one strait path between them both, so small that there could but one man go there. If this city were now given to an heir, and he never went through the perilous way, how could he receive his inheritance? Wherefore, seeing we are in this narrow and strait way, which leadeth unto the most joyful and pleasant city of everlasting life; let us not stagger, either turn back, being afraid of the dangerous and perilous way, but follow our captain, Jesus Christ, in the narrow and strait way, and be afraid of nothing, no, not even of death itself: for it is he that must lead us to our journey's end, and open us the door unto everlasting life.

"Consider also the course of this world, how many there be which for their master's sake, or for a little promotion's sake, would adventure their lives in worldly affairs, as commonly in wars, and yet is their reward but light and transitory, and ours is unspeakable, great, and everlasting. They suffer pains to be made lords on earth for a short season; how much more ought we to endure like pains, yea, peradventure, much loss, to be made kings in heaven for evermore? Consider also the wicked of this world, which, for a little pleasure's sake, or to be avenged on their enemies, will fight with sword and weapons, and put themselves in danger of imprisonment and hanging. So much as virtue is better than vice, and God mightier than the devil, so much ought we to excel them in this our spiritual battle.

"And seeing, brethren, it hath pleased God to set me, and that most worthy minister of Christ, John Bradford, your countryman, in the fore-front of this battle, where for the time is most danger, I beseech you all in the bowels of Christ to help us, and all our fellow soldiers standing in like perilous places, with your prayers to God for us, that we may quit ourselves like men in the Lord, and give some example of boldness and constancy, mingled with patience in the fear of God; that ye and others our brethren, through our example, may be so encouraged and strengthened to follow us, that ye also may leave example to your weak brethren in the world, to follow you, Amen.

"Consider what I say: the Lord give us understanding in all things. Brethren, the time is short: it remaineth that ye use this world as though ye used it not: for the fashion of this world vanisheth away. See that ye love not the world, neither the things that are in the world; but set your affection on heavenly things, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Be meek and long-suffering, serve and edify one another with the gift that God hath given you. Beware of strange doctrine; lay aside the old conversation of greedy lusts, and walk in a new life. Beware of uncleanness, covetousness, foolish talking, false doctrine, and drunkenness; rejoice and be thankful towards God, and submit yourselves one to another. Cease from sin, spend no more time in vice, be sober, and apt to pray: be patient in trouble, love each other, and let the glory of God, and profit of your neighbour, be the only mark ye shoot at in all your doings. Repent ye of the life that is past, and take better heed to your doings hereafter. And above all things, cleave ye fast to him, who was delivered to death for our sins, and rose again for our justification. To whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and rule for evermore, Amen.

"Salute from me in Christ all others which love us in the faith, and at your discretion make them partakers of these letters: and pray ye all for me and others in bonds for the gospel, that the same God (which by his grace hath called us from wicked Papistry unto true Christianity, and now of love proveth our patience by persecution,) will of his mercy and favour in the end gloriously deliver us, either by death or by life, to his glory, Amen.—At Lancaster, the 30th of August, 1555.

"By me, an unprofitable servant of Christ,

"GEORGE MARSH."

A Prayer of George Marsh, which he used daily.

"O Lord Jesus Christ, which art the only physician of wounded consciences, we miserable sinners, trusting in thy gracious goodness, do briefly open unto thee the evil tree of our heart, with all the roots, boughs, leaves, and fruits, and with all the crooks, knots, and knoures, all which thou knowest: for thou thoroughly perceivest as well the inward lusts, doubtings, and denying thy providence, as those gross outward sins which we commit inwardly and deadly. Wherefore we beseech thee, according to the little measure of our infirmity, although we be far unable and unapt to pray, that thou wouldest mercifully circumsise our stony hearts, and for these old hearts create new within us, and replenish us with a new spirit, and water us and moisten us with the juice of heavenly grace and wells of spiritual waters, whereby the inward venom and noisome juice of the flesh may be dried up, and custom of the old man changed, and our hearts (always bringing forth thorns and briars to be burned with fire) from henceforth may bear spiritual fruits in righteousness and holiness unto life everlasting, Amen."

The Burning of JOHN CARDMAKER, and JOHN WARNE, Upholsterer; who suffered both together in Smithfield, anno 1555.

Upon the 30th day of May, suffered together in Smithfield, John Cardmaker, (otherwise called Taylor;) prebendary of the church of Wells; and John Warne, upholsterer, of the parish of St. John's, in Waldbrook. Mr. Cardmaker was at first an observant friar, before the dissolution of the abbey; then after was a married minister, and in king Edward's time appointed to be a reader in Paul's, where the Papists were so much grieved with him for his doctrine's sake, that in his reading they cut and mangled his gown with their knives. This Cardmaker being apprehended in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, with Mr. Barlow bishop of Bath, was brought to London, and laid in prison in the Fleet, king Edward's laws yet being in force. But after the parliament was ended, in which the pope was again admitted as supreme head of the church, and the bishops had also gotten power and authority, ex officio, to exercise their tyranny, these two were brought before Winchester, chancellor; and as unto others before, so now unto them, the chancellor offered the queen's mercy, if they would agree, and be conformable, &c.

To this they both made such an answer, as the chancellor with his fellow commissioners, allowed them for Catholics. Whether they of weakness so answered, or he of subtlety would so understand their answer, that he might have some forged example of a shrinking brother to lay in the dish of the rest which were to be examined, it may easily be perceived by this, that to all them which followed in examination, he objected the example of Barlow and Cardmaker, commending their soberness, discretion, and learning. But whatsoever their answer was, yet notwithstanding Barlow was led again to the Fleet, from whence he afterwards being delivered, did by exile constantly bear witness to the truth of Christ's gospel. Cardmaker was conveyed to the Compter in Bread-street, the bishop of London procuring it to be published, that he should shortly be delivered, after that he had subscribed to transubstantiation and certain other articles. To the same prison where Cardmaker was, Lawrence Saunders was brought, (after the sentence of excommunication and condemnation was pronounced against him,) where these two prisoners had such Christian conference, that whatsoever the breath of the bishop blustered, and the tickle ears of the people too lightly believed, in the end they both shewed themselves constant confessors and worthy martyrs of Christ: as of Lawrence Saunders, it is already written. After whose departure Cardmaker remained there prisoner, to be baited of the Papists, who would needs seem to have a certain hope that Cardmaker was become theirs. Continual and great conference divers of them had with him, with reasonings, persuasions, threatenings, and all to none effect. To the end that their doings might appear, he required them to put their reasons in writing, and promised by writing to answer them.

Dr. Martin, who bare also a part in those pageants, took upon him to be the chief actor by writing, whose long unsavoury letters and simple reasons for transubstantiation, and such Papistical trash, this Cardmaker answered largely, learnedly, and substantially, confuting the same, opening the falsehood of his arguments, and truly delivering the opinions of the fathers, which Martin abused for the maintaining of his purpose.

Articles objected by Bonner against John Taylor alias Cardmaker, with his Answers.

First, I Edmund, bishop of London, object against thee sir John Taylor, alias Cardmaker, that thou wast and art of the city and diocese of London, and so of the jurisdiction of me, Edmund, bishop of London.

Item, That thou in times past didst profess the rule of St. Francis, and didst by vow promise to keep poverty, chastity, and obedience, according to the rule of St. Francis.

Item, That thou in times past didst receive all the orders of the church then used.

Item, That thou after thy said entry into religion and profession and orders aforesaid, didst take to wife a widow; breaking thereby thy vow and order, and also the ordinance of the church.

Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and so dost believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the visible signs there, that is to say, under the forms of bread and wine, there is really and truly the true and very natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Item, That the belief of the Catholic church is, that in having the body and blood of Christ really and truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, is to have (by the omnipotent power of Almighty God) the body and blood of Christ there invisibly and really present under the said sacrament, and not to make thereby a new God, or a new Christ, or a new body of Christ.

Item, That it may stand well together, and so is the faith of the Catholic church, that the body of Christ is visibly and truly ascended into heaven, and there is, in the visible form of his humanity; and yet the same body in substance is invisibly and truly contained in the said sacrament of the altar.

Item, That Christ at his last supper, taking bread into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his apostles, and saying, "Take, eat, this is my body:" did institute a sacrament there, willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof.

Answers of Cardmaker to the Articles aforesaid.

The first article he confesseth to be true in every part.

To the second article he answereth and confesseth, that he, being under age, did profess the said order and religion, and afterwards by the authority of king Henry the VIII. he was dispensed with for the same religion.

The third he confesseth to be true in every part.

To the fourth, he confesseth the first part thereof to be truth; and to the second part he answereth and saith, that in marriage he brake no vow, because he was set at liberty to marry, both by the laws of this realm, and also by the laws and ordinances of the church of the same.

To the fifth he answereth and confesseth, that he hath believed and taught as it is contained in this article, but he doth not now so believe nor teach.

To the sixth he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the seventh he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true in part thereof.

The eighth he doth believe that it is true; that is to say, that Christ taking bread at his last supper into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his disciples, and saying, "Take, eat, this is my body," did institute a sacrament there. And to the other part of this article (willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof,) he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true.

By me, JOHN CARDMAKER.

Mr. Cardmaker calling to mind afterwards the ready evil-lings of the Papists, and thinking himself not to have fully and according to his true meaning answered the latter part of the last eighth article, did the next day after the aforesaid answers exhibit unto the bishop in a schedule this hereafter following:

Where in my answer to your articles I deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament, I mean not his sacramental presence, for that I confess; but my denial is of his carnal presence in the same. But yet further, because this word is oftentimes taken of the holy fathers, not only for bread and wine, but also for the whole administration and receiving of the same, according to Christ's institution; so I say, that Christ is present spiritually too, and in all them which worthily receive the sacrament: so that my denial is still of the real, carnal, and corporal presence, in the sacrament, and not of the sacramental nor spiritual presence.

This have I thought good to add to my former answer, because no man should misunderstand it.

By me, JOHN CARDMAKER.

Next to these articles of Mr. Cardmaker, I thought best to mention the articles and answers likewise of J. Warne, his fellow martyr.

Articles ministered against John Warne, Upholsterer, of the parish of St. John in Walbrook, with his Answers to the same.

First, That, thou, John Warne, being of the age of 29 years, and of the parish of St. John of Walbrook, in London, hast believed, and dost believe firmly and steadfastly, that in the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, there is not the very true and natural body of our Saviour Christ in substance, under the forms of bread and wine.

Item, That thou hast believed, and dost believe, that after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, there is not (as the church of England doth believe and teach) the body of Christ: but that there doth only remain the substance of material bread, as it is before the consecration, or speaking of the words of consecration; and that the said bread is in no wise altered or changed.

Item, That thou hast said, and dost believe, that if the Catholic church do believe and teach, that there is in the mass now used in England, and in other places of Christendom, a sacrifice, wherein there is a sacrament containing the body and blood of Christ really and truly; then that belief and faith of the church is naught, against God's truth and the scripture.

Item, That thou hast said, that where about a twelve-month agoe and more, a great rough water-spaniel of thine was shorn on the head, and had a crown like a priest made in the same, thou didst laugh at it, and like it, though thou didst it not thyself, nor knewest who did it.

Item, That thou neither this Lent last past, nor at any time since the queen's majesty's reign, hast come into the church, or heard mass, or been confessed, or received the sacrament of the altar; and hast said, that thou art not sorry that thou hast so done, but thou art glad, because thou hast not therewith defiled thy conscience, which otherwise thou shouldest have done.

Upon all which articles John Warne being examined by the said Bonner in presence of divers witnesses, the 23d of May, the year 1555, did confess and believe the same, and subscribe hereunto his name with his own hand.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

Also it was objected against the said John Warne, by the bishop aforesaid, as followeth.

Item, That thou John Warne wast in time past here in the city of London, convented in the Guildhall for heresy against the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the laws of this realm of England in the time of king Henry the Eighth, and when alderman Barnes was sheriff, and the Thursday after that Anne Askew was burnt in Smithfield, and thereupon thou wast sent a prisoner to Newgate, to whom Edmund, Bishop of London, did repair with his chaplains, to instruct thee in the true faith of Christ, touching the said sacrament of the altar, and to bring thee from thy error; which was, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the body of Christ, nor any corporal presence of Christ's body and blood, under the forms of bread and wine; but that in the said sacrament there is only material bread and wine, without any substance of Christ's body and blood at all: and because thou wouldest not leave and forsake thy said heresy therein, but persist and abide obstinately and wilfully therein, thou wert according to the said laws condemned to death, and to be burnt; and thereupon labour being made for thee to the king and others in the court, thou hadst a pardon of king Henry the Eighth, and so thereby didst save thy life.

Nevertheless, in thy heart, conscience, and mind, thou didst both then and also afore believe no otherwise than at this present thou dost believe; that is to say, that in the sacrament of the altar there is neither the very true body or blood of Christ, nor no other substance but the substance of material bread and wine, and to receive the said material bread, and to break it, and to distribute it among the people, only is the true receiving of Christ's body, and no otherwise: so that thy faith and belief is, that in the said sacrament there is no substance of Christ's material body and blood; but all the thing that is there, is material bread, and the receiving thereof as afore; and that the substance of the natural and true body of Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, is only in heaven, and not in the sacrament of the altar. In which thine opinion thou hast ever hitherto since continued, and so dost continue at this present, thou confessing all this to be true, and in witness thereof subscribing thy name thereunto as followeth.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

John Warne being examined upon the aforesaid articles by the bishop, before certain witnesses, whose names were John Roswell, John Heywood, Robert Ravens, the 23d of May, did answer to the same, confessing and granting the articles and the contents thereof to be true, according as they were objected in every part, subscribing also the same with his hand. Such strength and fortitude God's holy Spirit wrought in him, to stand stoutly and confidently to the defence of the sincere doctrine of his Son.

Whereupon the bishop exhorting him with many words to leave his heresies, as he called them, and to return to the bosom of his mother the holy church, commanded him to appear again the next day, being the 24th of the same month.

Who so doing, and answering as he did before, was willed to come thither again at afternoon; and so he did: where and at what time he was earnestly exhorted by the said bishop to recant his opinions. To whom he answered, that he would not depart from his received profession, unless he were thereunto thoroughly persuaded by the holy scriptures.

Upon which answer he was willed to come again the next day, being the 25th day of the same month, at one o'clock in the afternoon. At which day and hour the bishop examined him again upon all his former articles before objected: to the which he most constantly did stick, with this further answer thereunto added: I am persuaded, (quoth he,) that I am in the right opinion, and I see no cause to repent; for all filthiness and idolatry is in the church of Rome.

The bishop then seeing that notwithstanding all his fair promises, and terrible threatenings, (whereof he used store,) he could not prevail; finished this examination with the definitive sentence of condemnation pronounced against the said John Warne, and so charged the sheriffs of London with him, under whose custody he remained in the prison of Newgate, until the 30th day of the same month of May.

Upon the which 30th of May, being the day appointed for their execution, John Cardmaker, with the said John Warne, were brought by the sheriffs to the place where they should suffer. Who being come to the stake, first the sheriffs called Cardmaker aside, and talked with him secretly so long, that in the mean time Warne had made his prayers, was chained to the stake, and wood and reeds set about him, so that nothing wanted but the firing; but still abode Cardmaker talking with the sheriffs.

The people, which before had heard that Cardmaker would recant, and beholding this manner of doing, were in a marvellous dump and sadness, thinking indeed that Cardmaker should now recant at the burning of Warne.

At length Cardmaker departed from the sheriffs, and came towards the stake, and, in his garments as he was, kneeled down and made a long prayer in silence to himself: yet the people confirmed themselves in their fancy of recanting, seeing him in his garments, praying secretly, and no semblance of any burning.

His prayers being ended, he rose up, put off his clothes unto his shirt, went with bold courage to the stake, and kissed it sweetly: he took Warne by the hand, and comforted him heartily, and so gave himself to be bound also to the stake most gladly. The people seeing this so suddenly done, contrary to their fearful expectation, as men delivered out of a great doubt, cried out for joy, with so great a shout as hath not been heard a greater, saying, "God be praised! The Lord strengthen thee, Cardmaker, the Lord Jesus receive thy spirit." And thus continued while the executioner put fire to them, and they both passed through the fire to the blessed rest and peace among God's holy saints and martyrs, to enjoy the crown of triumph and victory prepared for the elect soldiers and warriors of Christ Jesus in his blessed kingdom. To whom be glory and majesty for ever. Amen.

The Confession of the Faith of John Warne, Citizen of London, which he wrote the day before he was burned, the 30th day of May, anno 1555. As good a Comment on the Apostle's Creed as is to be found.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, and maker of heaven and earth.

A Father, because he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the everlasting Word, which Word was made flesh, and therein also manifested to be his Son; in whom he hath adopted us to be his children, the inheritors of his kingdom, and therefore he is our Father; and Almighty God, because he hath of nothing created all things visible and invisible, both in heaven and in earth, even all creatures contained therein, and governeth them.

"And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord.

The eternal Word, perfect God with his Father, of equal power in all things, of the same substance, of like glory, by whom all things were made and have life, and without whom nothing liveth: he was made also perfect man, and so being very God and very Man in one Person, is the only Saviour, Redeemer, and Ransomer, of them which were lost in Adam our forefather. He is the only mean of our deliverance, the hope of our health, the surety of our salvation.

"Which was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary.

According to the Father's most merciful promise, this eternal Son of God, forsaking the heavenly glory, humbled himself to take flesh of a Virgin, according to the scriptures, uniting the substance of the Godhead to the substance of the Manhood, which he took of the substance of that blessed Virgin Mary in one Person, to become therein the very Messiah, the anointed King and Priest, for ever appointed to pacify the Father's wrath, which was justly gone out against us all for our sin.

"Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, and descended into hell.

He was arraigned before Pontius Pilate the ruler of Jewry, and so unjustly accused of many crimes, that the ruler judged him innocent, and sought means to deliver him; but, contrary to known justice, he did let go Barabbas, which had deserved death, and delivered Christ to be crucified, who deserved no death: which doth declare unto us manifestly that he suffered for our sins, and was buffeted for our offences, as the prophets do witness; thereby to have it manifested to all men, that he is that Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. Therefore suffering for our sins, he received and did bear our deserved condemnation, the pains of death, the taste of abjection, the very terror of hell, yielding his spirit to his Father, his body to be buried in earth.

"The third day he rose again from death to life."

To make full and perfect the whole work of our redemption and justification, the same crucified body which was laid in the grave, was raised up again the third day from death, by the power of his Father, and the glory of his Godhead: he became the first-fruits of the resurrection, and got the victory of death, that all by him might be raised up from death. Through whom all true penitent sinners may now boldly come unto the Father, and have remission of their sins.

"He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty."

After that in his death and resurrection he had conquered sin, death, and the devil, and had been conversant forty days in the earth, being seen of the apostles, and more than five hundred brethren at once, in the same body in which he wrought the work of our salvation, he ascended into heaven with eternal triumph, for the victory over death, sin, hell leaving the passage open, by which all true believers may and shall enter into his kingdom, where he now sitteth at his Father's right hand, that is to say, in power and glory equal, in majesty co-eternal.

"From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead."

He shall appear again in great glory to receive his followers unto himself, and to put his enemies under his feet, changing all living men in a moment, and raising up all that be dead, that all may be brought to his judgment. In this shall he give each man according to his deeds. They which have followed him in regeneration, which have their sins washed away in his blood, and are clothed with his righteousness, shall receive the everlasting kingdom, and reign with him for ever; and they which, after the race of the corrupt generation of Adam, have followed flesh and blood, shall receive everlasting damnation with the devil and his angels.

"I believe in the Holy Ghost."

I do believe that the Holy Ghost is God, the third person in Trinity, in unity of the Godhead equal with the Father and the Son, given through Christ to inhabit our spirits, by which we are made to feel and understand the great power, virtue, and lovingkindness, of Christ our Lord. For he illuminateth, quickeneth, and certifieth, our spirit, that by him we are sealed up unto the day of redemption, by whom we are regenerate and made new creatures, so that by him and through him we do receive all the abundant goodness promised us in Jesus Christ.

"The Holy Catholic Church."

This is an holy number of Adam's posterity, elected, gathered, washed, and purified, by the blood of the Lamb, from the beginning of the world, and is dispersed through the same by the tyranny of Gog and Magog; that is to say, the Turk and his tyranny, and Antichrist, otherwise named the bishop of Rome, and his angels, as this day also doth teach.

"The communion of saints."

Which most holy congregation (being, as Paul teacheth, builded upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ being the head corner-stone,) though it be by the tyranny of Satan and his ministers persecuted, some by imprisonment, some by death, and some by other afflictions and painful torments; yet doth it remain in one perfect unity, both in faith and fellowship: which unity is knit in an unspeakable knot, as well of them which are departed from this mortal life, as of them which now be living, and hereafter shall be in the same, and so shall continue until they all do meet in the kingdom, where the head, Jesus Christ, with all his holy members, (of which number through Christ I assuredly believe I am one,) shall be fully complete, knit, and united together for evermore.

"The forgiveness of sins."

I do believe that my sins, and all their sins which do rightly believe the holy scripture, are forgiven only through Jesus Christ, of whom only I do profess that I have my whole and full salvation and redemption, which St. Paul saith cometh not through our works and deservings, but freely by grace, lest any should boast himself. Through the blood of the cross all things in heaven and earth are reconciled, and set at peace with the Father; without him no heavenly life given, nor sin forgiven.

"The resurrection of the body."

I do believe that, by the same my Saviour Christ, I and all men shall rise again from death; for he, as St. Paul saith, is risen again from the dead, and is become the first-fruits of them which sleep. For by man came death, and by a Man cometh the resurrection from death. This Man is Christ, through the power of whose resurrection I believe that we all shall rise again in these our bodies: the elect clothed with immortality, to live with Christ for ever; the reprobate also shall rise immortal, to live with the devil and his angels in death everlasting.

"And the life everlasting."

Through the same Jesus, and by none other, I am sure to have life everlasting. He only is the way and entrance into the kingdom of heaven. "For so God loved the world, that he did give his only Son Jesus Christ, to the end that so many as do believe in him might have everlasting life. The which I am sure to possess so soon as I am dissolved, and departed out of this tabernacle, and in the last day shall both body and soul possess the same for ever; to the which God grant all men to come."

I believe that the sacraments, that is to say, of baptism and of the Lord's supper, are seals of God's most merciful promise towards mankind. In baptism, as by the outward creature of water I am washed from the filthiness which hangeth on my flesh; so do I assuredly believe, that I am by Christ's blood washed clean from my sins, through which I have sure confidence of my certain salvation. In the partaking of the Lord's supper, as I receive the substance of bread and wine, the nature of which is to strengthen the body; so do I, by faith, receive the redemption wrought in Christ's body broken on the cross, life by his death, resurrection by his resurrection, and, in sum, all that ever Christ in his body suffered for my salvation, to the strengthening of my faith in the same. And I believe, that God hath appointed the eating and drinking of the creatures of bread and wine in his holy supper, according to his word, to move and stir up my mind to believe these articles above written.

This is my faith; this do I believe: and I am content by God's grace to confirm and seal the truth of the same with my blood.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

A Letter of John Cardmaker to a certain friend of his.

"The peace of God be with you. You shall right well perceive that I am not gone back, as some men do report me, but as ready to give my life as any of my brethren that are gone before me, although by a policy I have a little prolonged it, and that for the best, as already it appeareth unto me, and shall shortly appear unto all. That day that I recant any point of doctrine, I shall suffer twenty kinds of death, the Lord being mine assistance, as I doubt not but he will. Commend me to my friend, and tell him no less. This the Lord strengthen you, me, and all his elect. My riches and poverty is as it was wont to be, and I have learned to rejoice in poverty as well as riches; for that I account now to be, be very riches. Thus fare ye well in Christ. Salute all my brethren in my name. I have conferred with some of my adversaries, learned men, and I find that they be but sophists and shadows."

A Note concerning Mr. Cardmaker.

Mr. Cardmaker being condemned, and in Newgate, one Beard, a promoter, came to him two or three days before he was burned, and said unto him, Sir, I am sent unto you by the council, to know whether ye will recant, or no?

Car. From which council are you come? I think ye are not come, nor yet sent, from the queen's council, but rather from the commissioners, unto whom as I suppose ye belong. And whereas ye would know whether I will recant or no: Thus I pray you report of me to those who ye said sent you: I know you are a tailor by your occupation, and have endeavoured yourself to be a cunning workman, and thereby to get your living: so I have been a preacher these twenty years, and ever since that God by his great mercy hath opened mine eyes to see his eternal truth, I have by his grace endeavoured myself to call upon him, to give me the true understanding of his holy word, and I thank him for his great mercy; I hope I have discharged my conscience in the setting forth of the same, to that little talent that I have received.

Beard. Yea, sir; but what say you to the blessed sacrament of the altar?

Car. I say, and mark it well, that Christ the night before his bitter passion ordained the holy and blessed communion, and hath given commandment, that his death should be preached before the receiving thereof, in remembrance of his body broken, and his precious blood shed for the forgiveness of our sins, to as many as faithfully believe and trust in him.

And furthermore, to conclude the matter briefly with him, he asked of him, Whether the sacrament he spoke of had a beginning or no? Whereunto when he had granted and affirmed the same to be, then Mr. Cardmaker again thus inferred thereupon: If the sacrament, as you confess, have a beginning and an ending, then it cannot be God; for God had no beginning nor ending. And so willing him well to note the same, he departed from him.

The fifth day, Mr. Secretary Bourne, the master of the rolls, sir Francis Englefield, sir Richard Read, and Dr. Hughes, authorizing them, or two or three of them at the least, to proceed to further examination of Benger, Cary, D. and Field, upon such points as they shall gather out of their former confessions, touching their lewd and vain practices of calculating or conjuring, presently sent unto them with the said letters.

The seventh day there was another letter to sir John Tregonwell, willing him to join in commission with the said lord North, and others above-named, about the examination of the said parties and others, for conjuring and witchcraft.

And the 29th of August, Cary and D. were set at liberty upon bonds for their good appearing until Christmas after.

The twelfth day a letter was sent to the lord treasurer, to cause writs to be made to the sheriff of Sussex, for the burning and executing of Dirike, a brewer, at Lewes, and other two, the one at Stainings, the other at Chichester.

The 23d of June a letter was sent to Bonner to examine a report given to the council, of four parishes within the shire of Essex, that would still use the English service, and to punish the offenders, if any such be.

The Story of JOHN ARDELEY and JOHN SIMPSON, of the Parish of Wigborough the Great, in Essex.

With Mr. Cardmaker and John Warne, upon the same day, and in the same company, and for the same cause, was also condemned John Ardeley and John Simpson, the 25th day of May. But before we may come to the story of them, first here is to be noted the copy of the king and queen's letter, directed from the court the same day, and sent by a post early in the morning to the bishop, in tenor and form as followeth:

"To the Right Reverend Father in God, our right trusty and well-beloved, the Bishop of London.

"Right reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And where of late we addressed our letters to the justices of peace within every of the counties of this our realm, whereby amongst other instructions given them for the good order and quiet government of the country round about them, they are willed to have a special regard unto such disordered persons as, forgetting their duties towards God and us, do lean to any erroneous and heretical opinions, refusing to shew themselves conformable to the Catholic religion of Christ's church; wherein if they cannot by good admonitions and fair reasons reform them, they are willed to deliver them to the ordinary, to be by him charitably travelled withal, and removed (if it may be) from their naughty opinions; or else, if they continue obstinate, to be ordered according to the laws provided in that behalf: understanding now, to our no little marvel, that divers of the said disordered persons, being by the justices of peace, for their contempt and obstinacy, brought to the ordinaries to be used as aforesaid, are either refused to be received at their hands, or if they be received, are neither so travelled with, as Christian charity requireth, nor yet proceeded withal according to the order of justice, but are suffered to continue in their errors, to the dishonour of Almighty God, and dangerous example of others; like as we find this matter very strange, so we have thought convenient both to signify our knowledge, and therewith also to admonish you to have in this behalf such regard henceforth to the office of a good pastor and bishop, as when any such offenders shall be by the said officers or justices of peace brought unto you, to use your good wisdom and discretion in procuring to remove them from their errors, if it may be, or else in proceeding against them (if they shall continue obstinate) according to the order of the laws; so as through your good furtherance, both God's glory may be better advanced, and the commonwealth more quietly governed.—Given under our signet, at our honour of Hampton Court, the 24th of May, the first and second years of our reigns."

This letter thus coming from the court to the bishop, made him the more earnest and hasty to the condemnation, as well of others, as of these men, (of whom we have now presently to treat,) John Simpson, I mean, and John Ardeley. Which being both of one county, and of one town together, and of one trade, that is, being both husbandmen in the town of Wigborough, in Essex, and also almost of one age, save that Simpson was of the age of 34, the other of 30, were brought up both together by the under sheriff of Essex, to Bonner, bishop of London, upon the accusation (as in that time it was called) of heresy.

As touching the order and manner of their examinations before the bishop: as the articles ministered against them were much alike, so their answers again unto the same were not much different in manner and form as those before.

Thus these articles being to them objected, and their answers made unto the same, the bishop, according to the old trade of his consistory court, respited them to the afternoon, bidding them to make their appearance the said day and place between the hours of two and three. At which time the said bishop repeating again the said articles unto them, and beginning with John Ardeley, did urge and solicit him, according to his manner of words, to recant.

To whom John Ardeley again, constantly standing to his professed religion, gave answer in words as followeth: My lord, (quoth he,) neither you, nor any other of your religion, is of the Catholic church; for you be of a false faith, and I doubt not but you shall be deceived at length, bear as good a face as ye can; ye will shed the innocent blood, and you have killed many, and yet go about to kill more, &c.

And added further, saying, If every hair of my head were a man, I would suffer death in the opinion and faith that I am now in.

These, with many other words, he spake. Then the bishop yet demanded, if he would relinquish his erroneous opinions, as he called them, and be reduced again to the unity of the church? He answered as followeth: No, God foreshield that I should so do, for then I should lose my soul.

After this, the said bishop asking John Ardeley, after his formal manner, if he knew any cause why he should not have sentence condemnatory against him? so read the condemnation: as he also did against John Simpson, standing likewise in the same cause and constancy with John Ardeley; which was done the 25th day of May. And so were they both committed to the secular power, that is, to the hands of the sheriffs, to be conveyed to the place where they should be executed. But before I come to their execution, here is not to be passed a thing not unworthy the looking upon, which happened in the closing up the examination of these two innocent martyrs of God, which is this:

At the time of the examination of this Simpson and John Ardeley aforesaid, there was assembled such a great multitude of people, that because the consistory was not able to hold them, they were fain to stand in the church, near about the said consistory, waiting to see the prisoners when they should depart. It happened, in the mean time, that the bishop being set in a heat with the stout and bold answers of the said two prisoners, especially of John Simpson, burst out in his loud and angry voice, and said, Have him away, have him away.

Now the people in the church hearing these words, and thinking (because the day was far spent) that the prisoners had their judgment, they being desirous to see the prisoners had to Newgate, severed themselves, one running one way, another another way, which caused such a noise in the church, that they in the consistory were all amazed, and marvelled what it should mean: wherefore the bishop also being somewhat afraid of this sudden stir, asked what there was to do? The standers by answering, said, that there were like to be some tumult; for they were together by the ears.

When the bishop heard this, by and by his heart was in his heels, and, leaving his seat, he with the rest of the court betook them to their legs, hastening with all speed possible to recover the door that went into the bishop's house: but the rest, being somewhat lighter of foot than my lord, did sooner recover the door, and thronging hastily to get in, kept the bishop still out, and cried, Save my lord, save my lord! but meaning yet first to save themselves if any danger should come, whereby they gave the standers by good matter to laugh at; resembling in some part a spectacle not much unlike to the old stagers at Oxford, worse feared than hurt, when the church there was noised to be set on fire, whereof you may read before.—See page 305.

Now John Simpson and John Ardeley being delivered (as is aforesaid) to the sheriffs, were shortly after sent down from London to Essex, where both they in one day, which was about the 10th of June, were put to death, albeit in several places; for John Simpson suffered at Rochford, and John Ardeley the same day was had to Railey, where he finished his martyrdom most quietly in the quarrel of Christ's gospel.

A Note of John Ardeley.

For the better consideration of the rigorous cruelty of these Catholic days, this is worthy to be noted and known to all posterity, concerning the examinations of this Ardeley and his company, how that they being brought before the commissioners, were by them greatly charged of stubbornness and vain-glory. Unto whom they answered in defence of their own simplicity, that they were content willingly to yield to the queen all their goods and lands, so that they might be suffered to live under her, in keeping their consciences free from all idolatry and papistical religion. Yet this would not be granted, although they had offered all to their heart's blood; so greedy and so thirsty were these persecutors of Christian blood.

The ridiculous handling and proceeding of Bishop Bonner, and his mates, against JOHN TOOLY, first suspected and condemned after his death, and then digged out of his grave, and given to the secular power, and so burned for an heretic.

About the same time of the burning of these two aforesaid, in the beginning of the said month of June, fell out a solemn process, and much ado was made about the pope's spirituality, against John Tooly in a case of heresy.—The story is this: There was, about the time that the Spaniards began first to keep a stir in England, one John Tooly, a citizen and poulterer in London, who conspired with certain others of his society to rob a Spaniard at St. James's; and although the deed was heinous and wicked of itself, yet was it aggravated and made greater than it was by others, being committed against such a person and against such a country, which both the queen and her whole court did highly favour. The robbers being known, and brought into judgment, this Tooly was found guilty, and judged to be hanged; whereas notwithstanding in this realm there are many more thefts committed than thieves executed.

The aforesaid Tooly being led to the gallows, which stood fast by Charing Cross, a little before he died, standing upon the cart, read a certain prayer in a printed book, and two other prayers written in two several papers: who then having the halter about his neck, desired the people there present to pray for him, and to bear him witness that he died a true Christian man, and that he trusted to be saved only by the merits of Christ's passion and shedding of his precious blood, and not by any masses or trentals, images or saints, which were (as he said) mere idolatry and superstition, and devised by the bishop of Rome: and as the same Tooley, and two others his fellows which were there hanged with him, did steal and rob for covetousness, so the bishop of Rome did sell his masses and trentals, with such other paltry, for covetousness; and there being in a great anger, as appeared, against the bishop of Rome, spake with a loud voice these words following, From the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities; from false doctrine and heresy, and from the contempt of thy word and commandment; good Lord deliver us!

And then adding further to the same, he spake unto the people: All you that be true Christian men, say with me, Amen. And immediately thereupon 300 persons and more, to the judgment and estimation of those that were there present, answered and said, Amen, three times together at the least.

After this it happened, that when Tooley had read the bill the first time, it fell from him, and a certain young man, who was thought to be an apprentice, stooped down and took up the bill, and climbed up the cart, and delivered it unto Tooley again, which he again did read to the people. That done, he delivered unto one of the marshal's officers the book aforesaid, and willed him to deliver it unto one Haukes, saying, that it was his book. Furthermore, he delivered one of the prayers, written in a paper, to one Robert Bromeley, sergeant, who desired it of him. Upon the top of which bill was written a line containing these words, Beware of Antichrist; and subscribed underneath, "Per me, Thomas Harold, prisoner in the Marshalsea, an Enemy to Antichrist." For the bill aforesaid, Robert Bromeley was brought afterwards coram nobis, and was fain to ask pardon of the bishop, and to detest all the words of Tooley, and glad so to escape.

Thus while Tooley had made his prayers (as is above said) to be delivered from the pope's tyranny, by the same prayer he fell into great tyranny: for so soon as the noise of this fact came unto the ears of the priests and mitred prelates, they were not a little mad, thinking it not tolerable that so great a reproach should be done against the holy father. Calling therefore for a council together, as though it had been a matter of great importance, Tooley's talk at his death was debated among themselves.

At last, after much pro and contra, they all consented to those men's judgment, which thought it meet that the violating of the pope's holiness should be revenged with fire and faggot. Cardinal Pole was no small actor in this sentence: for as Winchester and Bonner did always thirst after the blood of the living, so Pole's lightning was for the most part kindled against the dead; and he reserved this charge only to himself, I know not for what purpose, except, peradventure being loath to be so cruel as the other, he thought nevertheless by this means to discharge his duty towards the pope. By the same cardinal's like lightning and fiery fist the bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, which had lien almost two years in their graves, were taken up and burned at Cambridge, as Tooley's carcase was here at London. And besides this, because he would shew some token of his diligence in both universities, he caused Peter Martyr's wife (a woman of worthy memory) to be digged out of the churchyard, and to be buried on the dunghill.

But now to our purpose of Tooley: who having ended his prayer, was hanged and put into his grave, out of which he was digged again, by the commandment of the bishops; and because he was so bold to derogate the authority of the bishop of Rome, at the time of his death, it pleased them to judge and condemn him as an heretic, upon the commandment of the council's letter, as here appeareth.

A Letter sent unto Bonner, Bishop of London, from the Council.

"After our very hearty commendations to your lordship: Understanding that of late, amongst others that have suffered about London for their offences, one lewd person, that was condemned for felony, died very obstinately, professing at the time of his death sundry heretical and erroneous opinions; like as we think it not convenient that such a matter should be overpassed without some example to the world, so we thought good to pray your lordship to cause further inquiry to be made thereof, and thereupon to proceed to the making out of such process as by the ecclesiastical laws is provided in that behalf. And so we bid your lordship heartily well to fare. From Hampton Court, the 28th of April, 1555.

"Your lordship's loving friends,

"Ste. Winton, Cha.
F. Shrewsbury,
John Gage,

Thomas Cheney,
R. Rochester,
William Peter,

Richard Southwell."

Anon after a citation was set up upon Paul's church door, under the bishop of London's great seal; the tenor whereof here ensueth:

The Writ or Mandate of Bonner, Bishop of London, set up at Charing Cross, on St. Paul's church door, and at St. Martin's-in-the-Field, for the citing and further inquiring out of the case of John Tooley.

"Edmund, by the sufferance of God, bishop of London, to all and singular persons, vicars, curates, and others, clerks, and learned men, being within our diocese of London, and especially unto Richard Clonic, our sworn sumner, greiving, salutation, and benediction. Forsomuch as it is come to our hearing by common fame and the declaration of sundry credible persons, that one John Tooley, late citizen and poulterer of London, the son of perdition and iniquity, coming to the profundity of malice in the self-same time in the which he should go to hanging, according to the laws of the realm, for the great theft lately by him committed, at which time chiefly he should have cared for the wealth of his soul, and to have died in the unity of the Catholic church, did utter divers and sundry damnable, blasphemous, and heretical opinions and errors, utterly contrary and repugnant to the verity of the Catholic faith and unity of the same, and did exhort, stir up, and encourage the people, there standing in great multitude, to hold and defend the same errors and opinions. And, moreover, certain of the people there standing, as it did appear, affected with errors and heresies, as fantors and defenders of the said John, did conform and give express consent to the aforesaid words, propositions, and affirmations; which thing we do utter with sorrow and bitterness of heart.

"We therefore, the aforesaid Edmund, and bishop above-said, not being able nor daring to pass over in silence, nor wink at the aforesaid heinous act, lest by our negligence and slackness the blood of them might be required at our hands at the most terrible day of judgment, desiring to be certified whether the premises declared unto us be of the truth, and lest that any scabbed sheep, lurking among the simple flock of our Lord, do infect them with pestiferous heresy: to you, therefore, we straitly charge and command that you cite, or cause to be cited, all and singular having and knowing the truth of the premises, by setting up this citation upon the church door of St. Martin's in the Fields, being within our diocese of London, and also upon the cathedral church door of St. Paul's in London, leaving there the copy thereof, or by other means or ways, the best you can, that this citation and monition may come to their knowledge.

"All which and singular by the tenor of these presents we cite and admonish that they appear, and every one of them do appear before us, our vicar-general, or commissary, whatsoever he be in that behalf, in our cathedral church of St. Paul in London, in the consistory place, upon Thursday the 2d day of May now next ensuing, betwixt the hours of nine and ten of the clock in the forenoon the same day, to bear witness of the truth in this behalf, and to depose and declare faithfully the truth that they know or have heard of the premises, and moreover to do and receive what law and reason doth receive.

"Further, we commit unto you as before, and straitly enjoining you, do command, that ye will generally cite the wife of the said Tooly that is dead, and his children, and his kindred by father and mother, his friends and his familiars in especial, and all other and every of them, if there be any perhaps that desire to defend and purge the remembrance of the person in the premises, that ye admonish them after the manner and form aforesaid, whom we likewise by the tenor of these presents do in such sort cite and monish that they appear all, and that every one of them do appear (under pain to be compelled to keep silence for ever hereafter in this behalf) before us, or our vicar-general in spiritual matters, or such our commissary, at the day, hour, and place aforesaid, to defend the good name and remembrance of him that is dead, and to say, allege, and propose, in due form of law, a cause reasonable, if they have or can tell of any, why the said John Tooly, that is dead, ought not to be determined and declared for such an heretic and excommunicate person, and his remembrance condemned in the detesting and condemning of so heinous a deed and crime, and his body or carcase to lack church-burial, as a rotten member cut off from the church, and the same to be committed to the arm and power secular, and they compelled hereafter for ever to hold their place.

"And furthermore, to do, receive, and to suffer as law and reason will, and as the quality of such matter, and the nature of themselves, do constrain and require; and, moreover, that you cite and monish, after the manner aforesaid, all and every of the receivers, factors, and creditors, of the said John Tooly that is dead, especially if any of them do incline and give consent to those wicked and detestable affirmations, propositions, and rehearsals aforesaid, that on this side the said Thursday they return and submit themselves unto us, and to the lap of the holy mother church: which thing if they do, we trusting upon the mercy of Almighty God, do promise that we will receive them, being penitent for such of their errors and faults, with thanks, benignity, mercy, and favour, to the comfort and health of their own souls, and in that behalf save their honesties to the uttermost of our power: otherwise, if they will not provide thus to come of their own accord, but to abide the ordinary process of the law, let those men know that we will punish more severely this offence, according to the uttermost of the law, and as far as the law will bear it; and what ye shall do in the premises, let him among you, which shall execute this our present mandate, certify us, or our vicar-general in spiritual matters, either by his own person, or by his letters patent, together with these authentically sealed.

"Dated at London, under our seal, the last day of April, 1555, and of our translation the eleventh."

When the time of this citation was expired, and this Tooly, being cited, did not appear; next in order of law came the suspension, (whereas one suspension had been enough for him) and after that cometh the excommunication, that is, that no man should eat and drink with him; or if any met him by the way, he should not bid him good morrow; and besides that, he should be excluded from the communion of the church! (Though the man were long ere this dead and buried.) These things being prepared in such manner, as in such cases full wisely they used to do, at length one stood out for the nonce, that made answer to certain articles rehearsed in judgment openly, and then in behalf of the dead man. But when the poor dead man could neither speak for himself, nor did (as they said) sufficiently answer them by the other, to avoid the name of an heretic; first, witnesses were provided against him, whose names were Henry Clark, esq. Thomas Way, keeper of the Marshalsea, Philip Andrew, under marshal, William Holingworth, fishmonger, William Gellard, William Walton, chandler, Richard Longman, merchant-tailor, Philip Britten, John Burton, brewer, Thomas Smith, sergeant. Then he was for an heretic condemned, and so committed to the secular power, namely, to the sheriffs of London, which with the like diligence went about to execute their charge. Therefore receiving the man, being suspended, excommunicated, condemned as an heretic, and, besides that, dead, they laid him on the fire to be burned, namely, ad perpetuam rei memoriam, for a continual remembrance thereof. This was done the 4th day of June.

Here followeth the History and Martyrdom of the worthy Servant of Christ, THOMAS HAUKEs, Gentleman, with his Examination and Answers had with Bishop Bonner, recorded and penned with his own hand.

Immediately after the story of Dr. Taylor, mention before was made of six men brought before bishop Bonner upon the 8th day of February. The names of which martyrs were Stephen Knight, W. Pigot, Thos. Tomkins, J. Lawrence, and W. Hunter. In which number was also Thomas Haukes, and condemned likewise with them the 9th day of the aforesaid month of February. But because his execution did not so shortly follow with theirs, but was prolonged to this present 10th day of the month of June, wherewith we are now in hand; first we will begin briefly with his godly conversation, then shew his troubles, also his examinations and conflicts with the bishop and other adversaries.

He was of the county of Essex, born of an honest stock, by profession a courtier, brought up daintily from his childhood like a gentleman. Besides that, he was of such comeliness and stature, so well endued with excellent qualities, that he might seem on every side a man, as it were, made for the purpose. But his gentle behaviour towards others, and especially his fervent study and singular love unto true religion and godliness, did surmount all the rest. Wherein as God did singularly adorn him, even so he, being such a valiant martyr of God, may seem to nobilitate the whole company of other holy martyrs, and as a bright star to make the church of God and his truth (of themselves bright and clear) more gloriously to shine by his example.

For if the conquests of martyrs are the triumphs of Christ, as St. Ambrose writes, undoubtedly Christ in few men hath either conquered more notably, or triumphed more gloriously, than in this young man: he stood so wisely in his cause, so godly in his life, and so firm in his death.

As he grew in years, he entered into the service of the lord of Oxford, where he remained a good space, being right well esteemed and loved of all the household, so long as Edward VI. lived. But he dying, all things began to go backward, religion to decay, godliness not only to wax cold, but to be in danger every where, and chiefly in the houses of good men. Haukes misliking the state of things, and especially in such men's houses, rather than he would change the profession of true godliness which he had tasted, thought to change the place; and so forsaking the nobleman's house, departed thence to his own home, where more freely he might give himself to God, and use his own conscience.

But what place in this world shall a man find so secret for himself, whither the old serpent cannot creep, whereby he may have some matter to overthrow the quietness of the godly? Now in the mean season Haukes keeping his house at home, had born unto him a young son, whose baptism was deferred to the third week, for that he would not suffer him to be baptized after the papistical manner: which thing the adversaries, not able to suffer, laying hands upon him, did bring him to the earl of Oxford, there to be reasoned with, as not sound in religion, in that he seemed to contemn the sacraments of the church.

The earl, either intending not to trouble himself in such matters, or else seeing himself not able to weigh with him in such cases of religion, sent him up to London with a messenger and letters, and so, willing to clear his own hands, put him in the hands of Bonner, bishop of London; the contents of which letter sent to Bonner, are these:

A Letter of the Earl of Oxford to Bonner.

"Most reverend father in God, be it known unto you, that I have sent you one Thomas Haukes, dwelling in the county of Essex, who hath a child that hath remained unchristened more than three weeks; who, being upon the same examined, hath denied to have it baptized, as it is now used in the church; whereupon I have sent him to your good lordship, to use as ye think best, by your good discretion."

When the bishop had perused this letter, and afterwards read it to Mr. Haukes, he hearing the same, thought with himself that he should not be very well used, seeing he was put to his discretion. Then wrote the bishop a letter again to him that sent the prisoner, with many great thanks for his diligence in setting forth the queen's proceedings.

Then began the bishop to enter communication with Mr. Haukes, first asking, what should move him to leave his child unchristened so long? To whom Mr. Haukes answered thus again as followeth:

Haukes. Because we be bound to do nothing contrary to the word of God.

Bonner. Why, baptism is commanded by the word of God.

Haukes. His institution therein I do not deny.

Bonner. What deny ye then?

Haukes. I deny all things invented and devised by man.

Bonner. What things be those that be devised by man, that ye be so offended withal?

Haukes. Your oil, cream, salt, spittle, candle, and conjuring of water, &c.

Bonner. Will you deny that which all the whole world, and your father, hath been contented withal?

Haukes. What my father and all the whole world hath done, I have nothing to do withal; but what God hath commanded me to do, to that stand I.

Bonner. The Catholic church hath taught it.

Haukes. What is the Catholic church?

Bonner. It is the faithful congregation, wheresoever it be dispersed throughout the whole world.

Haukes. Who is the head thereof?

Bonner. Christ is the head thereof.

Haukes. Are we taught in Christ, or in the Church, now?

Bonner. Have ye not read in the eighth of John, where he saith he would send his Comforter, which should teach you all things?

Haukes. I grant you it is so, that he would send his Comforter: but to what end? Forsooth to this end, that he should lead you into all truth; and that is not to teach a new doctrine.

Bonner. Ah, sir, ye are a right scripture man. For ye will have nothing but the scripture. There is a great number of your countrymen of your opinion. Do you know one Knight and Pygot?

Haukes. Knight I know, but Pygot I do not know.

Bonner. I thought ye were acquainted with him: it seemeth so by your judgment. What preachers do ye know in Essex?

Haukes. I know none.

Bonner. Do ye not know one Baget there?

Haukes. Yes, forsooth, I know him.

Bonner. What manner of man is he?

Haukes. An honest man, so far as I know.

Bonner. Do you know him if you see him?

Haukes. Yea, that I do.

(Then said he to one of his servants, Go call me Baget hither.)

Bonner. Ye seem to be a very proud man, and stubborn. (He that brought me up stood all this while by.)

Haukes. What should move you lordship so to say?

Bonner. Because I see in a man that came with you much humility and lowliness.

Haukes. It seemeth your lordship speaketh that to me, because I made no courtesy to you.

And with that came Baget. Then the bishop said to Baget, How say ye, sir, know ye this man?

Baget. Yea, forsooth my lord; (with that Baget and I shook hands.)

Then said the bishop to Baget, Sir, this man hath a child which hath lien three weeks unchristened, as I have letters to shew, who refuseth to have it baptized as it is now used in the church: how say you thereto?

Baget. Forsooth, my lord, I say nothing thereto (with low courtesy to the hard ground.)

Bonner. Say you nothing thereto! I will make you tell me whether it be laudable, and to be frequented and used in the church, or not.

Baget. I beseech your lordship to pardon me: he is old enough, let him answer for himself.

Bonner. Ah, sir knave, are ye at that point with me? Go call me the Porter, (said he to one of his men.) Thou shalt sit in the stocks, and have nothing but bread and water. I perceive I have kept you too well. Have I made thus much of you, and have I you at this point!

Then came the bishop's man, and said, The porter is gone to Loudon. Then said the bishop to Baget, Come with me. And he went away with him, and commanded me away, and bade one of his gentlemen to talk with me, who was one of his own teaching: who desired, amongst other things, to know of me with whom I was acquainted in Essex, and what men they were that were my teachers?

Haukes. When I see your commission, I will make you answer. And then immediately came the bishop again: but ere he came, his man and I had much talk. Then the bishop sat down under a vine in his orchard, and called Baget to him, (whom he carried away, and brought again,) and called me also, and said to Baget, How say you now, sir, unto baptism? Say whether it be to be frequented and used in the church, as it is now, or no?

Baget. Forsooth, my lord, I say it is good.

Bonner. I befool your heart; could ye not have said so before? Ye have wounded this man's conscience. Then the bishop turned to me, and said, How say ye now, sir, this man is turned and converted.

Haukes. I build my faith neither upon this man, neither upon you, but only upon Christ Jesus, who (as St. Paul saith) is the founder and author of all men's faith.

Bonner. I perceive ye are a stubborn fellow. I must be glad to work another way with you, to win ye.

Haukes. Whatsoever ye do, I am ready to suffer it: for I am in your hands to abide it.

Bonner. Well, ye are so, come on your ways, ye shall go in, and I will use you christian-like: you shall have meat and drink, such as I have in my house: but in any wise talk not.

Haukes. I propose to talk nothing but the word of God and truth.

Bonner. I will have no heresy talked on in my house.

Haukes. Why, is the truth become heresy! God hath commanded that we should have none other talk in our houses, in our beds, at our meat, and by the way, but all truth.

Bonner. If ye will have my favour, be ruled by my counsel.

Haukes. Then I trust you will grant me my request.—

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes. That your doctors and servants give me none occasion: for if they do, I will surely utter my conscience. Then commanded he his men to take in Baget, and let not Haukes and him talk together. And so thus we departed, and went to dinner, and I dined at the steward's table.

After dinner, his chaplains and his men began to talk with me. But amongst all other, there was one Darbishire, principal of Broadgates in Oxford, and the bishop's kinsman, who said to me, That I was too curious: for ye will have, said he, nothing but your little pretty God's books. And is it not sufficient for my salvation? said I.—Yea, said he, it is sufficient for our salvation, but not for our instruction.—God send me the salvation, and you the instruction, returned I.

And as we thus reasoned, came the bishop, who said unto me, I gave you a commandment that you should not talk.

Haukes. And I desired you that your doctors and servants should give me none occasion. Then went we into his orchard again, he and his doctors and I.

Bonner. Would not ye be contented to have that your child should be christened after the book that was set out by king Edward?

Haukes. Yes, with a good will: it is a thing that I desire.

Bonner. I thought so; ye would have the same thing. The principal is in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost? and in the necessity it may serve.

Haukes. Christ did use it without any such necessity: and yet we lack the chiefest point.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes. Go teach all nations, baptizing them, &c.

Bonner. Thou speakest that because I am no preacher.

Haukes. I speak the text; I do not mean you. Thou spake all the doctors, and his men that were with him, He spake it of you, my lord: with a great noise that they made.

Bonner. Will ye be content to tarry here, and your child shall be baptized, and you shall not know of it, so that you will agree to it!

Haukes. If I would so have done, I needed not to have come to you: for I had the same counsel given before.

Bonner. You seem to be a lusty young man; you will not give your head for the washing; you will not stand in the defence of it for the honour of your country. Do ye think that the queen and I cannot command it to be done in spite of your teeth?

Haukes. What the queen and you can do, I will not stand in it: but ye get my consent never the sooner.

Bonner. Well, you are a stubborn young man: I perceive I must work another way with you.

Haukes. Ye are in the hands of God, and so am I.

Bonner. Whatsoever you think, I will not have you speak such words unto me.

And so he departed until even-song time: and ere even-song was begun, my lord called for me to come to him into the chapel, and said, Haukes, thou art a proper young man, and God hath done his part unto thee: I would be glad to do thee good. Thou knowest that I am thy pastor, and one that should answer for thee. If I would not teach thee well, I should answer for thy soul.

Haukes. That I have said, I will stand to it, God willing; there is no way to remove it.

Bonner. Nay, nay, Haukes, thou shalt not be so wilful. Remember, Christ bade two go into his vineyard: the one said he would, and went not; the other said he would not, and went.

Haukes. The last went.

Bonner. Do thou likewise, and I will talk friendly with thee. How sayest thou? It is in the 6th of St. John, "I am the bread of life, and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. And whosoever eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath everlasting life. My flesh is very meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. And he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Do ye believe this?

Haukes. Yea, I must needs believe the scriptures.

Bonner. Why then, I trust that you be sound in the blessed sacrament.

Haukes. I beseech your lordship to feel my conscience no farther than in that that I was accused in unto you.

Bonner. Well, well, let us go unto even-song.—(With that I turned my back to go out of the chapel.)

Bonner. Why, will you not tarry even-song?

Haukes. No, forsooth.

Bonner. And why?—Haukes. For I will not.

Bonner. And why will ye not?

Haukes. Because I have no edifying thereby, for I understand no Latin.

Bonner. Why, you may pray by yourself. What books have ye?

Haukes. I have the New Testament, the books of Solomon, and the Psalter.

Bonner. Why, I pray you tarry here, and pray you on your Psalter.

Haukes. I will not pray in this place, nor in any such.—Then said one of his chaplains, Let him go, my lord, and he shall be no partaker with us in our prayers.

Haukes. I think myself best at ease when I am farthest from you.—And so the bishop went to even-song, and I came down and walked between the hall and the chapel in the court, and tarried there till even-song was done; and within an hour after that even-song was done, the bishop sent for me into his chamber where he lay himself; and when I came, there was he and three of his chaplains.

Bonner. You know of the talk that was between you and me, as concerning the sacrament. You would not have your conscience sought any farther than in that ye were accused of.

Haukes. I thought you would not be both mine accuser and judge.

Bonner. Well, ye shall answer me to the sacrament of the altar, the sacrament of baptism, the sacrament of penance, and the sacrament of matrimony.

Haukes. There is none of these but I dare speak my conscience in them.

Bonner. The sacrament of the altar ye seem to be sound in.

Haukes. In the sacrament of the altar? why, sir, I do not know it.

Bonner. Well, we will make you know it, and believe in it too, ere we have done with you.

Haukes. No, that shall ye never do.

Bonner. Yes, a faggot will make you do it.

Haukes. No, no, a point for your faggot! What God thinketh meet to be done, that shall ye do, and more ye shall not do.

Bonner. Do ye not believe that there remaineth in the blessed sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration be spoken, no more bread, but the very body and blood of Christ? (and at that word he put off his cap.)

Haukes. I do believe as Christ hath taught me.

Bonner. Why, did not Christ say, "Take, eat, this is my body?"

Haukes. Christ said so; but therefore it followeth not that the sacrament of the altar is so as you teach, neither did Christ ever teach it so to be.

Bonner. Why, the Catholic church taught it so, and they were of Christ's church.

Haukes. How prove you it? the apostles never taught it so. Read Acts the 2d and the 20th. Neither Peter nor Paul ever taught it, neither instituted it so.

Bonner. Ah, sir, you will have no more than the scripture teacheth, but even as Christ hath left it bare.

Haukes. He that teacheth me any otherwise, I will not believe him.

Bonner. Why? then ye must eat a lamb, if ye will have but Christ's institution only.

Haukes. Nay, that is not so; before that Christ did institute the sacrament, that ceremony ceased, and then began the sacrament.

Bonner. Alas, you know not how it began, neither of the institution thereof.

Haukes. Then I would be glad to learn.

Bonner. Marry! we will teach you: but you are so stubborn that you will not learn.

Haukes. Except ye learn me by the word of God, I will never credit you, nor believe you.

And thus we concluded. Then the bishop and his chaplains laughed, and said, Jesu, Jesu, what a stubbornness and arrogance is this! and this was in his chamber where he lay.—Then said the bishop to me, Go ye down and drink, for it is fasting day; it is Midsummer even: but I think ye love neither fasting nor praying.

Haukes. I will never deny fasting, neither praying, so that it be done as it ought to be done, and without hypocrisy or vain glory.

Bonner. I like you the better for that: and so we left for that night.

The next day the bishop went to London: for Fecknam was made dean that day, and I tarried still at Fulham. Then did the bishop's men desire me to come to mass; but I did utterly refuse it, answering them as I did their master. That night the bishop came home to Fulham again.

Talk between Harpsfield and Thomas Haukes.

Then upon the Monday morning very early the bishop did call for me. There was with him Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, to whom the bishop said, This is the man which I told you of, who would not have his child christened, nor will have any ceremonies.

Harpsfield. Christ used ceremonies: did he not take clay from the ground, and took spittle, and made the blind man to see?

Haukes. I wot well that, but Christ did never use it in baptism. If ye will needs have it, put it to the use that Christ put it unto.

Harpsfield. Admit your child die unchristened, what a heavy case stand you in!

Haukes. I admit that if it do, what then?

Harpsfield. Marry, then are you damned, and your child both.

Haukes. Judge you no farther than ye may by the scriptures.

Harpsfield. Do ye not know that your child is born in original sin?

Haukes. Yes, that I do.

Harpsfield. How is original sin washed away?

Haukes. By true faith and belief of Christ Jesus.

Harpsfield. How can your child, being an infant, believe?

Haukes. The deliverance of it from sin standeth in the faith of his parents.

Harpsfield. How prove you that?

Haukes. By St. Paul, in the 7th and 1st to the Corinthians, saying, "The unbelieving man is sanctified by the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman is sanctified by the believing man, or else were your children unclean."

Harpsfield. I will prove that they whom thou putteth thy trust in, will be against thee in this opinion.

Haukes. Who be those?

Harpsfield. Your great learned men in Oxford.

Haukes. If they do it by the scriptures, I will believe them.

Bonner. Recant, recant: do ye not know that Christ said, "Except ye be baptized, ye cannot be saved?"

Haukes. Doth Christianity stand in outward ceremonies, or no?

Bonner. Partly it doth: what say you to that?

Haukes. I say as St. Peter saith, "Not the washing of water purgeth the filthiness of the flesh, but a good conscience consenting unto God."

Harpsfield. Beware of pride, brother; beware of pride.

Haukes. It is written, "Pride serveth not for men, nor yet for the sons of men."

Bonner. Let us make an end here. How say you to the mass, sirrah?

Haukes. I say it is detestable, abominable, and profitable for nothing.

Bonner. What, nothing profitable in it! what say you to the epistle and gospel?

Haukes. It is good, if it be used as Christ left it to be used.

Bonner. Well, I am glad that ye somewhat recant; recant all, recant all.

Haukes. I have recanted nothing, nor will do.

Bonner. How say you to Confiteor?

Haukes. I say it is abominable and detestable, yea, and a blasphemy against God and his Son Christ, to call upon any, to trust to any, or to pray to any, save only to Christ Jesus.

Bonner. To trust to any, we bid you not: but to call upon them, and to pray to them, we bid you. Do ye not know when ye come into the court, ye cannot speak with the king and the queen, unless ye call to some of the privy council, that are next to the king and queen?

Haukes. They that list, let them receive your doctrine. You teach me that I should not believe nor trust in any, but to call on them: and St. Paul saith, "How shall I call upon him, on whom I believe not?"

Bonner. Will you have nobody to pray for you when you be dead?

Haukes. No, surely, except you can prove it by the scriptures.—Then the bishop pointed unto Harpsfield, and said unto me, Is it not well done to desire this man to pray for me?—Yes surely, said I; so long as we live, prayer of the righteous man is available: but this man's prayers, you being dead, profiteth nothing at all.

Bonner. Will you grant the prayer of the righteous man to prevail?

Haukes. I grant it doth for the living, but not for the dead.—Bonner. Not for the dead?

No, forsooth, (said I,) for David saith, "No man can deliver his brother from death, nor make an agreement unto God for him: for it cost more to redeem their souls, so that ye must let that alone for ever." Also, Ezekiel saith, "Though Noah, Daniel, or Job, dwelt among them, yet can they in their righteousness exceed no further than themselves."

Then the bishop said to Harpsfield, Sir, ye see this man hath no need of our Lady, neither of any of the blessed saints! Well, I will trouble you no longer; I did call you, hoping that you should do some good on him: but it will not be. And he said to me, Sir, it is time to begin with you: we will rid you away, and then we shall have one heretic less.

Harpsfield. What books have you?—Haukes. The New Testament, Solomon's books, and the Psalter.—Harpsfield. Will you read any other books?—Haukes. Yea, if you will give me such books as I will require?—Harpsfield. What books do you require?—Haukes. Latimer's books, my lord of Canterbury's books, Bradford's sermons, Ridley's books.

Bonner. Away, away! he will have no books but such as maintain his heresies. And so they departed; for Harpsfield was booted to ride unto Oxford, and I went to the porter's lodge again.

The next Day's Talk.

The next day came thither an old bishop, who had a pearl in his eye, and he brought with him to my lord a dish of apples and a bottle of wine: for he had lost his living, because he had a wife. Then the bishop called me again into the orchard, and said to the old bishop, This young man hath a child, and will not have it christened.

Haukes. I deny not baptism.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, thou canst not tell what thou wouldest have, (and that he spake with much anger.)

Haukes. A bishop must be blameless or faultless, sober, discreet, no chider, nor given to anger.—Bonner. Thou judgest me to be angry: no, by my faith, am I not; and stroked himself upon the breast.

Then said the old bishop, Alas, good young man, you must be taught by the church, and by your ancients, and do as your forefathers have done before you.

Bonner. No, no, he will have nothing but the scriptures; and God wot he doth not understand them. He will have no ceremonies in the church, no, not one. What say you to holy water?—Haukes. I say to it as to the rest, and to all that be of his making that made them.—Bonner. Why, the scriptures do allow it.—Haukes. Where prove you that?—

Bonner. In the book of Kings, where Elizeus threw salt into the water.—Haukes. Ye say truth: that it is written in the fourth book of Kings, the second chapter. The children of the prophets came to Elizeus, saying, "The dwelling of the city is pleasant, but the waters be corrupted." This was the cause that Elizeus threw salt into the water, and it became sweet and good: and so, when our waters be corrupted, if ye can by putting in of salt make them sweet, clear, and wholesome, we will the better believe your ceremonies.

Bonner. How say you to holy bread?

Haukes. Even as I said to the other: What scriptures have you to defend it?—Bonner. Have ye not read where Christ fed five thousand men with five loaves and three fishes?—Haukes. Will ye make that holy bread? There Christ dealt fish with his holy bread.—Bonner. Look, I pray you, how capitious this man is!—Haukes. Christ did not this miracle, or other, because we should do the like miracle, but because we should believe and credit his doctrine thereby.

Bonner. Ye believe no doctrine, but that which is wrought by miracles.

Haukes. No, forsooth: for Christ saith, "These tokens shall follow them that believe in me: they shall speak with new tongues, they shall cast out devils, and if they drink any deadly poison, it shall not hurt them."

Bonner. With what new tongues do ye speak?

Haukes. Forsooth, where before that I came to the knowledge of God's word I was a foul blasphemer and filthy talker; since I came to the knowledge thereof I have lauded God, praised God, and given thanks unto God, even with the same tongue: and is not this a new tongue?

Bonner. How do you cast out devils?

Haukes. Christ did cast them out by his word; and he hath left the same word, that whosoever doth credit and believe it, shall cast out devils.

Bonner. Did you ever drink any deadly poison?—H. Yea, forsooth, that I have: for I have drunken of the pestilent traditions and ceremonies of the bishop of Rome.

Bonner. Now you shew yourself to be a right heretic.—H. I pray you, what is heresy?—Bon. All things that are contrary to God's word.

Haukes. If I stand in any thing contrary thereto, then am I worthy to be so called.

Bonner. Thou art one, and thou shalt be burned, if thou stand and continue in this opinion. Ye think we are afraid to put one of you to death. Yes, yes, there is a brotherhood of you: but I will break it, I warrant you.

Haukes. Where prove you that Christ or his apostles did kill any man for his faith?

Bonner. Did not Paul excommunicate?—Yes, my lord, said I: but there is a great difference between excommunicating and burning.

Bonner. Have ye not read of the man and the woman, in the Acts of the Apostles, whom Peter destroyed?

Haukes. Yes, forsooth, I have read of one Ananias, and Sapphira his wife, which were destroyed for lying against the Holy Ghost; which serveth nothing to your purpose.

Bonner. Well, you will grant one yet.

Haukes. Well, if you will have us to grant you be of God, then shew mercy; for that God requireth.

Bonner. We will shew such mercy unto you as ye shewed unto us: for my benefice or bishopric was taken away from me, so that I had not one penny to live upon.

I pray ye, my lord, (said I,) what do you give him now that was in the bishopric or benefice before that ye came again to it? Whereunto he answered me never a word; for he turned his back unto me, and talked with other men, saying, that he was very sorry for me; but he trusted that I would turn with St. Paul, because I was so earnest. And so he departed and went to dinner, and I to the porter's lodge again. After dinner I was called into the hall again, and the bishop desired the old bishop to take me into his chamber: For I would be glad, said he, if ye would convert him.

So he took me into his chamber, and sat him down in a chair, and said to me: I would to God I could do you some good; ye are a young man, and I would not wish you to go too far, but learn of your elders to bear somewhat.—I will bear, said I, with nothing that is contrary to the word of God. And I looked that the old bishop should have made me an answer, and he was fast asleep!

Then I departed out of the chamber alone, and went to the porter's lodge again.

Talk between Fecknam and Haukes.

The next day came Fecknam unto me, and said, Are ye he that will have no ceremonies?

What mean you by that? said I.

Fecknam. Ye will not have your child christened, but in English, and you will have no ceremonies.

Haukes. Whatsoever the scripture commandeth to be done, I refuse not.

Fecknam. Ceremonies are to be used by the scriptures.—

H. Which be those?—F. How say you by Paul's breeches?—H. I have read no such thing.—F. Have ye not read in the Acts of the Apostles, how things went from Paul's body, and they received health thereby?—H. I have read in the 19th of the Acts, how there went partlets and napkins from Paul's body; is it that you mean?—F. Yea, the same is it: what say you to those ceremonies?

Haukes. I say nothing to the ceremonies: for the text saith, that God did so work by the hands of Paul, that there went partlets and napkins from him, &c. So that it seemeth by the text, that it was God that wrought, and not the ceremonies.

Fecknam. How say ye to the woman that came behind Christ, and touched the hem of his vesture: did not her disease depart from her by that ceremony?

Haukes. No, forsooth: for Christ turned back, and said to Peter, "Who is it that toucheth me? And Peter said, Thou seest the people thrust thee, and askest thou, Who touched me? Somebody hath touched me, (saith Christ,) for virtue hath gone out of me." I pray you whether was it the virtue that healed this woman, or his vesture?—F. Both.—Then (said I) is not Christ true: for he said, "Go thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole."

Bonner. Away, away to the sacrament, for these are but mere trifles to that.

Fecknam. How say ye, sirrah? Christ took bread, and brake it, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body."

Haukes. I grant Christ said so.

Fecknam. And is it not so?—H. No, forsooth, I do not understand it so.

Fecknam. Why, then is Christ a liar?—H. I think ye will so prove him.

Fecknam. Will I? why, I have spoken the words that Christ spake.

Haukes. Is every word to be understood as Christ spake it? Christ said, I am a door, a vine, I am a king, a way, &c.

Fecknam. Christ spake these words in parables.

Haukes. And why speaketh he this in parables when he said, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way, &c. more than this when he said, This is my body? For after the same phrase as he saith, This is my body, so saith he, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way; he saith not, like a door, like a vine, &c.

Then Fecknam stood up, and said, I had such an one before me this other day. Alas, these places serve nothing for your purposes. But I perceive ye hang and build on them that be at Oxford.

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. I mean Latimer, Cranmer, and Ridley.

Haukes. I know nothing else by them, but that they be both godly and learned.

Fecknam. Wilt thou trust to such dolts? One of them hath written a book, wherein he affirmeth a real presence in the sacrament.

Haukes. What he hath done I know not, but what he doth I know.

Fecknam. Ridley hath preached at Paul's cross openly, that the devil believeth better than you: for he believeth that Christ is able of stones to make bread; and ye will not believe Christ's body in the sacrament, and yet thou buildest thy faith upon them.

Haukes. I build my faith upon no man, and that ye well know: for if those men, and as many more as they be, should recant, and deny that they have said or done, yet will I stand to it, and by this shall ye know that I build my faith upon no man.

Bonner. If any of those recant, what will ye say to it? When they recant (said I) I will make you an answer.

Bonner. Then thou wilt say as thou dost now, for all that. Yea, indeed will I, (returned I,) and trust to it, by God's grace.

Bonner said, I dare say Cranmer would recant, so that he might have his living. And so the bishop and Fecknam departed from me with great laughing, and I went again to the porter's lodge.

Talk between Haukes and Chadsey.

The next day came Dr. Chadsey to the bishop and me. The bishop declared unto him, that I had stood stubbornly in the defence against the christening of my child, and against the ceremonies of the church, and that I would not have it christened but in English.

Then said Dr. Chadsey, Then he denieth the order of the Catholic church.

Bonner. Yea, he thinketh that there is no church but in England and in Germany.

Haukes. And ye think that there is no church but the church of Rome.

Chadsey. What say ye to the church of Rome?

Haukes. I say it is a church of a sort of vicious cardinals, priests, monks, and friars, which I will never credit.

Chadsey. What say ye to the bishop of Rome?

Haukes. From him and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Chadsey. Marry, so may we say, From Henry the Eighth, and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Haukes. Where were ye whiles that he lived, that ye would not say so?—C. I was not far.—H. Where were ye in his son's days?—C. In prison.—H. It was for your well doing.

Bonner. He will by no means come within my chapel, nor hear mass: for neither the mass, neither the sacrament of the altar, can he abide, neither will he have any service but in English.

Chadsey. Christ never spake in English.

Haukes. Neither spake he ever any Latin, but always in such a tongue, as the people might be edified thereby. And Paul saith, that tongues profit us nothing. He maketh a similitude between the pipe and the harp, and except it be understood what the trumpet meaneth, who can prepare himself to the battle? so if I hear the tongue which I do not understand, what profit have I thereby? no more than he hath by the trumpet, that knoweth not what it meaneth.

Chadsey. If ye understand Paul's saying, he speaketh it under a prophecy, If one prophesy to you in tongues, &c.

Haukes. Forsooth Paul speaketh plainly of tongues: for tongues serve not for them that believe.

Chadsey. I tell you Paul speaketh altogether upon prophecy.

Haukes. Paul maketh a distinction between prophesying and tongues, saying, That if any man speak with tongues, let it be by two or three at the most, and let another interpret it. But if there be no interpreter, let them keep silence in the congregation, and let himself pray unto God; and then let the prophets speak two or three, and that by course, and let the other judge, and if any revelation be made to him that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. So that it seemeth that Paul maketh a distinction between tongues and prophesying.

Bonner. The order was taken in the Catholic church, that the Latin tongue should serve through the whole world, because that they should pray all generally together in one tongue, and that to avoid all contention and strife, and to have one universal order through the whole world.—Haukes. This did your councils of Rome conclude.

Bonner. Understand ye what the general councils of Rome meant?

Haukes. Indeed, all your general councils of Rome be in Latin, and I am an Englishman: therefore I have nothing to do with them.

Chadsey. Ye are to blame, being an unlearned man, to reprove all the councils throughout all the whole world.

Haukes. I reprove them not, but Paul rebuketh them, saying, If any man preach any other doctrine than that which I have taught, do you hold him accursed.

Chadsey. Hath any man preached any other doctrine unto you?

Haukes. Yea, I have been taught another gospel since I came into this house.

Chadsey. What gospel have ye been taught?

Haukes. Praying to saints and to our Lady, and trust in the mass, holy bread, holy water, and in idols.

Chadsey. He that teaches you so, teaches you not amiss.

Haukes. Cursed be he that teacheth me so; for I will not trust him nor believe him.

Bonner. You speak of idols, and you know not what they mean.

Haukes. God hath taught us what they be: for whatsoever is made, graven, or devised, by man's hand, contrary to God's word, the same is an idol. What say you to that?

Chadsey. What be those that ye are so offended withal?

Haukes. The cross of wood, silver, copper, or gold, &c.

Bonner. What say ye to that?—Haukes. I say it is an idol: what say you to it?

Bonner. I say every idol is an image, but every image is not an idol.

Haukes. I say, what difference is there between an idol and an image?

Bonner. If it be a false god, and an image made of him, that is an idol: but if an image be made of God himself, it is no idol, but an image, because he is a true God.

Haukes. Lay your image of your true God and of your false god together, and ye shall see the difference. Have not your images feet and go not, eyes and see not, ears and hear not, hands and feel not, mouths and speak not? and even so have your idols.

Chadsey. God forbid, saith St. Paul, that I should rejoice in any thing else, but in the cross of Christ Jesus.

Haukes. Do ye understand Paul so? Do ye understand Paul?—(Unto the which he answered me never a word.)

Bonner. Where can we have a godlier remembrance when we ride by the way, than to see the cross?

Haukes. If the cross were such a profit unto us, why did not Christ's disciples take it up, and set it on a pole, and carry it in procession, with Salve, festa dies!

Chadsey. It was taken up.

Haukes. Who took it up? Helen, as ye say: for she sent a piece of it to a place of religion, where I was with the visitors when that house was suppressed, and the piece of the holy cross (which the religious had in such estimation, and had robbed many a soul committing idolatry to it) was called for, and when it was proved, and all came to all, it was but a piece of lath covered over with copper, double gilded, as it had been clean gold.

Bonner. Fie, fie! I dare say thou slanderest it.

Haukes. I know it to be true, and do not believe the contrary.—And thus did the bishop and the doctor depart in a great fume: and Chadsey said unto me as he was about to depart, It is a pity that thou shouldest live, or any such as thou art. I answered, In this case I desire not to live, but rather to die.

Chadsey. Ye die boldly, because ye would glory in your death as Joan Boucher did.—Haukes. What Joan Boucher did, I have nothing to do withal: but I would my part might be to-morrow.—God make you in a better mind, said they both; and so they departed, and I went to the porter's lodge with my keeper.

The next day Dr. Chadsey preached in the bishop's chapel, and did not begin his sermon until all the service was done; and then came the porter for me; and said, My lord would have you come to the sermon; and so I went to the chapel door, and stood without the door.

Bonner. Is not this fellow come?

Haukes. Yes, I am here.

Bonner. Come in, man.—Haukes. No, that I will not.—He called again, and I answered, I will come no nearer, and so I stood at the door. Then said the bishop, Go to your sermon.

Then Dr. Chadsey put the stole about his neck, and carried the holy-water sprinkle unto the bishop, who blessed him, and gave him holy water; and so he went to his sermon.

The text that he treated on was the 16th of Matthew, "Whom do men say that I, the Son of man, am? Peter said, Some say that thou art Elias, some say that thou art John Baptist, and some say that thou art one of the prophets. But whom say ye that I am? Then said Peter, Thou art Christ, the Son of the ever-living God. Then left he the text there, and said, Whose sins soever ye bind, are bound; which authority, said he, is left to the heads of the church, as my lord here is one, and so unto all the rest that be underneath him. But the church hath been much kicked at sith the beginning: yet kick the hereticks, spurn the hereticks, never so much, the church doth stand and flourish. And then he went straightway to the sacrament, and said his mind on it, exalting it above heaven, (as the most of them do,) and so returned to his place again, saying, Whose sins ye do remit, are remitted and forgiven: and so he applied it to the bishops and the priests to forgive sins, and said, all that be of the church will come and receive the same. And this he proved by St. John in the 11th chapter, saying, that Christ came to raise Lazarus, which when he was risen, was bound in bands: then said Christ to them that were in authority, (who were his disciples,) Go ye and loose him: Loose him, you. And this was the effect of his sermon, applying all to them, that they have the same authority that Christ spake of to his apostles; and so ended his sermon, and they went to dinner.

Another Communication between Thomas Haukes and the Bishop.

And after dinner I was called into the chapel, where were certain of the queen's servants and other strangers whom I did not know.

Bonner. Haukes, how like you the sermon?

Haukes. As I like all the rest of his doctrine.

Bonner. What! are ye not edified thereby?

Haukes. No, surely.

Bonner. It was made only because of you.

Haukes. Why, then am I sorry that ye had no more hereticks here, as ye call them: I am sorry that ye have bestowed so much labour on one, and so little regarded.

Bonner. Well, I will leave you here, for I have business; I pray you talk with him: for if ye could do him good (said he) I would be glad.—This the bishop spake to the queen's men; who said unto me, Alas, what mean you to trouble yourself about such matters against the queen's proceedings?

Haukes. Those matters have I answered before them that be in authority; and unless I see you have a farther commission, I will answer you nothing at all.

Then said the bishop's men, (which were many,) My lord hath commanded you to talk with them. I answered, If my lord will talk with me himself, I will answer him.

They cried, Faggots! burn him! hang him! to prison with him! it is pity that he liveth! lay irons upon him! and with a great noise they spake these words. Then in the midst of all their rage I departed from them, and went to the porter's lodge again.

The next Day's Talk.

The next day the bishop called me into his chamber, and said, Ye have been with me a great while, and ye are never the better, but worse and worse: and therefore I will delay the time no longer, but send you to Newgate.

Haukes. My lord, you can do me no better pleasure.

Bonner. Why, would you fain go to prison?

Haukes. Truly, I did look for none other, when I came to your hand.

Bonner. Come on your ways, ye shall see what I have written.

Then did he shew me certain articles, and these are the contents of them: Whether the Catholic church do teach and believe, that Christ's real presence doth remain in the sacrament or no, after the words of consecration, according to the words of St. Paul, which are these, "Is not the bread which we break the partaking of the body of Christ, and the cup which we bless the partaking of the blood of Christ?" which if it were not so, Paul would never have said it.

Haukes. What your church doth, I cannot tell: but I am sure that the holy Catholic church doth never so take it, nor believe it.

Bonner. Whether doth the Catholic church teach and believe the baptism that now is used in the church, or no?

I answered to it, as I did to the other question before.—Then did the bishop with much flattery counsel me to be persuaded, and to keep me out of prison; which I utterly refused, and so we departed. And I supposed that the next day I should have gone to prison; and so I had, save for the archdeacon of Canterbury, whose name is Harpsfield, whom the bishop had desired to talk with me, and began to persuade me concerning the sacrament, and the ceremonies: and after much talk he said, that the sacrament of the altar was the same body that was born of the Virgin Mary, which did hang upon the cross.

Haukes. He was upon the cross both alive and dead: which of them was the sacrament?

The archdeacon answered, Alive.

Haukes. How do you prove that?

Harpsfield. You must believe: doth not St. John say "He is condemned already that believeth not?"

Haukes. St. John saith, "He that believeth not in the Son of God is already condemned;" but he saith not, He that believeth not in the sacrament is already condemned.

Harpsfield. There is no talk with you: for ye are without faith and learning, and therefore I will talk no more with you in scripture.

Then two that stood by bade me enter further in talk with him; and then said I unto him, Why is the rood-loft set betwixt the body of the church and the chancel?

Harpsfield. I cannot tell: for ye have asked a question which you cannot assail yourself.

Haukes. Yes, that I can: for this saith one of your own doctors, That the body of the church doth represent the church militant, and the chancel the church triumphant: and so because we cannot go from the church militant to the church triumphant, but that we must bear the cross of Christ, this is the cause of the rood-loft being between the body of the church and the chancel.

Harpsfield. This is well and clerkly concluded.

Haukes. As all the rest of your doctrine is. And so with many persuasions on his part we ended, and so departed, and I to the porter's lodge again.

Another Day's Talk.

The next day in the morning, which was the first day of July, the bishop did call me himself from the porter's lodge, commanding me to make myself ready to go to prison, and to take such things with me as I had of mine own. And I said, I do neither intend to bribe, neither to steal, God willing. Then he did write my warrant to the keeper of the gate-house at Westminster, and delivered it to Harpsfield, who, with his own man and one of the bishop's men, brought me to prison, and delivered the warrant and me both to the keeper. And this was contained therein:

"I will and command you, that you receive him who cometh named in this warrant, and that he be kept as a safe prisoner, and that no man speak with him, and that ye deliver him to no man, except it be the council, or to a justice: for he is a sacramentary, and one that speaketh against baptism, a seditious man, a perilous man to be abroad in these perilous days."

And thus was I received, and they departed; and there I remained thirteen days, and then the bishop sent two of his men unto me, saying, My lord would be glad to know how ye do. I answered them, I do like a poor prisoner. They said, My lord would know whether ye be the same man that ye were when ye departed. I said, if my lord will me any good, I pray you desire him to suffer my friends to come to me. So they said they would speak for me; but I heard no more of them.

This is the first examination of me, Thomas Haukes, being examined before Edmund Bonner, then bishop of London, and by his chaplains and docters at Fulham, four miles from London, where I lay till I came to prison at Westminster; and after his two men had been with me, I heard no more of him till the 3d day of September.

The public Examination of Thomas Haukes.

After these private conferences, persuasions, and long debates, had with Thomas Haukes in the bishop's house, as hitherto hath been declared, the bishop, seeing no way to win him to his wicked ways, was fully set to proceed openly against him after the ordinary course of his popish law. Whereupon Thomas Haukes shortly after was cited, with the rest of his fellows above specified, (to wit, Thos. Tomkins, S. Knight, W. Pygot, J. Lawrence, and W. Hunter,) to appear in the bishop's consistory the 8th day of February, 1555. Upon which appearance was laid against him, in like order as to the others, first the bill of his confession, written with Bonner's hand, to which bill the blessed servant of God denied to subscribe.

After which bill of confession being read, and he firmly standing to the said confession, the bishop then assigned him, with the other five, the next day following, which was the ninth of February, to appear before him again, to give a resolute answer what they would stick unto. Which day being come, and these aforesaid six prisoners being severally called before the bishop; at the coming of Thomas Haukes the bishop willed him to remember what was said to him yesterday, and now, while he had time and space, to advise with himself what he would answer, for he stood upon life and death. Well, (quoth Mr. Haukes again,) I will willingly receive whatsoever shall be put upon me. Then were certain other interrogatories or articles commenced against him by the said bishop, (in like manner as to the others,) to the number of four, with another bill also which Bonner brought out of his bosom, containing private matters against the said Thomas Haukes, which the bishop called heresies and errors; but we may better call them Christian verities. The which matter being read, the said Haukes answered openly again, saying, that it was true, and that he was glad it was so true as it was, with more words to the like effect. And this was in the forenoon of the 9th day of February.

In the afternoon again the said Haukes appearing, and hearing the aforesaid bill of his confession, with the articles and interrogatories read unto him, with like constancy in answering again to the bishop: My lord, (said he,) as you being my friend have caused these my sayings to be written, so do you cause them to be read; and yet I will never go from them. And then being exhorted by the bishop, with many fair words, to return again to the bosom of the mother church: No, my lord, (said he,) that will I not; for if I had an hundred bodies, I would suffer them all to be torn in pieces, rather than I will abjure or recant. And so continuing in the same song, notwithstanding that the doctors and lawyers were ever calling upon him to come again to the unity of the church, he ever kept them off with this answer,

That he would never go from the belief he was in, so long as he lived.

Whereupon Bonner at the last read the sentence of death upon him; and so was he condemned the same day with the residue of his fellows, which was the 9th of February. Nevertheless, his execution was prolonged, and he remained in prison till the 10th day of June. Then was he committed to the hands and charge of the lord Rich, who being assisted with power sufficient of the worshipful of the shire, had the aforesaid Thomas Haukes down into Essex, with six other fellow-prisoners, there to suffer martyrdom, Haukes at Coxhall, the others in several other places.

Thomas Haukes by the way used much exhortation to his friends, and whensoever opportunity served to talk with them, he would familiarly admonish them.

A little before his death certain there were of his familiar acquaintance and friends, who frequented his company more familiarly, who seemed not a little to be confirmed both by the example of his constancy and by his talk: yet, notwithstanding the same again being feared with the sharpness of the punishment which he was going to, privily desired that in the midst of the flame he would shew them some token, if he could, whereby they might be more certain whether the pain of such burning were so great, that a man might not therein keep his mind quiet and patient. Which thing he promised them to do: and so secretly between them it was agreed, that if the rage of the pain were tolerable and might be suffered, then he should lift up his hands above his head towards heaven, before he gave up the ghost.

Not long after, when the hour was come, Thomas Haukes was led to the place appointed for the slaughter, by the lord Rich and his assistants; who being now come unto the stake, there mildly and patiently addressed himself to the fire, having a strait chain cast about his middle, with no small multitude of people on every side encompassing him about. Unto whom, after he had spoken many things, especially unto the lord Rich, reasoning with him of the innocent blood of saints, at length, after his fervent prayers first made and poured out unto God, the fire was set unto him.

In which when he continued long, and when his speech was taken away by the violence of the flame, his skin also drawn together, and his fingers consumed with the fire, so that now all men thought certainly he had been gone, suddenly and contrary to all expectation the blessed servant of God, being mindful of his promise before made, reached up his hands burning on a light fire, which was marvellous to behold, over his head to the living God, and with great rejoicing, as seemed, clapped them three times together.

At the sight whereof there followed such applause and outcry of the people, and especially of them which understood the matter, that the like had not commonly been heard; and so the blessed martyr of Christ, straightway sinking down into the fire, gave up his spirit, anno 1555, June 10.

The History of THOMAS WATS, Examined, Tried, and Burnt, for the Truth of the Gospel.

Thomas Wats, of Billerieay, within the county of Essex, of the dioecese of London, was by his occupation a linen-draper; who before he was apprehended had sold and made away his cloth in his shop, and disposed his things, being set in order, to his wife and children, and gave away much of his eloth unto the poor. For he looked always to be taken by God's adversaries, as shortly after came indeed to pass. So that upon the 26th day of April he was apprehended and brought before the lord Rich and other commissioners at Chelmsford, and there being accused for not coming to the church, was upon the same examined before the lord Rich, Henry Tyrel, sir Anthony Brown, Edmund Tyrel, Thomas Mildman, John Wiseman, Roger Appleton, Richard Weston, justice Gaudy, &c. The sum and principal effect of which examination hereunder followeth briefly expressed.

The Examination of Thomas Wats.

When this Thomas Wats came before the lord Rich, and the other justices whose names are before specified, at the sessions at Chelmsford, the lord Rich spoke to this effect unto him: Wats, ye be brought hither, as I understand, because of disobedience to the king and the queen's laws: ye will not come to the church, ye will not hear mass, &c. but have your conventicles a number of you in corners, contrary to the king's and queen's proceedings.

Unto which, Wats answered, My lord, if I have offended a law, I am subject here to the law. Then Anthony Brown, justice, said unto him, Wats, I pray thee tell me who hath been thy schoolmaster, to teach thee this geer, or where didst thou first learn this religion?

Forsooth, (quoth Wats,) even of you, sir; you taught it me, and none more than you: for in king Edward's days in open sessions you spake against this religion now used, no preacher more. You then said the mass was abominable, and all their trumpery besides; wishing and earnestly exhorting that none should believe therein, and that our belief should be only in Christ; and you said then, whosoever should bring in any strange nation to rule here, it were treason, and not to be suffered.

Then said Brown to my lord Rich, He belies me, my lord; what a knave is this! he will soon belie me behind my back, when he doth it before my face. And my lord Rich said again, I dare say he doth so.

After these words, Wats took occasion to speak somewhat of king Philip, and of his coming in; but what it was I could not justly learn. But thus much was heard, that after those words spoken, the bench among themselves stood up, and said one to another, Treason! saving one good man called justice Gaudy, who a little before was about to speak; but when he heard them cry treason, he held down his head as one grieved and troubled at their doings.

In conclusion, the commissioners being weary of him, or else not willing to meddle further in such matters, sent him up to the bishop of London, with their letter withal, importing the cause of his sending up.

Now when the bishop had received him, it is easy to judge how he used him, by his common practices with others. What his private conferences were, I know not, but what was publicly done in the consistory at Paul's (the common stage for these tragedies) you shall here see.

The first Appearance of Thomas Wats, in the Bishop's Consistory.

First, upon Thursday, being the second day of May, Thomas Wats was brought thither before the bishop of London, and there being examined upon his words before the lord Rich, and others, he did earnestly affirm the same to be true. Whereupon the bishop objected, and examined him upon these articles following, to which he answered as under may appear:

Articles objected against Thomas Wats, by Bonner.

1. First, That the said Thomas Wats was of Billericay, and so of the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

2. Item, That he believeth not in the sacraments of the holy and Catholic church, as the Catholic church of Rome, and all other churches members of the same, ever hitherto have believed, and is taught of all good and faithful people; nor hath allowed the sacraments, rites, usages, or ceremonies, of the said church, but hath despised the same.

3. Item, That he believeth, and also hath taught others, that the substance of material bread and wine do remain in the sacrament of the altar after the consecration, and that the said material bread and wine are the signs and tokens of Christ's body hanged upon the cross, and of his blood there shed, and that in the said sacrament there is only a memorial or remembrance of Christ's body and blood, and nothing else.

4. Item, That he believeth and doth precisely affirm, that the very true presence of Christ's body and blood in substance, is not in the sacrament of the altar, but only in heaven, and no where else.

5. Item, That he believeth, affirmeth, and saith, that the mass now used in the church of Rome, here in England and in other places, is full of idolatry, abomination, and wickedness, and that Christ never did institute it, nor ordain it, nor yet allow it, as a good and laudable thing to be used in his church.

6. Item, That he believeth and affirmeth, that auricular confession to be made unto the priest is not necessary, but superfluous; and that it is enough for a man to believe only, and to confess himself unto God, without any priest or minister at any time, though he may have the priest to confess him unto.

7. Item, That he believeth that Luther, Wickliffe, Dr. Barnes, and all other that have holden against the sacrament of the altar, and suffered death by fire or otherwise for the maintenance of the said opinion, were good men, and faithful servants and martyrs of Christ, in so believing and dying.

8. Item, That he hath and doth believe, that to fast, pray, or to do alms-deeds, is a thing utterly unprofitable; for if a man shall be saved, he shall be saved without doing of them; and if he shall be damned, they shall not help him, or do him any good at all.

9. Item, That the said Wats of late coming into open court at the sessions before the lord Rich, sir Henry Tyrel, knight, Anthony Brown, esq. and others, and being then and there examined, did openly confess that he had refused to come to the church, and to hear there the divine service, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the church. And that he did then also utter before the said commissioners, other erroneous and arrogant words, to the hurt of his soul, and to the evil example of the people there present.

10. Item, That he the said Thomas, by reason of the premises, was and is to be taken, had, reputed, and judged, as a manifest and open heretic, and for the same by the order of ecclesiastical laws is to be declared accused: and being obstinate and incorrigible, is to be delivered to the secular power, there to be punished as an heretic.

11. Item, That he, over and besides all these offences and trespasses aforesaid, had also added this trespass, that is to wit, That he had believed, and deliberately spoken, that the church of Rome in her rites, ceremonies, sacraments, constitutions, and traditions, is the synagogue of Satan; and therefore that he had consented and agreed in opinion and belief with one John Tooley, of late hanged at Charing-Cross, who at the time of his executing desired the people to pray to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, with all his enormities ; as who should say, that his authority and doings were tyranny, and had all enormities and iniquities in them.

12. Item, That the premises and every part thereof be true, notorious, manifest, and openly spoken and talked of amongst the honest and credible persons in great multitude, and that of all and singular the same within Bellericay aforesaid, and other places thereabout, being of the diocese of London, there is a common voice and fame thereof.

The Answer of the said Thomas Wats to the aforesaid Articles.

To the first, he said and confessed the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answered, that he believeth in all the sacraments according to Christ's institution and the Catholie church ; but not according to the bishop of Rome's church.

To the third he answered, that he hath and doth believe that Christ's body is in heaven, and no where else ; and further, that he will never believe that Christ's body is in the sacrament.

To the fourth he answered, confessing and firmly believing the same to be true.

To the fifth, that he did believe that the mass is abominable, and that he will not go one jot from that his belief.

To the sixth, that he neither did nor yet doth believe that the priest can absolve him of his sins : howbeit, he denieth not it is good to ask counsel at the priest's mouth.

To the seventh he said, that he knew not what the opinions of the said persons named in the said article were ; and in case the said persons did believe that the body and blood of Christ were really and in very deed in the sacrament of the altar, then that they were not good men. But in case they did believe that the body and blood of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar, really and truly, then he believed that they were good Christian men.

To the eighth, that he had not spoken as is contained in this article, but said, that he hath and doth believe that fasting, prayers, and alms-deeds, be works of a lively faith.

To the ninth he confessed, that he did utter and speak as in this article is contained ; and further, he desired God that he might die in that faith and belief wherein he now is.

To the tenth he answered and said, that he will submit himself herein to the order of the law : and further said, that he trusteth that with God he shall be blessed, although with men he be accursed.

To the eleventh he said, that he believeth that the bishop of Rome is a mortal enemy to Christ and his church. And as for Tooley, he said, he did never see or know him ; but in case the said Tooley did wish and pray as is contained in the article, then he did likewise wish and consent with him therein.

To the twelfth he answered, that all which before he confessed to be true, is also true ; and all that he hath denied to be true, he denieth again to be true, and believeth the same to be according to such things as he hath confessed.

By me, THOMAS WATS.

Another Appearance of Thomas Wats in the Consistory.

These articles thus propounded and answered, the bishop commanded him to appear again in the same place at three of the clock in the afternoon, upon the same day. At which hour being brought thither by his keeper, the bishop began with him in this wise : Wats, you know what I said unto you to-day, and what I appointed unto you at this time. The time is now come : weigh and consider with yourself that you are but a man ; and albeit that you will wilfully cast away your body, yet cast not so away your soul, but, while ye have time, return and confess the truth.

Whereunto Thomas Wats answered and said, I am weary to live in such idolatry as ye would have me to live in.

Upon which answer, the bishop caused his articles again to be read. He thereunto answered as before, and further subscribed the same with his own hand.

Another Appearance, before Dr. Harpsfield.

The bishop, after many persuasions to cause him to recant, willed him to depart as then, and to come again on Saturday at eight o'clock in the morning. Where the bishop being absent, Dr. Nicholas Harpsfield, as then being his deputy, did sit, and earnestly exhorted him to deny his opinions.

To whom in the end he answered : Well, ye have a law to condemn me, and I submit myself to the law ; but not to the laws of the church, as ye call it. And, further, I do affirm and still stand to mine answers that I have made.

Whereupon Dr. Harpsfield willed him to appear there again upon Friday, being the 10th day of the same month of May. Upon which day the bishop privately sent for the said Thomas Wats into his chamber, and there with many fair promises tempted and tried him, whether he would revoke his errors, as he then termed them. But Wats answered him in this sort : I will not believe your church, neither the Romish church, and therefore you do but labour in vain thus to travel with me.

He was hereupon again dismissed for that time, until Friday the 17th day of May, and then commanded to appear in the consistory ; which commandment he obeyed, and having the accustomed former articles ministered unto him, made the same answer as before.

Thus being tossed to and fro from day to day, and hour to hour, he was at the last, the 18th day of the month of May, brought into the consistory, where first was made a brief recital of all the former process ; and there the said Wats being by the bishop and others desired to deny his profession, made this final answer : God keep me from the doctrine that ye would have me to come unto, which ye have now declared. And I beseech God that I may persevere in what I have done : for I will stand to mine answers.

The bishop perceiving his fair flattering promises nothing to prevail, and having no great store of other reasons to persuade with, put forth his last and strongest argument of condemnation. Which being ended, he was delivered to the sheriffs of London, and by them was sent to Newgate, where he remained until the 9th day of June, or, as some record, to the 22d of May : at what time he was carried unto Chelmsford, and there was brought to Scot's house, keeping then an inn, in Chelmsford, where, as they were eating meat with Haukes and the rest that came down to their burning, they prayed together both before and after their meat.

Then Wats went and prayed privately by himself, and afterward came to his wife and his six children, (being there,) and said these words : Wife, and my good children, I must now depart from you : therefore henceforth know I you no more, but as the Lord hath given you unto me, so I give you again unto the Lord, whom I charge you see you do obey, and fear him ; and beware ye turn not to this abominable Papistry, against the which I shall anon, by God's grace, give my blood. Let not the murdering of God's saints cause you to relent, but take occasion thereby to be the stronger in the Lord's quarrel, and I doubt not but he will be a merciful Father unto you. All these and such like words spake he unto them; of whom two, as it is said, offered to be burnt with him: In the end, he bade them farewell, and kissed them all, and was carried to the fire.

At the stake, after he had kissed it, he spake to my lord Rich these or the like words: My lord, (saith he,) beware, beware: for you do against your own conscience herein; and unless you repent, the Lord will revenge it; for you are the cause of this my death.

Concerning the Childbed of Queen Mary, as it was rumoured among the People.

Long persuasion had been in England, with great expectation, for the space of half a year or more, that the queen was with child. This report was made by the queen's physicians and other nigh about the court; so that divers were punished for saying the contrary. And commandment was given that in all the churches supplication and prayer should be made for the queen's good delivery. And also the same appears by provision made before in act of parliament for the child.

And now, forsomuch as in the beginning of this month of June, about Whitsuntide, the time was thought to be nigh that this young master should come into the world, and that midwives, rockers, nurses, with the eradle and all, were prepared and in readiness; suddenly, upon what cause or occasion it is uncertain, a certain vain rumour was blown in London, of the prosperous deliverance of the queen, and the birth of the child; insomuch, that the bells were rung, bonfires and processions made, not only in the city of London, and in most other parts of the realm, but also in the town of Antwerp guns were shot off upon the river by the English ships, and the mariners thereof rewarded with an hundred pistoles or Italian crowns by the lady regent, who was the queen of Hungary; such great rejoicing and triumph was for the queen's delivery, and that there was a prince born. Yea, divers preachers, namely, one, the parson of St. Anne, within Aldersgate, after procession and Te Deum sung, took upon him to describe the proportion of the child, how fair, how beautiful, and great a prince it was, as the like had not been seen.

In the midst of this great ado, there was a simple man (this I speak but upon information) dwelling within four miles of Berwick, that never had been before half way to London, which said concerning the bonfires made for queen Mary's child, Here is a joyful triumph, but at length all will not prove worth a mess of pottage; as indeed it came to pass. For in the end all proved clean contrary, and the joy and expectations of men were much deceived. For the people were certified, that the queen neither was as then delivered, nor after was in hope to have any child.

At this time many talked diversely: some said this rumour of the queen's conception was spread for a policy; others affirmed that she was deceived by a tympany, or some other like disease, to think herself with child, and was not; some thought she was with child, and that it did by some chance miscarry, or else that she was bewitched: but what was the truth thereof, the Lord knoweth, to whom nothing is secret. One thing, of mine own hearing and seeing, I cannot pass over unwitnessed.

There came to me one Isabel Malt, a woman dwelling in Aldersgate-street, in Horn-alley, who before witness made this declaration unto us: That she being delivered of a man-child upon Whitsunday in the morning, which was the 11th day of June, anno 1555, there came to her lord North, and another lord to her unknown, dwelling then about Old Fish-street, demanding of her if she would part with her child, and would swear that she never knew nor had any such child; which, if she would, her son they said should be well provided for, she should take no care for it, with many fair offers if she would part with the child. After that came other women also, of whom one they said should have been the rocker. But she in no wise would let go her son, who at the writing hereof being alive, and called Timothy Malt, was of the age of thirteen years and upward.

Thus much, I say, I heard of the woman herself. What credit is to be given to her relation, I know not; but leave it to the liberty of the reader, to believe it they that list; to them that list not, I have no further warrant to assure them.

Among many other great preparations made for the queen's deliverance of child, there was a eradle very sumptuously and gorgeously trimmed, upon which eradle for the child appointed, these verses were written both in Latin and English:

Quam Maria sobolem, Deus optime, summe dedisti, Anglis incolumem redde, tuere, Rege.

The child which thou to Mary, O Lord of might, hast send,
To England's joy in health preserve, keep, and defend.

About this time there came over into England a certain English book, giving warning to Englishmen of the Spaniards, and disclosing certain close practices for recovery of abbeylands; which book was called, A Warning for England. So that by the occasion of this book, upon the 13th day of this month, came out a certain proclamation, set forth in the name of the king and queen, repealing and disannulling all manner of books written or printed, whatsoever should touch any thing the impairing of the pope's dignity; whereby not only much godly edification was hindered, but also great peril grew among the people. The copy of which proclamation here followeth.

A Proclamation set out by the King and Queen, for the restraining of all Books and Writings, tending against the Doctrine of the Pope and his Church.

“Whereas by the statute made in the second year of king Henry IV. concerning the repressing of heresy, there is ordained and provided a great punishment, not only for the authors, makers, and writers of books, containing wicked doctrine and erroneous and heretical opinions, contrary to the Catholic faith and determination of the holy church, and likewise for their fantors and supporters; but also for such as shall have or keep any such books or writings, and not make delivery of them to the ordinary of the diocese or his ministers, within a certain time limited in the said statute, which act or statute being by authority of parliament of late revived, was also openly proclaimed, to the intent the subjects of the realm upon such proclamation should the rather eschew the danger and penalty of the said statute; and as yet nevertheless in most parts of the realm the same is neglected, and little regarded: The king and queen, our sovereign lord and lady, therefore, &c. straitly charge and command, that no person or persons, of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be, from henceforth presume to bring or convey, or cause to be brought or conveyed, into this realm, any books, writings, or works, hereafter mentioned; that is to say, any book or books, writings or works, made and set forth by, or in the name of, Martin Luther; or any book or books, writings or works, made or set forth by, or in the name of, Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, John Calvin, Pomercane, John Alaseo, Bullinger, Bucer, Melancthon, Bernardinus, Ochinus, Erasmus, Sarserius, Peter Martyr, Hugh Latimer, Robert Barnes, (otherwise called Friar Barnes,) John Bale, (otherwise called Friar Bale,) Justus Jonas, John Hooper, Miles Coverdale, William Tindal, Thomas Crammer late archbishop of Canterbury, William Turner, Theodore Basil, (otherwise called Thomas Beacon,) John Frith, Roy, and the book commonly called Hall's Chronicle, or any of them, in the Latin, Dutch, English, Italian, or French tongue; or any other like book, paper, writing, or work, made, printed, or set forth by any other person or persons, containing false doctrine contrary and against the Catholic faith, and the doctrine of the Catholic church. And also that no person or persons presume to write, print, utter, sell, read, or keep any, or cause to be written, printed, uttered, or kept, any of the said books, papers, works, or writings, or any book or books written or printed in the Latin or English tongue, concerning the common service and administration set forth in English to be used in the churches of this realm in the time of king Edward the VIth, commonly called the Communion Book, or Book of Common Service and ordering of Ministers, otherwise called, The Book set forth by Authority of Parliament, for Common Prayer and administration of the Sacrament, or to be used in the mother tongue within the Church of England; but shall, within the space of fifteen days next after the publication of this Proclamation, bring or deliver, or cause the said books, writings, and works, and every of them remaining in their custody and keeping, to be brought and delivered to the ordinary of the diocese, where such books, works, or writings, be or remain, or to his chancellor or commissaries, without fraud, colour or deceit, at the said ordinaries' will and disposition to be burnt, or otherwise to be used or ordered by the said ordinaries, as by the canons or spiritual laws it is in that case limited and appointed, upon pain that every offender contrary to this proclamation shall incur the danger and penalties contained in the said statute, and as they will avoid their majesties' high indignation and displeasure, and further answer at their uttermost perils.

"And their majesties by this proclamation give full power and authority to all bishops and ordinaries, and all justices of the peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs of cities and towns corporate, and other head officers within this realm and the dominions thereof, and expressly commandeth and willeth the same and every of them, that they and every of them within their several limits and jurisdictions, shall, in the default and negligence of the said subjects, after the said fifteen days expired, inquire and search out the said books, writings, and works, and for this purpose enter into the house or houses, closets, and secret places, of every person, of whatsoever degree, being negligent in this behalf, and suspected to keep any such book, writing, or works, contrary to this proclamation: And that the said justices, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, and other head officers above specified, and every of them, within their said limits and jurisdictions finding any of the said subjects negligent and faulty in this behalf, shall commit every such offender to ward, there to remain without bail or mainprize, till the same offender or offenders have received such punishment as the said statute doth limit and appoint in this behalf. Given under our signs manual, at our honour of Hampton Court, the 13th day of June, the first and second years of our reigns."

Imprinted by John Cawood, anno 1555.

Articles to be inquired upon by the Wardens of every Company, touching Seditious Books, especially touching the Book called, "A Warning for England."

1. Whether they have seen any of the aforesaid books.
2. Whether they have heard of any of the said books.
3. Where they were, and in what place they have seen them.
4. Whom they know to have lately come from beyond the sea, especially from Zurich, Strasbourg, Frankfort, Wesel, Embden, and Disburge.
5. Whom they know or vehemently suspect to be common carriers of letters, or money, thither from hence.
6. That they bring to my lord mayor all such seditious books as they have, or shall have found hereafter.

In this proclamation thou hast heard, Christian reader, the profound and learned censure of the Catholic church of England, what books they mislike and reject as heretical, schismatical, and pernicious. Against which Catholic censure of these learned fathers, it may please the reader to grant me to set before him here a pair of balances, wherein to weigh the books on the one side condemned, with the books on the other side allowed, to the end that we weighing the one with the other, may discern the better between them, which part weigheth best with God's holy truth and true catholic church, against manifest idolatry and palpable abomination. And now, therefore, as they have in this present proclamation given their condemnation upon these books above recited; so I desire thee to give thy censure upon their books by them allowed, and upon the matter in them contained, and mark well what good stuff it is.

And first to begin with the Primer in English, for children, after the use of Salisbury, imprinted with a privilege, according to the king and queen's majesties' letters patent in the reign of queen Mary. Let us survey some part of the said Primer, (for to express it all were too long,) beginning with the first lesson of our Lady, in these words:

"Holy Mary, mother most pure of Virgins all,
Mother and daughter of the King celestial,
So comfort us in our desolation,
That by thy prayer and special meditation,
We enjoy the reward of thy heavenly reign," &c.

Confer this with the scriptures, good reader, and judge uprightly whether this doctrine be tolerable in the church or not. It followeth more in the second lesson:

"Holy Mary, of all godly the godliest,
Pray for us, of all holy the holiest,
That he our prayers accept may in good wise,
Which of thee was born, and reigneth above the skies," &c.

In the third Lesson.

"Thy Son beseech with humble intercession,
To purge us clean of our transgression;
That so being redeemed, we may the place ascend,
Where thou dwellest with him world without end."

The Versicle.

"Pray for the people, entreat for the clergy, make intercession for the devout woman-kind; let all feel thy help, that worthily solemnize thy memorial," &c.

Another Versicle.

"Holy Mother of God, make thy petition,
That we may deserve Christ's promission," &c.

And in the anthem after Benedictus, thus it followeth :

"We beseech thee of thy pity to have us in remembrance, and to make means for us unto Christ, that we, being supported by thy help, may deserve to attain the kingdom of heaven."

Furthermore in the Collect after it followeth :

"And grant that through the gracious intercession of the Virgin thy Mother, we may be delivered from this present heaviness, and have the fruition of eternal gladness."

It followeth moreover, in the said Primer, thus concerning the material cross :

"O God, which hast ascended thy most holy cross, and hast given light to the darkness of the world, vouchsafe by the virtue of thy cross to illumine, visit, and comfort, both our hearts and bodies," &c.

Moreover, in the name of St. John Baptist thus it prayeth :

"O Lord, defend us always through the continual succours of St. John Baptist. For the more frail we be, the more need we have to be relieved with necessary prayers," &c.

In which words, note, good reader, not only the absurdity of doctrine, but also the foolishness of the reason. For where their doctrine pretendeth that St. John Baptist should pray for us, here we pray to God for St. John Baptist, that he will hear his prayer praying for us. It followeth furthermore in the name of Peter and Paul :

"Hear us mercifully, and grant that, through the merits of them both, we may obtain the glory everlasting," &c.

Of St. Andrew.

"So let him, O Lord, be a continual petitioner for us to thee," &c.

Of St. Lawrence thus :

"St. Lawrence the deacon did work a great work : for by the virtue of the holy cross he gave sight to the blind," &c.

And how can this be true, when the holy cross was not yet found in the time of St. Lawrence ? For Helen, which first found the cross, as they say, came after St. Lawrence more than forty years.

To Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury.

"By the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did spend,—make us, Christ, to climb whither Thomas did ascend."

Of St. Nicholas.

"O God, which hast glorified blessed Nicholas, thy holy bishop, with innumerable miracles, grant, we beseech thee, that by his merits and prayers we may be delivered from the fire of hell.

Of Mary Magdalen.

"Grant, we beseech thee, through thy mercy, to let her purchase for us the bliss everlasting," &c.

Another Prayer to our Lady.

"The dolorous compassion of God's sweet Mother, brings us to the bliss of Almighty God the Father," &c.

Another Prayer in the said Primer to our Lady.

"Establish us in peace and tranquillity,

And change the name of sinful Eva :

Loose thy prisoners from captivity,

Unto the blind give sight again :

Deliver us from malignity,

To the end we may some grace attain.

Shew thyself to be a mother,

So that he accept our petition.

Deliver us from bondage of sin," &c

Idoltrous Invocation of the Virgin Mary.

"Holy Mother, succour the miserable, comfort the weak spirited, give courage to the desperate, pray for the people, make intercession for the clergy, and be a mean for the devout woman-kind," &c.

Item.

"O thou meek Mother, have mercy therefore
On wretches, for whom thou hadst these pains all,
Seeing thy Son that vine cluster pressed sore ;
And from the pestilence of death eternal,
Keep us by voiding the fiend infernal,
And join us with them which rewarded be
With eternal life, seeing the Deity."

Item.

"Hail Queen, mother of mercy, our life, our sweetness, our hope. Unto thee do we cry and sigh, weeping and wailing. Come off therefore, our patroness, cast upon us thy pitiful eyes, and after this our banishment shew to us the blessed fruit of thy womb. O gate of glory, be for us a reconciliation unto the Father and the Son. From the wretched their faults expel : wipe the spots of sins unclean," &c.

Item.

"The fruit of the womb everlasting,
We may behold through thy deserving," &c.

Item.

"Grant, we beseech thee, that by her merits and prayers we may attain to that unspeakable joy, whereas she being assumpt, doth now rejoice with thee in heaven for ever."

And thus much hitherto of this Catholic Primer, called our Lady's Matins. Whereunto, if it were not tedious for the reader, we would also adjoin our Lady's Psalter, to the intent that all indifferent readers, as they have seen what books these Catholic fathers have condemned and do condemn for heretical ; so the same also may see and judge what books on the other side they approve as lawful and catholic. And forasmuch as it is not known peradventure to all men what our Lady's Psalter is, or what it meaneth, yea, and some peradventure will deny any such book of our Lady's Psalter to be written or approved, here therefore we will first produce the name of the author ; who was Bonaventure, a seraphical doctor, bishop also and cardinal, canonized moreover by pope Sixtus IV. anno 1482, for a saint in the calendar, who in his book thus entitled in Latin "Incipit Psalterium beatæ Virginis, compilatum per Seraphicum Doctorem Sanctum Bonaventuram Episcopum Albanensem, necnon sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ Presbyterum Cardinalem, in honorem genetricis," &c. fol. 84. In the second part of his whole works, (which were imprinted at Strasburg, anno 1495,) to shew himself a devout servant to his Lady, hath taken every psalm of David's Psalter, (which he peculiarly made and referred to Almighty God,) and hath in divers of the said psalms and verses put out the name of the Lord, and hath placed in the name of our Lady. This being done through the whole psalms and every one of them, it is now called our Lady's Psalter, used to be sung and said in the praise and service of our Lady. A brief taste whereof, for example's sake, we thought here proper to exhibit unto the reader in order, as follows,—that he may see, from the most unexceptionable evidence, that the worship due only to the living and true God, is here idoltrously given to a creature !

The Title in English of the Psalter.

¶ Here beginneth the Psalter of the blessed Virgin, made by the seraphical doctor, St. Bonaventure, the bishop of Alban, and cardinal of the holy church of Rome.

PSAL. 1. "Beatus vir, qui intelligit nomen tuum, Maria Virgo, gratia tua animam ejus confortabit. Tanquam aquarum fontibus irrigatum uberrimum in eo fructum justitiæ propagabis, &c. Universas enim feminas vincis pulchritudine carnis; superas angelos et archangelos excellentia sanctitatis. Misericordia tua et gratia ubique prædicatur, &c. Gloria Patri."

That is to say:

Blessed is the man which understandeth thy name, O Virgin Mary; thy grace shall comfort his soul. Thou shalt bring forth in him the most plentiful fruit of justice, being watered as it were with fountains of water. All women thou passest in the beauty of thy body; all angels and archangels in the excellency of thy holiness. Thy mercy and thy grace is proclaimed every where, &c. Glory be to the Father, &c.

PSAL. 2. "Quare fremuerunt inimici nostri, et adversum nos meditati sunt inania? Protegat nos dextera tua, Mater Dei, ut acies terribiliter confundens et destruens eos. Venite ad eam, qui laboratis et tribulati estis, et dabit refrigerium animabus vestris. Accedite ad eam in tentationibus vestris, et stabiliet vos serenitas vultus ejus. Benedicite illam in toto corde vestro, misericordia enim illius plena est terra, &c. Gloria Patri."

Why do our enemies fret and imagine vain things against us? Let thy right hand defend us, O mother of God, terribly confounding and destroying them as a sword. Come unto her, all ye that labour and are troubled, and she will give rest unto your souls. Come unto her in your temptations, and her loving countenance shall stablish and comfort you. Bless her with all your heart; for the earth is full of her mercy. Glory be to the Father, &c.

PSAL. 3. "Domina quid multiplicati sunt qui tribulant me? In tempestate tua persequeris et dissipabis eos. Dissolve colligationes impietatis nostræ: tolle fasciculos peccatorum nostrorum. Miserere mei, Domina, et sana infirmitatem meam; tolle dolorem et angustiam cordis mei. Ne tradas me manibus inimicorum meorum, et in die mortis meæ conforta animam meam. Deduc me ad portum salutis, et spiritum meum redde factori meo."

Why are they so many, O Lady, that trouble me? In thy fury thou shalt persecute and destroy them. Loose the bonds of our impiety, and take away the burden of our sins. Have mercy upon me, O Lady, and heal my infirmity. Take away my sorrow, and the anguish of my heart. Deliver me not into the hands of mine enemies, and in the day of my death comfort my soul. Bring me into the heaven of salvation, and restore my spirit unto my Maker and Creator. Glory be to the Father, &c.

PSAL. 4. "Cum invocarem, exaudisti me, Domina, et ex sublimi solio tuo mei dignata es recordari. A rugientibus præparatis ad escam et de manibus quærentium me liberabit gratia tua. Quoniam benigna est misericordia et pietas tua in omnes qui invocant nomen sanctum tuum. Benedicta sit Domina in æternum, et majestas tua in seculum. Glorificate eam omnes gentes," &c.

When I called to thee, thou heardest me, O my Lady, and out of thy high throne thou didst vouchsafe to think upon me. From the roaring of them that prepare themselves to devour me, and out of the hands of such as seek after my life, thy grace shall deliver me: because thy mercy and thy pity are great towards all them that call upon thy holy name. Blessed be thou, O Lady, for ever, and thy majesty for ever and ever. Glorify her, all nations of the earth, &c.

PSAL. 5. "Verba mea auribus percipe Domina, &c. Convertite luctum nostrum in gaudium, et tribulationem nostram in jubilationem. Corruant ante pedes nostros inimici nostri: virtute tua eorum capita conterantur," &c.

Hear my words, O Lady, &c. Turn our mourning into gladness, and our trouble into rejoicing. Let our enemies fall before our feet, and with thy power dash their heads in pieces.

PSAL. 6. "Domina ne in furore Dei sinas corripi me, neque in ira ejus judicari, &c. De porta inferi, et de ventre abyssi, tuis sanctis precibus libera nos. Aperiantur nobis januæ sempiternæ, ut enarremus in æternum mirabilia tua. Quia non mortui, neque qui inferno sunt, laudabunt te, Domina, sed qui tua gratia vitam æternam obtinebunt."

O Lady, suffer me not to be rebuked in God's anger, nor to be chastened in his heavy displeasure, &c. From the gate and deep pit of hell, with thy holy prayers deliver us. Let the everlasting gates be opened, that we may shew forth thy marvellous works for ever. Because the dead, nor they that be in hell, shall not praise thee, O Lady, but they which shall obtain by thy grace life everlasting.

PSAL. 7. "Domina mea, in te speravi; de inimicis meis libera me, Domina. Conclude ora leonis, et labia persequentium constringe. Non moreris propter nomen tuum facere nobis misericordiam tuam. Splendor vultus tui fulgeat super nos, ut servetur conscientia nostra apud altissimum. Si persequitur inimicus animam meam, Domina, adjutorio tuo comforter, ne vibret gladium suum contra me."

O my Lady, in thee will I put my trust; deliver me from mine enemies, O Lady. Stop the mouth of the lion, and bind the lips of the persecutors. Make no tarrying, for thy name's sake, to shew thy mercy upon me. Let the brightness of thy countenance shine upon us, that our conscience may be saved before the most Highest. If the enemy do persecute my soul, O Lady, help me, that he destroy me not.

PSAL. 9. "Confitebor tibi, Domina, in toto corde meo, et narrabo in populis laudem et gloriam tuam, &c. Invenient gratiam per te inventricem gratiæ et salutis; respirant ad indulgentiam humiles poenitentes; sana contritiones cordis eorum," &c.

I will give thanks to thee, O Lady, with my whole heart, and will shew forth among the nations thy praise and glory, &c. They shall find grace through thee, the finder out of grace and salvation. The humble and penitent groan for pardon and forgiveness; heal thou the sores of their heart, &c.

PSAL. 15. "In te Domina confido, &c. Exquirite illam a juventute vestra, et glorificabit vos, &c. Misericordia illius nostrorum auferat multitudinem peccatorum, et fecunditatem nobis conferat meritum," &c.

In thee, O Lady, do I put my trust, &c. Seek her even from your youth, and she shall glorify you, &c. Her mercy take from us the multitude of our sins, and give unto us plenteousness of merits, &c.

PSAL. 12. "Salvum me fac, mater pulchræ dilectionis, fons clementiæ, &c. Gyrum terræ sola circuis, ut subvenias invocantibus te," &c.

Save me, O Mother of Love, and Fountain of Mercy, &c. Thou thyself alone hast gone about the compass of the earth, to help them that call upon thee, &c.

PSAL. 13. "Usque quo Domina oblivisceris me, et nonne liberas me in die tribulationis? Usque quo exaltabitur inimicus meus super me? Potentia virtutis tuæ contere ipsum, &c. Magnificamus te gratiæ inventricem, per quam sæcula reparantur," &c.

How long dost thou forget me, O Lady, and dost not deliver me in the day of my trouble? How long shall mine enemy triumph over me? With thy mighty power destroy him, &c. We magnify thee the finder and the author of grace, by whom the world is repaired, &c.

PSAL. 16. "Conserva me, Domina, quoniam speravi in te, &c. Benedicta sunt ubera tua, quibus lacte deitico Salvatorem enutriste," &c.

Preserve me, O Lady, for in thee have I put my trust, &c. Blessed be thy breasts, which with thy deifying milk didst nourish the Saviour, &c.

PSAL. 18. "Diligam te, Domina cœli et terræ; in gentibus nomen tuum invocabo. Confitemini illi tribulati corde, et roborabit vos contra inimicos vestros, &c. Religiosi omnes honerate illam, quia ipsa est adiutrix vestra et specialis advocata. Esto refrigerium nostrum, gloriosa mater Christi, quia tu es totius religionis mirabile firmamentum."

I will love thee, O Lady of heaven and earth; I will call upon thy name among the nations. Confess yourselves unto her, ye that are troubled in heart, and she shall strengthen you against your enemies, &c. All ye cloisterers, honour her, for she is your helper and special advocate. Be thou our refreshing and rest, for thou art the marvellous foundation of all religion.

PSAL. 20. "Exaudi, nos Domina, in die tribulationis, &c. Ne proiecias nos in tempore mortis nostræ, sed succurre animæ, eum deseruerit corpus suum. Mitte angelum in occursum ejus per quem ab hostibus defendatur, &c. Sentiat in pœnis refrigerium tuum, et concede ei locum inter electos Dei."

Hear us, O Lady, in the day of trouble, &c. Cast us not away in the time of our death, but succour our soul when it forsaketh the body; send an angel to meet it, that it may be defended from the enemies, &c. In torments and pain let it feel thy comfort, and grant to it a place among the elect of God.

PSAL. 25. "Ad te, Domina, levavi animam, &c. Non prævaleant adversum me laquei mortis, &c. Duetrix mea esto ad patriam, et me cœtui angelorum digneris aggregare."

To thee, O Lady, do I lift up my soul, &c. Let not the snares of death prevail against me, &c. Be thou my guide to the heavenly rest, and to the company of angels associate me.

Ps. 26. "Judica me, Domina, quoniam ab innocentia mea digressus sum: sed quia speravi in te, non infirmabor," &c.

Judge thou me, O Lady, for I am fallen from mine innocence: but because I put my trust in thee, therefore I shall not fall, &c.

PSAL. 27. "Domina, illuminatio mea sit splendor faciei tuæ, &c. Serenitas gratiæ tuæ refulgeat menti meæ," &c.

O Lady, let the brightness of thy face be my sight, and let the clearness of thy grace shine unto my mind, &c.

PSAL. 28. "Ad te, Domina, clamabo, &c. Miserere mei in die angustiarum, et in luce veritatis tuæ libera me."

To thee, O Lady, I will call, &c. Have mercy upon me in day of my trouble, and in the light of thy truth deliver me.

PSAL. 31. "In te, Domina, speravi, non confundar in æternum, in gloria tua suscipe me. Tu es fortitudo mea et refugium meum, consolatio mea et protectio mea, &c. Educas me laqueo quem absconderunt mihi, quoniam tu es adiutrix mea. In manus tuas, Domina, commendo spiritum meum."

In thee, O Lady, do I put my trust, let me not be confounded for ever; in thy glory receive me. Thou art my strength and my refuge, my consolation and protection, &c. Deliver me from the snare that they have laid for me, because thou art my helper. Into thy hands O Lady I commend my spirit.

PSAL. 34. "Benedicam Dominam in omni tempore, &c. In periculis, in rebus dubiis, invocate eam, et in necessitatibus invenietis auxilium, &c. Sumite exemplum conversationis ejus et æmulemini studia humilitatis ejus. Quia ergo, Domina, humilina fuisti, Verbum increatum ex te carnem suscipere coegisti."

I will always praise our Lady, &c. In perils, in adversity, call upon her, and in time of need ye shall find succour. Let her conversation be an example unto you, and follow the virtue of her humility. Because therefore, O Lady, thou wast humble and lowly, thou didst compel the Word increate to take flesh of thee.

PSAL. 36. "Dixit injustus, &c. A malo proposito discedat; Mater Dei, inclina vultum Dei super nos: Coge illum peccatoribus misereri, &c. Benedictum sit imperium tuum super cœlos, benedicta sit magnificentia tua super terram."

The wicked man said, &c. Let him depart from his evil purpose; O Mother of God, turn the countenance of God towards us: compel him to be merciful unto sinners. Blessed be thy empire and dominion in heaven, and blessed be thy magnificence upon the earth.

PSAL. 45. "Eructavit cor meum verbum bonum, Domina, &c. Per tuam sanetitatem peccata mea purgantur: per tuam integritatem mihi incorruptibilitas condonetur," &c.

My heart is inditing a good matter, O Lady, &c. By thy holiness let my sins be purged, by thy integrity let me obtain incorruption, &c.

PSAL. 47. "Omnes gentes, plaudite manibus, &c. Quoniam ipsa est porta vitæ, janua salutis, et vitæ nostræ reconciliatrix; spes pœnitentium, pax beata cordium atque salus. Miserere mei, Domina, miserere mei, quia tu es lux et spes omnium confidentium in te," &c.

Clap your hands, all ye people, &c. For she is the gate of life, the door of salvation, the reconciler of our life, the hope of the penitent, the comfort of the sorrowful, the blessed peace of hearts, and salvation. Have mercy upon me, O Lady, have mercy upon me; for thou art the light and hope of all that put their trust in thee, &c.

PSAL. 51. "Miserere mei, Domina, quæ mater misericordia nuncupatis. Et secundum viscera miserationum tuarum munda me ab omnibus iniquitatibus meis," &c.

Have mercy upon me, O Lady, which art called the mother of mercy, and in the bowels of thy great compassion cleanse me from mine iniquities.

PSAL. 54. "Domina, in nomine tuo salvum me fac, et ab injustitiis meis libera me," &c.

O Lady, in thy name save me, and from mine unrighteousness deliver me, &c.

PSAL. 70. "Domina, in adiutorium meum intende, &c. Miserere servorum tuorum, super quos invocatum est nomen tuum," &c.

Make haste, O Lady, to help me, &c. Have mercy on thy servants, upon whom thy name is invoked, &c.

PSAL. 71. "In te, Domina, speravi, non confundar in æternum; in tua misericordia libera me, &c."

In thee, Lady, have I put my trust: let me not be confounded for ever: in thy mercy deliver me, &c.

PSAL. 79. "Domina, venerunt Gentes in hæreditatem Dei, quas tu meritis tuis Christo confederasti," &c.

O Lady, the Gentiles are come into the inheritance of God, whom thou didst join unto Christ by thy merits, &c.

PSAL. 89. "Qui regis Israel, &c. Odor vitæ de illa progreditur, et omnis salus de corde illius seaturit."

Thou that rulest Israel, &c. The savour of life cometh from her, and all health floweth out of her heart, &c.

PSAL. 91. "Qui habitat in adjutorio matris Dei, in protectione ipsius commorabitur, &c. Clamate ad illam in periculis vestris, et flagellum non appropinquabit tabernaculo vestro. Fructus gratiæ inveniet qui speraverit in illa. Porta Paradisi reserabitur ei."

Whoso dwelleth in the help of the Mother of God, shall dwell in the shadow of her protection, &c. Cry unto her in your dangers, and the scourge shall not come near your tabernacle. The fruit of grace shall be to him whoso trusteth in her, and the gate of Paradise shall be open unto her.

PSAL. 95. "Venite exultemus Domini nostræ, &c. Suscipe in fine animas nostras, et introduce nos in requiem æternam," &c.

Come, let us rejoice to our Lady, &c. Receive our souls at our last end, and bring them into everlasting rest, &c.

PSAL. 105. "Confitemini Domini nostræ, et invoke nomen ejus, &c. Salus sempiterna in manu tua, Domina, &c.

Praise our Lady, and call upon her name, &c. Everlasting salvation is in thy hand, O Lady, &c.

PSAL. 110. "Dixit Dominus Domini nostræ, Sede mater mea a dextris meis," &c.

The Lord said unto our Lady, Sit here my mother on my right hand, &c.

PSAL. 114. "In exitu animæ meæ ex hoc mundo occurre ei Domina, et suscipe eam, &c. Esto illi scala ad regnum cælorum, et iter rectum ad Paradisum Dei, &c.

In the passing of my soul out of this world, come and meet it, O Lady, and receive it, &c. Be to it a ladder to the kingdom of heaven, and a right way to the paradise of God, &c.

PSAL. 119. "Miserationibus tuis plena est terra, ideo viam justificationum tuarum exquisivi, &c. Concupiscam in æternum laudare te Domina, cum docueris me justificationes tuas," &c.

The whole earth is full of thy mercies, and therefore I will search out the way of thy justifications, &c. I will covet for ever to praise thee, O Lady, when thou shalt teach me thy justifications, &c.

PSAL. 125. "Qui confidunt in te, Mater Dei, non timebunt à facie inimici," &c.

They that put their trust in thee, O Mother of God, shall not be afraid of the face of their enemy, &c.

PSAL. 127. "Nisi Domina ædificaverit domum cordis nostri, non permanebit ædificium ejus."

Except our Lady shall build the house of our heart, the building thereof shall not continue.

PSAL. 128. "Beati omnes qui timeant Dominam nostram, et beati omnes qui sciunt facere voluntatem suam," &c.

Blessed is every one that feareth our Lady, and blessed be all they which know to do her will, &c.

PSAL. 130. "De profundis clamavi ad te Domina; Domina exaudi vocem meam; Fiant aures tuæ intendentes," &c.

Out of the deep I have called unto thee, O Lady; O Lady, hear my voice, &c.

PSAL. 132. "Memento, Domina, David, et omnium invocantium nomen tuum," &c.

O Lady, remember David, and all them that call upon thy name, &c.

PSAL. 134. "Ecce nunc benedicite Dominam, omnes qui speratis in nomine sancto ejus," &c.

Behold and bless now our Lady, all ye that put your trust in her holy name.

PSAL. 136. "Super flumina Babylonis, &c. Non invenietur propitiatio sine illa"

At the floods of Babylon, &c. There is no propitiation to be found without her.

PSAL. 140. "Eripe me, Domina, ab omni malo, et ab hoste inferno defende me," &c.

Deliver me, O Lady, from all evil, and from the infernal enemy defend me, &c.

PSAL. 145. "Oculi nostri sperant in te, Domina. Mitte nobis cibum et escam delectantem. Laudationem tuam loquetur lingua mea, et benedicam te in seculum seculi."

Our eyes look up and trust in thee. Do thou send us meat and food convenient, &c. My tongue shall speak thy praise, and shall bless thee for ever.

PSAL. 148. "Lauda, Jerusalem, Dominam, glorifica illam etiam, O Sion. Ipsa enim construit muros tuos, et filios tuos benedicit. Gratia sua te impingnat, pacemque donat terminis tuis."

Praise thou our Lady, O Jerusalem, and glorify her also, O thou Sion: for she buildeth up thy walls, and blesseth thy children. Her grace maketh thee fat, and giveth peace unto thy coasts.

Such consummate barefaced blasphemy never appeared before in the most degenerate ages of the world. God is robbed of all his glory, and a good woman, clothed in all his attributes, is audaciously seated on the eternal throne!

I could recite also more of like blasphemy, following immediately after this Psalter of our Lady, in the seraphical docteur aforesaid, as these:

"Ecce Domina Salvatrix mea, fiducialiter agam in te, et non timebo, &c. Quia fortitudo mea es tu. Et facta es mihi in salutem."—Behold my Lady my Saviour, I will be bold in thee, and will not fear, &c. Because thou art my strength, &c. And art become my salvation, &c.

"Exulta totum genus humanum, quia talem dedit tibi Mediatrix Dominus Deus tuus."—Rejoice, O all mankind, because the Lord thy God hath given unto thee such a Mediatrix, &c.

"Confitebor tibi, Domina, quia abscondisti hæc a sapientibus, et revelasti ea parvulis."—I will confess to thee, O Lady, because thou hast hid these things from the wise, and hast revealed them to the little ones.

"Generatio prava atque perversa, agnosce Dominam nostram Salvatricem tuam. Nunquid ipsa est mater tua quæ possedit te, et in fide generavit te."—O thou wicked and peevish generation, acknowledge our Lady thy Saviour. Is not she the mother that hath possessed thee, and in faith hath begotten thee?

"O benedicta, in manibus tuis reposita est nostra salus."—O thou blessed, in thy hands is laid up our salvation, &c.

"In nomine tuo omne genu flectatur, cœlestium," &c. In thy name let every knee bend in heaven, and earth, and in hell.

"Quemadmodum infans sine nutrice non potest vivere; ita nec sine Domina nostra posses habere salutem."—Like as an infant cannot live without the nurse, so neither canst thou have salvation without our Lady.

"Quicumque vult salvus esse, ante omnia opus est ille tenet de Maria firmam fidem. Quam nisi quisque integram inviolatamque servaverit, absque dubio in æternum peribit."—Whoso will be saved, before all things he must needs hold this belief of our Lady; which belief, unless every one shall hold perfect and sound, he shall perish without doubt for ever.

After these so horrible things, in the next tract followeth the Rosary or Garland of our Lady, compiled by the said Bonaventure; wherein these words are to be read: 'O Mediatrix between God and Man, the Lord hath wonderfully magnified thee, that thou only shouldest conceive his Son.

'Wherefore, O good Mary our Mediatrix, mother of grace, and mother of mercy,' &c. And again, 'Therefore, O our Empress and Lady most hountifull, by the authority of a mother, command, commaund, I say, thy well-beloved Son, that he will stir up our minds from the love of worldly things to heavenly desires, &c.

Item, 'O the Advocate of the miserable, the eyes of thy servants he directed to thee,' &c.

To these premises, I might also adjoin the horrible and most blasphemous words of the said Bonaventure in the said book, fol. 100. page 2. col. 1. which I beseech thee to read and note. Quæ major bonitas quam quod Christus, &c.—What greater goodness can be, than that Christ is content to be captive upon the altar?

Wherenpon he speaketh in the person of Jeremiah, saying, 'Behold, I am in your hands; do with me as you see good, &c.' Where note (saith he) that when any duke or prince is taken prisoner for his subjects, he is not let go before he pay some great sum of money for his ransom. Even so neither we ought to let Christ go out of our hands, being our prisoner and captive, except he grant to us remission of our sins and his heavenly kingdom. The priest therefore lifteth up the body of Christ upon the altar, as though he said thus: Behold him whom the whole world is not able to comprehend, he is holden here our captive; wherefore let us hold him fast, and not let him go before we obtain of him our requests,' &c.

NOTES.

Is not here good Catholic stuff, Christian reader, think you?—Confer, I beseech you, this doctrine with the doctrine of the apostles, which teach us that we are fully complete in Christ, and I will refer me to no better judge than your own conscience. And now, therefore, if any man have been in doubt in times past of the doctrine and proceeding of the church of Rome, whether it be rightly charged with blind errors, with blasphemy intolerable, and idolatry abominable, or not, here now he may be fully certified and resolved: for where was ever idolatry or blasphemy to be found, if it be not here in these Matins and this Psalter of our Lady? If idolatry be to make an idol to be worshipped as God, which is no god, what do we here but make an idol of our Lady, to be worshipped with no less dignity, glory, authority, reverence, and service, than is the Lord God himself? And as he is called our Lord, so she is called our Lady; and if he be King, yet she is the Queen of heaven; and though he have the name of God, yet she beareth so the title of the Mother of God, that as mothers have authority over their children, so she is willed to shew herself to be his mother, to cause him to grant our petition. Finally, if he be our Patron, yet she is our Patroness.—The commandment saith, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." And what worship or service can we give to God, more than is here ascribed unto her? and what benefit is to be asked at the hands of Christ our Saviour, which is not equally asked of her? To save our souls, to give us peace, to grant grace, to comfort the desperate, to loose our captivity, to release our sins, to deliver from the fiend, to bring to heaven, &c. To her they pray, cry, weep, sigh, groan, knock, and kneel; to her they trust; and if we believe not also in our Lady, we are heretics ipso facto.

Furthermore, as Christ our only Lord and Saviour hath his church and congregation which profess his name, of whom we are called Christians; so neither is she likewise without her chapels, her cloisters, her chapters, and fraternities, which professing her name in like sort, are called our Lady's brethren, or white friars, besides multitudes of other patrons of churches, of whom every one hath his peculiar church and religion by himself; yet all these together are included under this general devotion of our Lady, their supreme patroness and governess.

Now to proceed further to the other part of the commandment, which saith, "Him only shalt thou serve." What service hath the Lord in all the church, but our Lady also jointly with him hath the like? Her mass, her matins, her even-song, her hours and complin, her rosaries, her anthems, her collects, her primer, her psalter, her holidays likewise, yea, five to one.—Finally, as the Lord hath his prayer called the Lord's Prayer, so hath she her Ave-Marias, yea, ten Aves to one Pater-noster; yea, and read further in the said Bonaventure, and ye shall also see her to have her Te Deum, her Benedictus, her Magnificat, and her Quicumque vult.

If the Lord our God had not expressed unto us his own will by plain words, limiting unto us by express injunction what to believe, what to follow, and how to worship and serve him, and how to receive from him our salvation, but had left us the imagination of our own inventions, every man to shift for himself after his own policy, then peradventure, this way taken by the pope's church, to make friends and mediators between God and us, for reconciliation, remission, and salvation, might have some rhyme or reason; but now God's word doth bind us, doth prescribe and limit us precisely, in every point touching salvation, what to believe and what to do, shewing us plainly that we cannot be saved but by the blood of his Son only, neither can be justified but by faith only in the same Christ his Son: wherefore not to believe that which he hath promised, is infidelity, and to follow any other belief than he hath set us, is plain idolatry. The which two special errors most commonly follow the doctrine of the Romish church, as not only in this Primer and Psalter of our Lady aforesaid, but also in all their proceedings, teachings, and preachings besides, may well appear. For where the scripture doth perfectly promise and pronounce us to be justified through our faith in Christ, and willeth us to seek our salvation no where else, but only in the merits of Jesus; the institution of the church of Rome neither will receive that God hath freely given, (wherein standeth infidelity,) neither yet will seek the same there where as they should, but in the merits and prayers of our Lady, of St. John Baptist, St. Peter and Paul, St. Andrew, St. Nicholas, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and by the worthiness of the material Cross, and such other unlawful means: which is plain idolatry. And yet such books as these can be suffered among the Catholics to be current, good, wholesome, and lawful books; whereas the others, which lead us the true way from infidelity and idolatry to true Christianity, in no wise can be suffered. Wherefore to pass from this Proclamation, let us proceed, God willing, in the course of our history.

But from this horrible blasphemy and idolatry, God has in his infinite mercy delivered these lands. And from such doctrine, government, tyranny, and cruelty, may God for ever preserve these nations! Amen.

The Story of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN, Martyrs.

Mention was made before in the story of Thomas Haukes, of six prisoners besides, which were sent down with him to Essex, the time he went to execution. Of which six prisoners, three went to be burned, the other three to recant, and to do penance: the names of which six were these, Thomas

Osmond, fuller, William Bamford, (alias Butler,) weaver, Thomas Osborne, fuller, Nicholas Chamberlain, weaver, Thomas Brodehill, weaver, and Richard Web, weaver, being all of the town of Coxhall. All which six Coxhall men, next after the examinations of Thomas Haukes and Thomas Wats, were sent up to Bonner to be examined, by the earl of Oxford, and Sir Philip Paris, knight.

The said prisoners being sent up the first day of May, were brought before the bishop the 17th of the said month, to be examined upon divers and sundry articles objected against them; whereunto they were compelled to answer, and to put their hands to the same; the copy of which their articles and answers, being all one in form, (if the registers say true,) is the following:

The Copy of the Articles objected against Thomas Osmond, William Bamford, and Nicholas Chamberlain, of Coxhall.

First, That thou Thomas Osmond, fuller, was and art of the parish of Coxhall, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that there is here in the earth one Catholic and Universal whole Church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Christ, and all the necessary articles and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that thou art necessarily bounden, under the pain of the damnation of thy soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said Catholic and Universal Church, and to the faith and religion of the same in all necessary points of the said faith and religion, without doubting or wavering in the said faith and religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, Thou hast not believed, that the faith and religion which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being true members and parts of the said Catholic and Universal Church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the faith and religion of Christ, and also is the very true faith and religion which all Christian people ought to believe, observe, follow, and keep; but contrariwise thou hast believed, and dost believe, that that faith and religion which the said church of Rome, and all the other churches aforesaid, have heretofore believed, and do believe, is false, erroneous, and naught, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, kept, and followed, of any Christian person.

4. Item, That although it be true that in the sacrament of the altar there is in substance the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ under the forms of bread and wine, and although that it be so believed, taught, and preached, undoubtedly in the said church of Rome, and all other churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not so believed, nor dost so believe; but contrariwise thou hast believed, and dost believe firmly and steadfastly, that there is not in the said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material and common bread and wine, with the forms thereof, and that the said material and common bread and wine are only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and are by faith to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any such substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and hast openly spoken and defended, and so dost believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Christ's body and blood, is only to take material and common bread and to break it and distribute it among the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

6. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, thought, and spoken, that the mass now used in the realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the institution of Christ.

7. Item, That thou hast in times past believed, and yet dost now believe, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made unto the priest, but is a thing superfluous, void, and naught, only to be made to God, and to none other person.

8. Item, Thou being notoriously and openly suspected for an heretic, and a person culpable in the premises, wast of late called before the earl of Oxford and Sir Philip Paris, and there wast charged with the said heresies, especially against the sacrament of the altar. And because thou didst maintain and stand to thy said heresies, and wouldst not come to the church, and be confessed, and receive the said sacrament as other Christian people did, thou wast by the said earl of Oxford and Sir Philip Paris sent up by a constable unto me, bishop of London, and wast by them denounced, detected, and put up to me as an heretic and misbelieving person.

9. Item, That thou hast known and believed, thou dost know and believe, or at least thou hast credibly heard reported, spoken, and said, that all and all manner of persons which do teach, preach, or hold, any thing concerning the sacraments of the church, or any the articles of the faith, otherwise than is found already discussed and determined by our mother the holy church, or doth call into doubt or question that thing which is already decided or determined by the church, or that willingly and wittingly do utter, openly or privily, any slanderous or blasphemous words concerning the said sacraments or any of them, or that do preach, teach, or keep, any sect or kind of heresy against the wholesome doctrine of the church, and do wittingly, willingly, or obstinately, defend the sect or kind of heresy, are by the canons of the whole and universal Catholic church, and also by the ecclesiastical laws of this church of England, by their so doing, accursed with that curse which doth separate them from the entry into the church, from the receiving of the sacraments, and from the company of faithful people, and are to be pronounced, declared, and taken for heretics, and to be delivered to the secular power, and by the laws temporal of this realm of England, and the custom of the same, to be by the said secular power put to death and burnt for this said sect and heresy.

10. Item, That thou by reason of the premises wast and art to be pronounced, taken, had, reputed, and judged, for a manifest and open, wilful and obstinate, heretic, for a wicked and cursed person, and to be punished accordingly for the same, according to the said canon laws, usages, and customs.

The Answers which the said Thomas Osmond, William Bamford, and Nicholas Chamberlain, severally made unto these Articles.

The first they confessed to be true, except that they do believe that there is here in the earth one Catholic and whole church, and that the same church doth hold and believe as is contained in this article.

To the second they answer, and believe the said article not to be true; for they say that they have and do believe that they are necessarily bounden, under pain of damnation of their soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said Catholic church, and to the faith and religion of the same, in all necessary points of the same faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in any part thereof.

— HENRY B. B. B. B. B. —

To the third they answer, that the church of Rome, and other churches mentioned in this article, be not true members and parts (as they be used in faith and religion) of the Catholic church of Christ, and that the faith and religion used in the said churches is not agreeable with the church of Christ, but are false and erroneous.

To the fourth they answer and say, that howsoever the said churches of Rome, and others of Christendom, have and do believe touching the sacrament of the altar, yet they do believe that in the sacrament, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material bread and wine, and that the same material bread and wine be only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and are to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

To the fifth article they answer, that the true receiving and eating of Christ's body, according to Christ's institution, is to take, distribute, and eat material bread, and thereby to remember the passion and death of Christ, and so receive by faith (as they believe) Christ's body and blood, and not otherwise.

To the sixth they answer, the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the seventh they answer and confess, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made to the priest; nevertheless they think that it is necessary to go to such a priest as is able to give good counsel, and that for the counsel only, and not otherwise. And as concerning the ceremonies of the church, they answer the same to be vain and unprofitable. No service in the church ought to be said but only in the English tongue.

To the eighth, they answer and believe the same to be true in every part thereof, except they do not believe that they be heretics, or suspected of heresy.

To the ninth Osmond and Bamford answered, that they referred themselves to the said laws mentioned in that article; but Chamberlain made no answer at all to this article.

To the tenth the said Osmond and Bamford answered and said, that by reason of their belief before by them confessed, they are not to be reputed, taken, or adjudged, for wilful and obstinate heretics, nor to be punished therefore, as is declared in that article. The other answered nothing.

Scholia upon the aforesaid Articles.

These articles in the same form and manner of words are commonly objected to all others that follow after, with the same answers also thereunto annexed. In which articles thou mayest note, reader, the crafty and subtle conduct of these lawyers and registers, who so deceitfully framed their articles and positions, that unless a man do advisedly consider them, it is hard for a simple man to answer to them, but he shall be snared and entangled. So they paint their church with such a visage of universal, whole, holy, catholic, as who should say, He that denieth Rome, denieth the holy church of Christ here on earth. Likewise in examining them, and especially the simple sort, in the matter of the sacrament, to the material bread in the sacrament they put their word, only, very captiously and fraudulently, to take them at the worst advantage, making the people believe that they take the holy sacrament to be no better than only common bread; when they do not so, but make a difference between the same, both in the use, honour, and name thereof.

Again, when the examiners hold but only against the erroneous points of Romish religion, these bishops in their interrogatories give out the matter so generally, as though the said examiners in general spake against all the articles of faith taught in Rome, Spain, England, France, Scotland, &c.

Moreover, concerning Latin service, in such crafty form of words they propound their articles, that it might appear to the people these men do deny any service to be lawful in any place, country, or language, but only in English.

And as these articles are craftily, captiously, and deceitfully in form of words devised by the bishops and their notaries; so the answers again to the same be no less subtly framed, and after the most odious manner put down in the name of the examiners; which being read unto them, thus without further advice they are constrained upon a sudden to subscribe the same with their hands. Whereby if any word escape their hand, peradventure not considerably subscribed, there the papists take their advantage against them, to defame them, and to bring them into hatred with the people.

These articles thus propounded and answered, they were until the afternoon dismissed: at which time they did again appear, and there were examined and counselled with by fair and flattering speeches, as well of the bishop as of others his assistants, to recant and revoke their opinions, who notwithstanding remained constant and firm, and therefore, after the common usage of the ecclesiastical laws, were sent away again until the next day, being Saturday the 13th day of May. Then in the forenoon, the bishop, using his accustomed manner of proceeding, did likewise dismiss them, and at last in the afternoon condemned them as heretics, and so delivered them to the sheriffs, in whose custody they remained until they were delivered unto the sheriff of Essex, and by him were executed; Chamberlain at Colchester, the 14th of June; Thomas Osmond at Manington, the 15th of June; and William Bamford, alias Butler, at Harwich, the same 15th day in the month of June.

The History of the worthy Martyr and Servant of God, Mr. JOHN BRADFORD, with his Life, Acts, and sundry Conflicts with his Adversaries, and Martyrdom at length, most constantly suffered for the Testimony of Christ and his Truth.

John Bradford was born at Manchester, in Lancashire: his parents did bring him up in learning from his infancy, until he attained such knowledge in the Latin tongue, and skill in writing, that he was able to gain his own living in some honest condition. Then he became servant to sir John Harrington, knight, who in the great affairs of king Henry VIII. and king Edward VI. which he had in hand when he was treasurer of the king's camps and buildings, at divers times at Bonlogne had such experience of Bradford's activity in writing, his expertness in the art of auditors, as also of his faithful trustiness, that not only in those affairs, but in many other of his private business, he trusted Bradford in such sort, that above all other he used his faithful service.

Thus continued Bradford certain years in a right honest and good trade of life, after the course and order of this world like to come forward (as they say) if his mind could have so liked, or had been given to the world as many other be. But the Lord, which had called him unto a better function, and pre-ordained him to preach the gospel of Christ in that hour of grace which in his secret counsel he had appointed, called this his chosen child to the understanding and partaking of the same gospel of life. In which call he was so truly taught, that forthwith his effectual call was perceived by the fruits. For then Bradford did forsake his worldly affairs and forwardness in worldly wealth, and, after the just account given to his master of all his doings, he departed from him: and with marvellous fervour, to further the kingdom of God by the ministry of his holy word, he gave himself wholly to the study of the scriptures; which purpose to accomplish the better, he departed from the Temple at London, where the temporal law is studied, and went to the university of Cambridge, to learn by God's law how to further the building of the Lord's temple. In Cambridge, his diligence in study, his profiting in knowledge and godly conversation, so pleased all men, that within one whole year after that he had been there, the university did give him a degree of master of arts.

Immediately after, the master and fellows of Pembroke-hall gave him a fellowship in their college; yea, that man of God, Martin Bucer, so liked him, that he had him not only most dear unto him, but also oftentimes exhorted him to bestow his talent in preaching. Unto which Bradford answered always, that he was unable to serve in that office through want of learning. To which Bucer was wont to reply, saying, If thou have not fine manchet bread, yet give the poor people barley bread, or whatsoever else the Lord hath committed unto thee. And whilst Bradford was thus persuaded to enter into the ministry, Dr. Ridley, (that worthy bishop of London, and glorious martyr of Christ,) according to the order that then was in the church of England, called him to take the degree of a deacon. Which order, because it was not without some such abuse to which Bradford would not consent, the bishop yet perceiving that Bradford was willing to enter into the ministry, was content to order him deacon without any abuse, even as he desired. This being done, he obtained for him a license to preach, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul.

In this preaching office, by the space of three years, how faithfully Bradford walked, how diligently he laboured, many parts of England can testify. Sharply he opened and re-proved sin, sweetly he preached Christ crucified, pithily he opposed heresies and errors, earnestly he persuaded to godly life. After the death of blessed young king Edward VI. when queen Mary had gotten the crown, still continued he diligently in preaching, until he was unjustly deprived both of his office and liberty by the queen and her council. To the doing whereof, because they had no just cause, they took occasion to do this injury for such an act as among the Turks and infidels would have been with thankfulness rewarded, and with great favour accepted; as indeed it did no less deserve.

The fact was this: the 13th of August, in the first year of the reign of queen Mary, Mr. Bourne, then bishop of Bath, made a seditious sermon at Paul's cross in London, as partly is declared before, to set Popery abroad, in such sort that it moved the people to no small indignation, being almost ready to pull him out of the pulpit. Neither could the reverence of the place, nor the presence of bishop Bonner, who then was his master, nor yet the commandment of the mayor of London, whom the people ought to have obeyed, stay their rage; but the more they spake, the more the people were incensed. At length, Bourne, seeing the people in such a mood, and himself in such peril, (whereof he was sufficiently warned by the hurling of a dagger at him as he stood in the pulpit,) and that he was put from ending his sermon, fearing lest, against his will, he should there end his wretched life, desired Bradford, who stood in the pulpit behind him, to come forth, and to stand in his place, and speak to the people. Good Bradford at his request was content, and there spake to the people of godly and quiet obedience. Whom as soon as the people saw to begin to speak unto them, so glad they were to hear him, they cried with a great shout, "Bradford! Bradford! God save thy life, Bradford!" well declaring not only what affection they bare unto him, but also what regard they gave unto his words. For after that he had entered a little to preach unto them, and to exhort them to quiet and patience, soon all the raging ceased, and in the end quietly departed each man to his house. Yet in the mean season, (for it was a long time before that so great a multitude could all depart,) Bourne thought himself not yet full sure of his life till he was safely housed, notwithstanding that the mayor and sheriffs of London were there at hand to help him. Wherefore he desired Bradford not to depart from him till he were in safety: which Bradford according to his promise performed; for while the mayor and sheriffs did lead Bourne to the school-master's house, which is next to the pulpit, Bradford went at his back, shadowing him from the people with his gown, and so to set him safe.

Let the reader now consider the peril of Bourne, the charity of Bradford, and the headiness of the multitude, and also the grudging minds of certain which yet still there remained behind, grieved not a little in their minds to see that so good a man should save the life of such a popish priest, so impudently and openly railing against king Edward. Among whom one gentleman said these words: Ah, Bradford, Bradford, thou savest him that wills to burn thee: I give thee his life: if it were not for thee, I would, I assure thee, run him through with my sword. Thus Bourne for that time, through Bradford's means, escaped bodily death: but God hath his judgment to be shewed in the time appointed.

The same Sunday in the afternoon Bradford preached at the Bow church in Cheapside, and reprov'd the people sharply for their seditious misdemeanour. After this he did still abide in London with an innocent conscience, to try what should become of his just doing.

Within three days after, he was sent for to the Tower of London, where the queen then was, to appear there before the council. There was he charged with this act of saving Bourne, which act they there called seditious, and also objected against him for preaching; and so by them he was committed first to the Tower, then unto other prisons, out of which neither his innocency, godliness, nor charitable dealing, could purchase to him liberty of body, till by death (which he suffered for Christ's cause) he obtained the heavenly liberty, of which neither pope nor papist shall ever deprive him.

From the Tower he came to the King's Bench in Southwark; and after his condemnation, he was sent to the Compter in the Poultry, in London; in which two places, for the time he did remain prisoner, he preached twice a day continually, unless sickness hindered him; where also the sacrament was often administered, and through his means such resort of good folks was daily to his lecture and to the administration of the sacrament, that commonly his chamber was well night filled therewith. Preaching, reading, and praying, was his whole life. He did not eat above one meal a day, which was but very little when he took it: and his continual study was upon his knees. In the midst of dinner he used often to muse with himself, having his hat over his eyes, from whence came commonly plenty of tears. Very gentle he was to man and child, and in so good credit with his keeper, that at his desire in an evening (being prisoner in the King's Bench in Southwark) he had license, upon his promise to return again that night, to go into London without any keeper, to visit one that was sick, lying by the Still-yard. Neither did he fail his promise, but returned to his prison again, rather preventing his hour than breaking his fidelity; so constant was he in word and in deed.

Of personage he was somewhat tall and slender, spare of body, of a faint sanguine colour, with an auburn beard. He slept not commonly above four hours in the night; and in bed, till sleep came, his book went not out of his hand. His chief recreation was in honest company and comely talk, wherein he would spend a little time after dinner at the board, and so to prayer and his book again. He counted that hour not well spent wherein he did not some good, either with his pen, study, or in exhorting of others, &c. He was no niggard of his purse, but would liberally participate what he had to his fellow-prisoners; and commonly once a week he visited the thieves, pick-purses, and such others that were with him in prison, where he lay on the other side; unto whom he would give godly exhortation, to learn the amendment of their lives by their trouble, and, after that so done, distribute among them some portion of money to their comfort.

While he was in the King's Bench, and Mr. Saunders in the Marshalsea, both prisoners, on the back side of those two prisons they met many times, and conferred together when they would; so mercifully did the Lord work for them, even in the midst of their troubles; and the said Bradford was so trusted with his keeper, and had such liberty on the back side, that there was no day but that he might have easily escaped away if he would, but that the Lord had another work to do for him. In the summer time, while he was in the said King's Bench, he had liberty of his keeper to ride into Oxfordshire, to a merchant's house of his acquaintance, and horse and all things prepared for him for that journey, and the party in readiness that should ride with him; but God prevented him by sickness, that he went not at all.

One of his old friends and acquaintance came unto him whilst he was prisoner, and asked him, if he sued to get him out, what then he would do, or whither he would go? Unto whom he made answer, as not caring whether he went out or no: but if he did, he said, he would marry, and still abide in England secretly, teaching the people as the time would suffer him, and occupy himself that way.

He was had in so great reverence and admiration with all good men, that a multitude, which never knew him but by fame, greatly lamented his death; yea, and a number also of the papists themselves wished heartily his life. There were few days in which he was thought not to spend some tears before he went to bed, neither was there ever any prisoner with him but by his company he greatly profited, as all they will yet witness, and have confessed of him no less, to the glory of God, whose society he frequented; as among many, one special thing I thought to note, which is this:

Bishop Farrar, being in the King's Bench prisoner, as before you have heard, was counselled by the papists in the end of Lent, to receive the sacrament at Easter in one kind; who after much persuading yielded to them, and promised so to do. Then (so it happened by God's providence) the Easter even, the day before he should have done it, was Bradford brought to the King's Bench a prisoner, where the Lord making him his instrument, Bradford only was the mean that the said bishop Farrar revoked his promise and word, and would never after yield to be spotted with that papistical pitch; so effectually the Lord wrought by this worthy servant of his. Such an instrument was he in God's church, that few or none there were that knew him, but esteemed him as a precious jewel, and God's true messenger.

The night before he was had to Newgate, which was the Saturday night, he was sore troubled divers times in his sleep by dreams; how the chain for his burning was brought to the Compter gate, and how the next day, being Sunday, he should be had to Newgate, and on the Monday after burned in Smithfield; as indeed it came to pass. Now he being vexed so oftentimes in this sort with these dreams, about three of the clock in the morning, he waked him that lay with him, and told him his unquiet sleep, and what he was troubled withal. Then, after a little talk, Mr. Bradford rose out of bed, and gave himself to his old exercise of reading and prayer, as always he had used before; and at dinner, according to his accustomed manner, he did eat his meat, and was very merry, nobody being with him from morning to night but he that lay with him, with whom he had many times that day communication of death, and of the kingdom of heaven.

In the afternoon, they two walking together in the keeper's chamber, suddenly the keeper's wife came up, as one half amazed and seeming much troubled, being almost breathless, and said, O Mr. Bradford, I come to bring you heavy news. What is that? said he. Marry, quoth she, to-morrow you must be burned; and your chain is now a buying, and soon you must go to Newgate. With that Mr. Bradford put off his cap, and, lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, I thank God for it: I have looked for the same a long time, and therefore it cometh not now to me suddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour; the Lord make me worthy thereof. And so thanking her for her gentleness, departed up into his chamber, and called his friend with him; who when he came thither, he went secretly himself alone a long time, and prayed; which done, he came again to him that was in his chamber, and took him divers writings and papers, and shewed him his mind in those things that he would have done; and after they had spent the afternoon till night in many and sundry such things, at last came to him half a dozen of his friends more, with whom all the evening he spent in prayer and other good exercise.

A little before he went out of the Compter he made a notable prayer of his farewell, with plenty of tears. Also, when he shifted himself with a clean shirt that was made for his burning, by one Mr. Walter Marlar's wife, (who was a good nurse unto him, and his very good friend,) he made such a prayer of the wedding garment, that some of those that were present were in such great admiration, that their eyes were as thoroughly occupied in looking on him, as their ears gave place to hear his prayer. At his departing out of the chamber, he made likewise a prayer, and gave money to every servant and officer of the house, with exhortation to them to serve and fear God, continually labouring to eschew all manner of evil. That done, he turned him to the wall, and prayed vehemently that his words might not be spoken in vain, but that the Lord would work the same in them effectually, for his Christ's sake. Then being beneath in the court, all the prisoners cried out to him, and bade him farewell, as the rest of the house had done before with weeping.

The time they carried him to Newgate was about 11 or 12 o'clock in the night, when it was thought none would be stirring abroad; and yet, contrary to their expectation in that behalf, was there in Cheapside and other places between the Compter and Newgate, a great multitude of people that came to see him, who most gently bade him farewell, praying for him with lamentations and tears; and he again as gently bade them farewell, praying most heartily for them and their welfare.

Now whether it were a commandment from the queen and her council, or from Bonner and his adherents, or whether it were devised by the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, of London, or no, I cannot tell; but a great noise there was over-night about the city by divers, that Bradford should be burned the next day in Smithfield, by four of the clock in the morning, before it should be much known to any. In which rumour many heads had divers minds, some thinking the fear of the people to be the cause thereof; others thought nay, that it was rather because the Papists judged his death would convert many to the truth, and give a great overthrow to their kingdom; so some thought one thing, and some another, that no just conjecture of the cause could be known. But this was certain, the people prevented the device suspected: for the next day, at the said hour of four o'clock in the morning, there was in Smithfield such a multitude of men and women, that many being in admiration thereof, thought it was not possible that they could have warning of his death, being so great a number in such a short time, unless it were by the singular providence of Almighty God.

Well, this took not effect as the people thought; for that morning it was nine o'clock of the day before Mr. Bradford was brought into Smithfield; who, in going through Newgate thitherward, spied a friend of his whom he loved, standing on the one side the way to the keeper's housewards, unto whom he reached his hand over the people, and plucked him to him, and delivered to him from his head his velvet night-cap, and also his handkerchief, with other things besides. And after a little secret talk with him, and each of them parting from other, immediately came to him a brother-in-law of his, called Roger Beswick, which as soon as he had taken the said Bradford by the hand, one of the sheriffs of London (called Woodrofe) came with his staff, and brake the said Roger's head, that the blood ran about his shoulders. Which sight Bradford beholding with grief, bade his brother farewell, willing him to commend him to his mother and the rest of his friends, and to get him to some surgeon betimes. So they departing, had little or no talk at all together.

Then was he led forth to Smithfield with a great company of armed men, to conduct him thither, as the like was not seen at any man's burning; for in every corner of Smithfield there were some, besides those that stood about the stake. Bradford then being come to the place, fell flat to the ground, secretly making his prayers to Almighty God. Then rising again, and putting off his clothes unto his shirt, he went to the stake, and there suffered with a young man of twenty years of age, joyfully and constantly, whose name was John Leaf.

It was before declared, that John Bradford, within three days after the sermon of Mr. Bourne, was by the council committed to the Tower, where he remained from the month of August, 1553, to the 22d of January, 1555, upon which day he was called out to examination before Stephen Winchester, and other of the commissioners. The examination and communication which passed between him and them, proceeded as followeth:

The Communication between John Bradford and the Lord Chancellor, and others in commission with him, the 22d day of January, 1555.

After the lord chancellor, and the residue of the queen's council in commission with him, had ended their talk with

Mr. Farrar, late bishop of St. David's, the under-marshal of the King's Bench was commanded to bring in John Bradford; who being come into the presence of the council, sitting at a table, kneeled down on his knee, but immediately by the lord chancellor was bidden to stand up.

When he was risen, the lord chancellor earnestly looked upon him; but he ceased not in like manner to look on the lord chancellor still continually, save that once he cast up his eyes to heaven-ward, sighed for God's grace, and so over-faced them.

Then the lord chancellor, as it were amazed and somewhat troubled, spake thus to him in effect: That of long time he had been imprisoned justly for his seditious behaviour at Paul's cross the 13th of August, in the year 1552, for his false preaching and arrogancy, taking upon him to preach without authority. But now (quoth he) the time of mercy is come, and therefore the queen's highness, minding to offer unto you mercy, hath by us sent for you, to declare and give the same, if so be ye will with us return; and if you will do as we have done, you shall find as we have found, I warrant you.

Bradford. My lord, and lords all, I confess that I have been long imprisoned, and (with humble reverence be it spoken) unjustly, for that I did nothing seditiously, falsely, or arrogantly, in word or fact, by preaching or otherwise; but rather sought truth, peace, and all godly quietness, as an obedient and faithful subject, both in going about to save the bishop of Bath now, (then Mr. Bourne, the preacher at the cross,) and in preaching for quietness accordingly.

At these words, or rather before he had fully finished, the lord chancellor said, That it was a loud lie: for the fact was seditious, as you my lord of London can bear witness.

Bonner. You say true, my lord; I saw him with mine own eyes, when he took upon him to rule and lead the people malapertly, thereby declaring that he was the author of the sedition.

Brad. My lords, notwithstanding my lord bishop's seeing and saying, yet the truth I have told, as one day my Lord God Almighty shall reveal to all the world, when we shall all come and appear before him; in the mean season, because I cannot be believed of you, I must and am ready to suffer, as now your sayings be, whatsoever God shall license you to do unto me.

L. Chan. I know thou hast a glorious tongue, and goodly shows thou makest; but all is lies thou speakest. And again, I have not forgot how stubborn thou wast when thou wast before us in the Tower; wherenpon thou wast committed to prison concerning religion. I have not forgotten thy behaviour and talk, where-through worthily thou hast been kept in prison, as one that would have done more hurt than I will speak of.

Brad. My lord, as I said, I say again, that I stand as before you, so before God, and one day we shall all stand before him: the truth then will be the truth, though now ye will not so take it. Yea, my lord, I dare say that my lord of Bath, Mr. Bourne, will witness with me, that I sought his safeguard with the peril of mine own life; I thank God therefore.

Bonner. That is not true: for I myself did see thee take upon thee too much.

Brad. No, I took nothing upon me undesired, and that of Mr. Bourne himself, as, if he were here present, I dare say he would affirm. For he desired me both to help him to pacify the people, and also not to leave him till he was in safety. And as for my behaviour in the Tower, and talk before your honours, if I did or said any thing that did not beseem me, if your lordships would tell me wherein it was, I should and would shortly make you answer.

Chan. Well, to leave this matter: How sayest thou now, wilt thou return again, and do as we have done, and thou shalt receive the queen's mercy and pardon?

Brad. My lord, I desire mercy with God's mercy, but mercy with God's wrath, God keep me from; although, I thank God therefore, my conscience doth not accuse me that I did speak any thing wherefore I should need to receive the queen's mercy or pardon. For all that ever I did or spake, was both agreeable to God's laws, and the laws of the realm at that present, and did make much to quietness.

Chan. Well, if thou make this babbling rolling in thy eloquent tongue, and yet being altogether ignorant and vain-glorious, and wilt not receive mercy offered to thee, know for truth, that the queen is minded to make a purgation of all such as thou art.

Brad. The Lord before whom I stand, as well as before you, knoweth what vain-glory I have sought, and seek in this behalf: his mercy I desire, and also would be glad of the queen's favour, to live as a subject without a clog of conscience. But otherwise, the Lord's mercy is better to me than life: and I know to whom I have committed my life, even into his hands which will keep it, so that no man may take it away before it be his pleasure. There are twelve hours in the day, and as long as they last, so long shall no man have power thereon. Therefore his good will be done: life in his displeasure is worse than death, and death with his favour is true life.

Chan. I know well enough, that we shall have glorious talk enough of thee; be sure therefore, that as thou hast deceived the people with false and devilish doctrine, so shalt thou receive.

Brad. I have not deceived the people, nor taught any other doctrine than by God's grace I am, and hope shall be, ready to confirm with my life. And as for the devilishness and falseness in the doctrine, I would be sorry you could so prove it.

Durham. Why, tell me, what say you by the ministration of the communion, as now you know it is?

Brad. My lord, here I must desire of your lordship, and of all your honours, a question, before I dare make you an answer to any interrogatory or question wherewith you now begin. I have been six times sworn that I shall in no ease consent to the practising of any jurisdiction, or any authority, on the bishop of Rome's behalf, within this realm of England. Now, before God, I humbly pray your honours to tell me, whether you ask me this question by his authority, or no? If you do, I dare not, nor may answer you any thing in his authority, which you shall demand of me, except I would be forsworn; which God forbid.

Sec. Bourne. Hast thou been sworn six times? what office hast thou borne?

Brad. Forsooth, I was thrice sworn, in Cambridge, when I was admitted master of arts, when I was admitted fellow of Pembroke-hall, and when I was there the visitors came thither and sware the university; again, I was sworn when I entered into the ministry, when I had a prebend given me, and when I was sworn to serve the king a little before his death.

Chan. Tush, Herod's oaths a man should make no conscience at.

Brad. But, my lord, these were no Herod's oath, no unlawful oaths, but oaths according to God's word, as you yourself have well affirmed in your book, De vera obedientia.

Mr. Rochester. My lords (quoth another of the council that stood by the table, Mr. Rochester I ween,) I never knew wherefore this man was in prison before now: but I see well that it had not been good that this man had been abroad: what the cause was that he was put in prison, I know not; but I now well know, that not without a cause he was and is to be kept in prison.

Bourne. Yea, it was reported this parliament time by the earl of Derby, that he hath done more hurt by letters, and exhorting those that have come to him, in religion, than ever he did when he was abroad by preaching. In his letters he enurseth all that teach any false doctrine (for so he calleth that which is not according to that he taught,) and most heartily exhorteth them to whom he writeth, to continue still in that they have received by him, and such like as he is. All which words divers of the council affirmed. Whereunto the said Mr. Bourne added, saying, How say you, sir, have you not thus seditiously written and exhorted the people?

Brad. I have not written nor spoken any thing seditiously, neither, I thank God, have I admitted any seditious cogitation, nor I trust ever shall.

Bourne. Yea, thou hast written letters.

Chan. Why speakest thou not? Hast thou not written as he saith?

Brad. That I have written, I have written.

Southwell. Lord God, what an arrogant and stubborn boy is this, that thus stoutly and dallyingly beavest himself before the queen's council?

Brad. My lords and masters, the Lord God, which is and will be judge to us all, knoweth, that as I am certain I stand now before his Majesty; so with reverence in his sight I stand before you, and unto you accordingly in words and gesture I desire to behave myself. If you otherwise take it, I doubt not but God in his time will reveal it: in the mean season, I shall suffer with all due obedience your sayings and doings too, I hope.

Chan. These be gay and glorious words of reverence; but as in all other things, so herein also thou dost nothing but lie.

Brad. Well, I am willing that God, the author of truth and abhorrer of lies, would pull my tongue out of my head before you all, and shew a terrible judgment on me here present, if I have purposed or do purpose to lie before you, whatsoever you shall ask me.

Chan. Why then dost thou not answer? Hast thou written such letters as here is objected against thee?

Brad. As I said, my lord, that I have written I have written; I stand now before you, which either can lay my letters to my charge, or no; if you lay any thing to my charge that I have written, if I deny it, I am then a liar.

Chan. We shall never have done with thee, I perceive now: be short, be short. Wilt thou have mercy?

Brad. I pray God give me his mercy, and if therewith you will extend yours, I will not refuse it; but otherwise I will none.

Here now was much ado, one speaking this, and another that, of his arrogancy, in refusing the queen's pardon, which she so lovingly did offer unto him; whereto Bradford answered thus:

Brad. My lords, if I may live as a quiet subject without clog of conscience, I shall heartily thank you for your pardon; if otherwise I behave myself, then I am in danger of the law; in the mean season, I ask no more but the benefit of a subject, till I be convinced of transgression. If I cannot have this, as hitherto I have not had, God's good will be done.

Chan. Upon these words my lord chancellor began a long process of the false doctrine wherewith the people were deceived in the days of king Edward, and so turned the end of his talk to Bradford, saying, How savest thou?

Brad. My lord, the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was God's pure religion; the which as I then believed, so do I now more believe it than ever I did, and therein I am more confirmed and ready to declare it, by God's grace, even as he will, to the world, than I was when I first came into prison.

Durham. What religion mean you in king Edward's days? What year of his reign?

Brad. Forsooth, even the same year, my lord, that the king died, and I was a preacher.

Now, after a little pausing, my lord chancellor beginneth again to declare, that the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was heresy, using for demonstration thereof no scripture nor reason, but this, that it ended with treason and rebellion; so that (quoth he) the very end were enough to prove that doctrine to be naught.

Brad. Ah, my lord, that you could enter into God's sanctuary, and mark the end of this present doctrine that you now so magnify!

Chan. What meanest thou by that? I ween we shall have a snatch of rebellion even now.

Brad. My lord, I mean no such end as you would gather; I mean an end which no man seeth, but such as enter into God's sanctuary. If a man look on present things, he will soon deceive himself.

Here now did my lord chancellor offer again mercy; and Bradford answered as before, Mercy with God's mercy should be welcome, but otherwise he would none. Whereupon the lord chancellor did ring a little bell, belike to call in somebody; for there was present none in manner, but only those before named, and the bishop of Worcester. Now when one was come in, It is best (quoth Mr. Sec. Bourne) that you give the keeper a charge of this fellow. So was the under-marshal called in.

Chan. Ye shall take this man to you, and keep him close without conference with any man, but by your knowledge, and suffer him not to write any letters, &c. for he is of another manner of charge unto you now than he was before.—And so they departed, Bradford looking as cheerfully as any man could do, declaring thereby even a desire to give his life for confirmation of that he had taught and written.

The second Examination of John Bradford, in St. Mary Overy's church, before the Lord Chancellor and divers other Bishops, the 29th of January, anno 1555.

After the excommunication of John Rogers, John Bradford was called in, and standing before the lord chancellor, and other bishops set with him, the lord chancellor spake thus in effect: Where before the 22d of January the said Bradford was called before them; and they offered unto him the queen's pardon, although he had contemned the same, and further said that he would stiffly and stoutly maintain and defend the erroneous doctrine taught in the days of king Edward VI. yet in consideration that the queen's highness was wonderful merciful, they thought good eftsoons to offer the same mercy again, before it were too late: therefore advise you well, (said he;) there is yet space and grace before we so proceed that you be committed to the secular power, as we must do, and will do, if you will not recant.

After the lord chancellor's long talk, Bradford began on this sort to speak: My lord, and my lords all, as now I stand in your sight before you, so I humbly beseech your honours to consider, that you sit in the seat of the Lord, who, as David doth witness, is in the congregation of judges, and sitteth in the midst of them judging: and as you would your place to be now of us taken as God's place, so demonstrate yourselves to follow him in your sitting, that is, seek no guiltless blood, nor hunt not by questions to bring into the snare them which are out of the same. At this present I stand before you guilty or guiltless, then proceed and give sentence accordingly: if guiltless, then give me the benefit of a subject, which hitherto I could not have.

Here the lord chancellor replied, and said, that the said Bradford began with a true sentence; but (quoth he) this and all thy gesture declareth but hypocrisy and vain-glory. And further he made much ado to purge himself, that he sought not guiltless blood; and so began a long process, how that Bradford's fact at Paul's cross was presumptuous, arrogant, and declared a taking upon him to lead the people, which could not but turn to much disquietness, in that thou (speaking to Bradford) was so refract and stont in religion at that present; for the which, as thou wast then committed to prison, so hitherto thou hast been kept in prison, where thou hast written letters to no little hurt to the queen's people, as by report of the earl of Derby in the parliament house was credibly declared. And to this he added, that the said Bradford did stubbornly behave himself the last time he was before them; and therefore not for any other thing now I demand of thee (quoth he) but of and for thy doctrine and religion.

Brad. My lord, where you accuse me of hypocrisy and vain-glory, I must and will leave it to the Lord's declaration, which one day will open yours and my truth and hearty meanings. In the mean season, I will content myself with the testimony of mine own conscience, which if it yield to hypocrisy, could not but have God to be my foe also, and so both God and man were against me. And as for my fact at Paul's cross, and behaviour before you at the Tower, I doubt not but God will reveal it to my comfort: for if ever I did thing which God used to public benefit, I think that my deed was one, and yet for it I have been and am kept a long time in prison. And as for letters and religion, I answer as I did the last time I was before you.

Chan. There didst thou say stubbornly and malapertly, that thou wouldest manly maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days.

Brad. My lord, I said, the last time I was before you, that I had six times taken an oath, that I should never consent to the practising of any jurisdiction on the bishop of Rome's behalf; and therefore durst I not answer to any thing that should be demanded so, lest I should be forsworn, which God forbid. Howbeit, saving mine oath, I said that I was more confirmed in the doctrine set forth publicly in the days of king Edward, than ever I was before I was put in prison; and so I thought I should be, and think yet still I shall be, found more ready to give my life as God will for the confirmation of the same.

Chan. I remember well that thou madest much ado about needless matter, as though the oath against the bishop of Rome were so great a matter. So others have done before thee, but yet not in such sort as thou hast done: for thou pretendest a conscience in it, which is nothing else but mere hypocrisy.

Brad. My conscience is known to the Lord, and whether I deal herein hypocritically, or no, he knoweth. As I said therefore then, my lord, so I say again now, That for fear lest I should be perjured, I dare not make answer to any thing you shall demand of me, if my answering should consent to the confirming or practising of any jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome here in England.

L. Chan. Why didst thou begin to tell that we are gods, and sit in God's place, and now wilt thou not make us an answer?

Brad. My lord, I said you would have your place taken of us now as God's place; and therefore I brought forth that piece of scripture, that ye might the more be admonished to follow God and his ways at this present, who seeth us all, and well perceiveth whether of conscience I pretend this matter of the oath, or no.

L. Chan. No, all men may well see thine hypocrisy: for if for thine oath's sake thou didst not answer, then wouldest thou not have spoken as thou didst, and have answered me at the first; but now men will perceive that this is but a starting-hole to hide myself in, because thou darest not answer, and so wouldest escape, blinding the simple people's eyes, as though of conscience you did all you do.

Brad. That which I spake at the first, was not a replication or an answer to that you spake to me; and therefore I needed not to lay for me mine oath. For I thought you would have more weighed what I did speak than you did; but when I perceived you did not consider it, but came to ask matter, whereunto by answering I should consent to the practising of jurisdiction on the bishop of Rome's behalf here in England, and so be forsworn; then of conscience and simplicity I spake, as I do yet again speak, that I dare not for conscience sake answer you. And therefore I seek no starting-holes, nor go about to blind the people, as God knoweth. For if you of your honours shall tell me, that you do not ask me any thing whereby mine answering should consent to the practising of the bishop of Rome's jurisdiction, ask me wherein you will, and you shall hear that I will answer you as flatly as ever any did that came before you. I am not afraid of death, I thank God: for I look, and have looked, for nothing else at your hands for a long time; but I am afraid, when death cometh, I should have matter to trouble my conscience, by the guiltiness of perjury, and therefore do I answer as I do.

L. Chan. These be gay, glorious words, full of hypocrisy and vain-glory; and yet dost thou not know that I sit here as bishop of Winchester in mine own diocese, and therefore may do this which I do, and more too?

Brad. My lord, give me leave to ask you this question, that my conscience may be out of doubt in this matter. Tell me here before God, and this audience being witness, that you demand of me nothing whereby mine answering should consent to and confirm the practise of jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome here in England, and yet your honour shall hear me give you as flat and as plain answers briefly, to whatsoever you shall demand me, as ever any did.

Here the lord chancellor was wonderfully offended, and spake much how the bishop of Rome's authority needed no confirmation of Bradford's answering, nor no such as he was; and turned his talk to the people, how that Bradford followed crafty, covetous merchants, which because they would lend no money to their neighbours when they were in need, would say that they had sworn oft, that they would never lend any more money, because their debtors had so oft deceived them. Even so thou (quoth he to Bradford) dost at this present, to cast a mist in the people's eyes, to blear them with an heresy, (which is greater and more hurtful to the commonwealth than the other is,) pretend thine oath, whereby the people might make a conscience, whereas they should not. Why speakest thou not?

Brad. My lord, as I said, I say again, I dare not answer you for fear of perjury, (from which God defend me,) or else I could tell you that there is a difference between oaths. Some be according to faith and charity, as the oath against the bishop of Rome; some be against faith and charity, as this, to deny by oath my help to my brother in his need.

Here my lord chancellor again was much offended, still saying that Bradford durst not answer, and further made much ado to prove, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was against charity. But Bradford answered, That howsoever his honour took him, yet he was assured of his meaning, that no fear but the fear of perjury made him unwilling to answer. For as for death, my lord, (quoth he,) as I know there are twelve hours in the day, so with the Lord my time is appointed; and when it shall be his good time, then I shall depart hence.—But in the mean season I am safe enough, though all the people had sworn my death. Into his hands have I committed it, and do; his good will be done. And saving mine oath, I will answer you in this behalf, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was not, nor is, against charity.

L. Chan. How prove you that?

Brad. Forsooth, I prove it thus: Arg. Nothing is against charity, which is with God's word, and not against it; the oath against the bishop of Rome's authority in England, is with God's word, and is not against it: Ergo, the oath against the bishop of Rome's authority in England, is not against charity.

L. Chan. Is it against God's word, that a man should take a king to be supreme head of the church in this realm?

Brad. No, saving still mine oath, it is not against God's word, but with it, being taken in such sense as it may well be taken; that is, attributing to the king's power the sovereignty in all his dominion.

L. Chan. I pray you, where find you that?

Brad. I find it in many places, but specially in the 13th to the Romans, where St. Paul writeth, Every soul to be subject to the superior power; but what power? Quæ gladium gestat, The power verily which beareth the sword; which is not the spiritual, but the temporal power. As Chrysostom full well noteth upon the same place, which your honour knoweth better than I. He (Chrysostom I mean) there plainly sheweth that bishops, prophets, and apostles, are obedient to the temporal magistrates.

Here yet more the lord chancellor was stirred, and said, how that Bradford went about to deny all obedience to the queen, for his oath: and so (quoth he) this man would make God's word a warrant of disobedience; for he will answer the queen on this sort, that when she saith, Now swear to the bishop of Rome, or obey his authority:—No, (will he say,) for I should be forsworn; and so he makes the queen no queen.

Brad. No, I go not about to deny all obedience to the queen's highness, but denying obedience in this part, if she should demand it. For I was sworn to king Edward, not simply, that is, not only concerning his own person, but also concerning his successors; and therefore in denying to do the queen's request herein, I deny not her authority, nor become disobedient.

L. Chan. Yes, that thou doest. And so he began to tell a long tale, how if a man should make an oath to pay to me an hundred pounds by such a day, and the man to whom it was due would forget the debt, the debtor should say, No, you cannot do it; for I am forsworn then.

Here Bradford desired my lord chancellor not to trifle, saying, that he wondered his honour would make solemn oaths to God, trifles in that sort; and make so great a matter concerning vows (as they call it) made to the bishop for marriage of priests.

At these words the lord chancellor was much offended, and said he did not trifle. But (quoth he) thou goest about to deny obedience to the queen, which now requireth obedience to the bishop of Rome.

Brad. No, my lord, I do not deny obedience to the queen, if you would discern between genus and species. Because I may not obey in this, ergo, I may not obey in the other, is no good reason. And if a man let or sell a piece of his inheritance, yet, this notwithstanding, all his inheritance is not let or sold: and so in this case, all obedience I deny not, because I deny obedience in this branch.

Chan. I will none of these similitudes.

Brad. I would not use them, if that you went not about to persuade the people that I meant that which I never meant: for I myself not only mean obedience, but will give ensample of all most humble obedience to the queen's highness, so long as she requireth not obedience against God.

Chan. No, no, all men may see your meaning well enough. There is no man, though he be sworn to the king, that doth therefore break his oath, if he afterwards be sworn to the French king, and to the emperor.

Brad. It is true, my lord; but the cases be not alike. For here is an exception: Thou shalt not swear to the bishop of Rome at any time. If we in like manner were sworn, Thou shalt not serve the emperor, &c. you see there were some alteration, and more doubt. But, I beseech your honour, remember what ye yourself have written, answering the objections here against in your book, De vera obedientia. Vincat modo divini verbi veritas, i. e. Let God's word, and the reason thereof, bear the bell away.

Here the lord chancellor was thoroughly moved, and said still, how that Bradford hath written seditious letters, and perverted the people thereby, and did stoutly stand as though he would defend the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's time, against all men; and now (quoth he) he saith he dare not answer.

Brad. I have written no seditious letters, I have not perverted the people; but that which I have written and spoken, that will I never deny, by God's grace. And where your lordship saith, that I dare not answer you: that all men may know that I am not afraid, saving mine oath, ask me what you will, and I will plainly make you answer, by God's grace, although I now see my life lieth thereon. But, O Lord, into thy hands I commit it, come what will; only sanctify thy name in me, as in an instrument of thy grace, Amen. Now ask what you will, and you shall see I am not afraid, by God's grace, flatly to answer.

L. Chan. Well then, how say you to the blessed sacrament? Do you not believe there Christ to be present concerning his natural body?

Brad. My lord, I do not believe that Christ is corporally present at and in the due administration of the sacrament. By this word corporally, I mean that Christ is there present corporally unto faith.

L. Chan. Unto faith! We must have many more words to make it plain.

Brad. You shall so; but first give me leave to speak two words.—L. Chan. Speak on.

Brad. I have been now a year and almost three-quarters in prison, and all this time you never questioned with me hereabout, when I might have spoken my conscience frankly without peril; but now you have a law to hang up and put to death, if a man answer freely, and not to your appetite, and so now you come to demand this question. Ah, my lord, Christ used not this way to bring men to faith; no more did the prophets or apostles. Remember what Bernard writeth to Eugenius, the pope, I read that the apostles stood to be judged, but I read not that they sat to judge. This shall be, that was, &c.

Here the lord chancellor was appalled, as it seemed, and said most gently that he used not this means. It was not my doing, (quoth he,) although some there be that think this to be the best way; for I, for my part, have been challenged for being too gentle oftentimes.—Which thing the bishop of London confirmed, and so did almost all the audience, that he had been ever too mild and too gentle.

At which words Bradford spake thus: My lord, I pray you stretch out your gentleness, that I may feel it, for hitherto I never felt it.

As soon as he had spoken thus, the lord chancellor, thinking that Bradford would have had mercy and pardon, said, that with all his heart not only he, but the queen's highness, would stretch out mercy, if with them he would return.

Brad. Return, my lord! God save me from that going back: I mean it not so, but I mean that I was three-quarters of a year in the Tower; you forbade me paper, pen, and ink, and never in all that time, nor since, did I feel any gentleness from you. I have rather hitherto found, as I looked for, extremity. And I thank God that I perceive now ye have kept me in prison thus long, not for any matter ye had, but for matter ye would have: God's good will be done.

Here now were divers telling my lord it was dinner time: and so he rose up, leaving Bradford speaking, and saying, that in the afternoon they would speak more with him. And so he was had into the vestry, and was there all that day till dark night, and so was conveyed again to prison.

In the mean time, about four of the clock the same afternoon, a gentleman, called Mr. Thomas Hussey, of Lincolnshire, who was once an officer in the duke of Norfolk's house, did come into the vestry to inquire for one Stoning; and when it was answered him by the under marshal's officers of the King's Bench, that there was none such, he entered into the house, and took acquaintance of John Bradford, saying, that he would commune and speak with him the next morning for old acquaintance.

The next morning, about seven o'clock, this gentleman came into the chamber wherein John Bradford did lie, and being with him he began a long oration, how that of love and old acquaintance he came unto him to speak that which he would further utter. You did (said he) so wonderfully behave yourself before the lord chancellor and other bishops yesterday, that even the veriest enemies you have did see that they have no matter against you; and therefore I advise you, (speaking as though it came of his own good will, without making any other man privy, or any other procuring him, as he said,) this day, for anon you shall be called before them again, to desire a time, and men to confer withal; so shall all men think a wonderful wisdom, gravity, and godliness, in you; and by this means you shall escape present danger, which else is nearer than you be aware of. To this John Bradford answered, I neither can nor will make such request: for then shall I give occasion to the people, and to all others, to think that I doubt of the doctrine which I confess: the which thing I do not, for thereof I am most assured, and therefore I will give no such offence.

As they were thus talking, the chamber door was unlocked, and Dr. Seton came in, who when he saw Mr. Hussey, What, sir, (quoth Bradford in his heart to God,) goeth the matter thus! This man told me, no man knew of his coming: Lord, give me grace to remember thy lesson, "Beware of those men, &c. Cast not your pearls before dogs:" For I see these men be come to hunt for matter, that the one may bear witness with the other.

Dr. Seaton, after some by-talk of Bradford's age, of his country, and such like, began a gay and long sermon of my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, and Mr. Ridley, and how they at Oxford were not able to answer any thing at all; and that therefore my lord of Canterbury desired to confer with the bishop of Durham and others; all which talk tended to this end, that John Bradford should make the like suit, being in nothing to be compared in learning to my lord of Canterbury.

To this John Bradford briefly answered as he did before to Mr. Hussey.

With this answer neither the doctor nor gentleman being contented, after many persuasions, Mr. Doctor said, I have heard much good talk of you, and even yesternight a gentleman made report of you at the lord chancellor's table, that ye were able to persuade as much as any that he knew. And I, though I never heard you preach, and to my knowledge did never see you before yesterday, yet methought your modesty was such, your behaviour and talk so without malice and impatience, that I would be sorry you should do worse than myself. And I tell you further, I do perceive my lord chancellor hath a fauour towards you; wherefore be not so obstinate, but desire respite, and some learned man to confer withal, &c.—But John Bradford kept still one answer: I cannot, nor will I so offend the people. I doubt not, but am most certain of the doctrine I have taught.

Here Mr. Doctor waxed hot, and called Bradford arrogant, proud, vain-glorious, and spake like a prelate.

But Bradford answered, Beware of judging, lest you condemn yourself. But still Mr. Dr. Seton urged him, shewing him how merciful my lord chancellor was, and how charitably they entertained him.

I never saw any justice, much less love, I speak for my part, (quoth Bradford,) in my lord chancellor. Long have I been unjustly imprisoned, and handled in the same uncharitably; and now my lord hath no just matter against me.

This talk served not the doctor's purpose: wherefore he went from matter to matter, from this point to that point. Bradford still gave him the hearing, and answered not: for he perceived that they both did come but to fish for some things which might make a shew that my lord chancellor had justly kept him in prison. When all their talk had no such effect as they would or looked for; Mr. Hussey asked Bradford, Will ye not admit conference, if my lord chancellor should offer it publicly?

Brad. Conference, if it had been offered before the law had been made, or if it were offered so that I might be at liberty to confer, and as sure as he with whom I should confer, then it were something: but else I see not to what other purpose conference should be offered, but to defer that which will come at the length, and the lingering may give more offence than do good. Howbeit, if my lord shall make such an offer of his own motion, I will not refuse to confer with whomsoever he shall appoint.

Mr. Doctor hearing this, called Bradford arrogant, proud, and whatsoever it pleased him.

Then Bradford perceiving by them that he should shortly be called for, besought them both to give him leave to talk with God, and to beg wisdom and grace of him: for (quoth he) otherwise I am helpless. And so they with much ado departed. Then Bradford went to God, and made his prayers, which the Lord of his goodness did graciously accept in his need; praised therefore be his holy name.

Shortly after they were gone, Bradford was led to the aforesaid church, and there tarried uncalled for till eleven o'clock, that is, till Mr. Saunders was excommunicated.

The Sum of the last Examination of John Bradford, in the Church of St. Mary Overy's.

After the excommunication of L. Saunders, John Bradford was called in, and being brought in before the lord chancellor and other bishops there sitting, the lord chancellor began to speak thus: That if Bradford, being now soon to come before them, would answer with modesty and humility, and conform himself to the Catholic church with them, he yet might find mercy, because they would be loath to use extremity. Therefore he concluded with an exhortation, that Bradford would recant his doctrine.

After the lord chancellor had ended his long oration, Bradford began to speak thus: As yesterday I besought your honours to set in your sight the majesty and presence of God, who seeketh not to subvert the simple by subtle questions; so I humbly beseech every one of you to do this day: for that you know well enough, that guiltless blood will cry for vengeance. And this I pray not your lordships to do, as one that taketh upon me to condemn you utterly herein, but that ye might be more admonished to do that, which none doth so much as he should do: for our nature is so corrupt, that we are very forgetful of God. Again, as yesterday I pretended mine oath and oaths against the bishop of Rome, that I should never consent to the practising of any jurisdiction for him, or on his behalf, in the realm of England; so do I again at this day, lest I should be perjured. And, last of all, as yesterday the answers I made were by protestation and saving mine oaths; so I would your honours should know that mine answers shall be this day. And this I do, that when death (which I look for at your hands) shall come, I may not be troubled with the guiltiness of perjury.

At which words the lord chancellor was wrath, and said, that he had given him respite to deliberate till this day, whether he would recant his errors of the blessed sacrament, which yesterday (quoth he) before us you uttered.

Brad. My lord, you gave me no time for any such deliberation, neither did I speak any thing of the sacrament which you did disallow. For when I had declared a presence of Christ to be there to faith, you went from that matter to purge yourself that you were not cruel, and so went to dinner.

L. Chan. What! I perceive we must begin all again with thee. Did I not yesterday tell thee plainly, that thou madest a conscience where none should be? Did I not make it plain, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was an unlawful oath?

Brad. No indeed, my lord; you said so, but you proved it not yet, nor even can do.

L. Chan. O Lord God, what a fellow art thou! Thou wouldest go about to bring into the people's heads that we, all the lords of the parliament house, the knights and burgesses, and all the whole realm, be perjured. O what an heretic is this! Here, good people, you may see what a senseless heretic this fellow is. If I should make an oath I would never help my brother, nor lend him money in his need, were this a good answer, to tell my neighbour desiring my help, that I had made an oath to the contrary? or that I could not do it?

Brad. O my lord, discern betwixt oaths that be against charity and faith, and oaths that be according to faith and charity, as this is against the bishop of Rome.

Here the lord chancellor made such ado, and a long time, was spent about oaths, which were good and which were evil, he captiously asking often of Bradford a direct answer concerning oaths; which Bradford would not give simply, but with a distinction. Whereat the chancellor was much offended: but Bradford still kept him at the bay, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was a lawful oath, using thereto the lord chancellor's own book, De vera obedientia, for confirmation.

At length they came to this issue, who should be judge of the lawfulness of the oath? and Bradford said the word of God, according to Christ's word, John xii. My word shall judge; and according to the testimony of Isaiah and Micah, That God's word coming out of Jerusalem shall give sentence among the Gentiles. By this word, (quoth Bradford,) my lord, I will prove the oath against the Bishop of Rome's authority to be a good, a godly, and a lawful oath. So that the lord chancellor left his hold, and as the other day he pretended a denial of the queen's authority and obedience to her highness, so did he now.

But Bradford, as the day before, proved that obedience in this point to the queen's highness, if she should demand an oath to the bishop of Rome, being denied, was not a general denial of her authority, and of obedience to her; no more, quoth he, than the sale, gift, or lease of a piece of a man's inheritance, proveth it a sale, gift, or lease of the whole inheritance. Bradford said, that the queen's highness could do no more but remit her right; as for the oath made to God, she could never remit, forasmuch as it was made unto God.

At which words the lord chancellor chafed wonderfully, and said, that in plain sense I slandered the realm of perjury; and therefore (quoth he to the people) you may see how this fellow taketh upon him to have more knowledge and conscience than all the wise men of England, and yet he hath no conscience at all.

Brad. Well, my lord, let all the standers-by see who hath conscience: I have been a year and a half in prison; now before all this people declare wherefore I was imprisoned, or what cause you had to punish me. You said the other day in your own house, my lord of London witnessing with you, that I took upon me to speak to the people undesired. There he sitteth by you (I mean my lord of Bath) which desired me himself, for the passion of Christ, I would speak to the people. Upon whose words I coming into the pulpit, had like to have been slain with a dagger which was hurled at him, I think, for it touched my sleeve. He then prayed me I would not leave him, and I promised him as long as I lived I would take hurt before him that day: and so went out of the pulpit and entreated with the people, and at length brought him myself into an house. Besides this, in the afternoon I preached at Bow church, and there going up into the pulpit, one willed me not to reprove the people; for, quoth he, you shall never come down alive, if you do it. And yet, notwithstanding, I did in that sermon reprove their fact, and called it sedition at the least twenty times. For all which my doing, I have received this recompence,—prison for a year and a half more, and death now which you go about. Let all men be judges where conscience is.

In speaking of these words, there was endeavour to have letted it; but Bradford still spake on, and gave no place till he had made an end, speak what they would. And then the lord chancellor said, that for all that fair tale, his fact at the cross was naught.

Brad. No, my fact was good, as you yourself did bear witness with me. For when I was at the first before you in the Tower, you yourself did say that my fact was good, but (quoth you) thy mind was evil. Well, quoth I, then, my lord, in that you allow the fact, and condemn my mind; for so much as otherwise I cannot declare my mind to man but by saying and doing, God one day, I trust, will open it to my comfort, what my mind was, and yours is.

Here the lord chancellor was offended, and said that he never said so. I, quoth he, had not so little wit, I trow, as not to discern betwixt meaning and doing; and said, that Bradford was put in prison at the first because he would not yield, nor be conformable to the queen's religion.

Brad. Why, my lord, your honour knoweth that you would not reason with me in religion, but said a time should afterwards be found out when I should be talked withal. But if it were as your lordship saith, that I was put in prison for religion; in that my religion was then authorized by public laws of the realm, could conscience punish me, or cast me in prison therefore? Wherefore let all men be judges in whom conscience wanteth.

Here came forth Mr. Chamberlain, of Woodstock, and spake to my lord chancellor, how that Bradford had been a serving-man, and was with Mr. Harrington.

L. Chan. True, and did deceive his master of seveuseore pounds, and because of this he went to a gospeller and preacher, good people; and yet you see how he pretendeth conscience.

Brad. My lord, I set my foot by his, whosoever he be, that can come forth and justly vouch to my face, that ever I did deceive my master; and as you are chief justice by office in England, I desire justice upon them that so slander me, because they cannot prove it.

Here my lord chancellor and Mr. Chamberlain were smitten blank, and said they heard it. But, quoth my lord chancellor, we have another manner of matter than this against you, for you are an heretic.

Yea, quoth the bishop of London, he did write letters to Mr. Pendleton, which knoweth his hand as well as his own; your honour did see the letters.—Brad. This is not true, I never did write to Pendleton since I came to prison, and therefore I am not justly spoken of.—Lond. Yea, but you indited it.—Brad. I did not, nor know what you mean, and this I offer to prove.

Here came in Mr. Allen, one of the clerks of the council, putting the lord chancellor in remembrance of letters written into Lancashire.

L. Chan. You say true: for we have his hand to shew.

Brad. I deny that you have my hand to shew of letters sent into Lancashire, otherwise than before you all I will stand to, and prove them to be good and lawful.

Here was all answered, and then the lord chancellor began a new matter: Sir, (quoth he,) in my house the other day you did most contemptuously condemn the queen's mercy, and further said, that you would maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days against all men; and this you do most stoutly.

Brad. Well, I am glad that all men see now you have had no matter to imprison me before that day justly. Now say I, that I did not contemptuously condemn the queen's mercy, but would have had it, (though if justice might take place I need it not) so that I might have had it with God's mercy, that is, without doing or saying any thing against God and his truth. And as for maintenance of doctrine, because I cannot tell how you will stretch this word maintenance, I will repeat again that which I spake. I said I was more confirmed in the religion set forth in king Edward's days than ever I was: and if God so would, I trust I should declare it by giving my life for the confirmation and testifi-eration thereof; so I said then, and so I say now. As for otherwise to maintain it, than pertaining to a private person by confession, I thought not, nor think not.

L. Chan. Well, yesterday thou didst maintain false heresy concerning the blessed sacrament, and therefore we gave thee respite till this day to deliberate.

Brad. My lord, as I said at the first, I spake nothing of the sacrament but that which you allowed, and therefore reproved it not, nor gave me any thing to deliberate.

L. Chan. Why, didst thou not deny Christ's presence in the sacrament?

Brad. No, I never denied nor taught, but that to faith whole Christ, body and blood, was as present at the bread and wine to the due receiver.

L. Chan. Yea, but dost thou not believe that Christ's body naturally and really is there, under the forms of bread and wine?

Brad. My lord, I believe Christ is present there to the faith of the due receiver: as for transubstantiation, I plainly and flatly tell you, I believe it not.

Here was Bradford called Diabolus, a slanderer: For we ask no question (quoth my lord chancellor) of transubstantiation, but of Christ's presence.

Brad. I deny not his presence to the faith of the receiver, but deny that he is included in the bread, or that the bread was transubstantiated.

B. Worces. If he be not included, how is he then present?

Brad. Forsooth, though my faith can tell how, yet my tongue cannot express it, nor you otherwise than by faith hear it, or understand it.

Here was much ado, now one doctore standing up and speaking thus, and others speaking that, and the lord chancellor talking much of Luther, Zuinglius, and Oecolampadius; but still Bradford kept him at that point, that Christ is present to faith, and that there is no transubstantiation nor including of Christ in the bread; but all this would not serve them.

Therefore another bishop asked this question, Whether the wicked man received Christ's very body, or no? And Bradford answered plainly, No. Whereat the lord chancellor made a long oration, how that it could not be that Christ was present, except that the evil man received it. But Bradford put away all his oration in few words, that grace was at that time offered to his lordship, although he received it not: so that (quoth he) the receiving maketh not the presence, as your lordship would infer; but God's grace, truth, and power, is the cause of the presence, which grace the wicked that lack faith cannot receive. And here Bradford prayed my lord not to divorce that which God had coupled together. He hath coupled all these together, "Take, eat, this is my body:" he saith not, See, peep, this is my body; but, "Take, eat." So that it appeareth this is a promise depending upon condition, If we take and eat.

Here the lord chancellor and other bishops made a great ado, that Bradford had found out a toy that no man else ever did, of the condition, and the lord chancellor made many words to the people thereabout.

But Bradford said thus, My lord, are not these words, "Take, eat," a commandment? and are not these words, "This is my body," a promise? If you will challenge the promise, and do not the commandment, may you not deceive yourself?

L. Chan. Here the lord chancellor denied Christ to have commanded the sacrament, and the use of it.

Brad. Why, my lord, I pray you tell the people what mood Accipite, Manducate, is; is it not plain to children, that Christ, in so saying, commandeth?

At these words the lord chancellor made a great toying and trifling at the imperative mood, and fell to parsing or examining, as he should teach a child, and so concluded that it was no commandment, but such a phrase as this, "I pray you give me drink;" which (quoth he) is no commandment, I trow.

But Bradford prayed him to leave toying and trifling, and said thus, My lord, if it be not a commandment of Christ to take and eat the sacrament, why dare any take upon them to command and make that of necessity, which God leaveth free, as you do in making it a necessary commandment once a year, for all that be of discretion, to receive the sacrament?

Here the lord chancellor called him again Diabolus, or calumniator, and began out of these words, "Let a man prove himself, and so eat of the bread (yea, bread, quoth Bradford,) and drink of the cup," to prove that it was no commandment to receive the sacrament; for then, (quoth he,) if it were a commandment, it should bind all men in all places, and at all times.

Brad. O my lord, discern between commandments: some be general, as the Ten Commandments, that they bind always, in all places, and all persons; some be not so general, as this of the supper, the sacrament of baptism, of the thrice appearing before the Lord yearly at Jerusalem, of Abraham offering of Isaac, &c.

Here my lord chancellor denied the cup to be commanded of Christ: for then (quoth he) we should have eleven commandments.

Brad. Indeed, I think you think as you speak; for else would you not take the cup from the people, in that Christ saith, "Drink ye all of it." But how say you, my lords? Christ saith to you bishops especially, Itē, predicate evangelium: "Go, and preach the gospel: Feed Christ's flock," &c. Is this a commandment, or no?

Here was my lord chancellor in a chafe, and said as pleased him.

The bishop of Durham asked Bradford, when Christ began to be present in the sacrament? whether before the receiver received it, or no?

Bradford answered, that the question was curious, and not necessary; and further said, that as the cup was the new testament, so the bread was Christ's body to him that received it duly, but yet so that the bread is bread. For, (quoth he,) in all the scripture ye shall not find this proposition, Non est panis, "There is no bread." Much ado was hereabouts, the calling Bradford heretic, and he desiring them to proceed on in God's name, he looked for that which God appointed for them to do.

L. Chan. This fellow is now in another heresy of fatal necessity, as though all things were so tied together, that of mere necessity all must come to pass.

But Bradford prayed him to take things as they be spoken, and not wrest them into a contrary sense. Your lordship, quoth he, doth discern betwixt God and man. Things are not by fortune to God at any time, though to man they seem so sometimes. I speak but as the apostle said, Lord, quoth he, see how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the prelates, are gathered together against thy Christ, to do that which thy hand and counsel hath before ordained for them to do.

Here began the lord chancellor to read the excommunication. And in the excommunication, when he came to the name of John Bradford, laicus, layman; Why, quoth he, art thou no priest?

Leaf. No, nor never was, either priest, either beneficed, either married, either any preacher, afore public authority had established religion, or preacher after public authority had altered religion, and yet I am thus handled at your hand: but God, I doubt not, will give his blessing where you curse. And so he fell down on his knees, and heartily thanked God that he counted him worthy to suffer for his name's sake. And so praying God to give him repentance and a good mind, after the excommunication was read, he was delivered to the sheriff of London, and so had to the Clink, and afterwards to the Compter in the Poultry, in the same city of London, this being purposed of his murderers, that he should be delivered from thence to the earl of Derby, to be conveyed into Lancashire, and there to be burned in the town of Manchester, where he was born. But their purpose concerning the place was afterwards altered: for they burned him in London.

After the condemnation of Mr. Bradford, which was the last day of January, Mr. Bradford being sent into prison, did there remain until the first day of July, during all which time divers other conferences and conflicts he sustained with sundry adversaries, which repaired unto him in the prison.

Thus still in prison continued Bradford, until the month of July, in such labours and sufferings as he before always had sustained in prison. But when the time of his determined death was come, he was suddenly conveyed out of the Compter, where he was prisoner, in the night season, to Newgate, as is before declared, and from thence he was carried the next morning to Smithfield; where he constantly abiding in the same truth of God which before he had confessed, earnestly exhorting the people to repent and to return to Christ, and sweetly comforting the godly young man of nineteen or twenty years old, who was burned with him, cheerfully he ended his painful life, to live with Christ.

JOHN LEAF, burnt with BRADFORD.

With Mr. Bradford was burnt one John Leaf, an apprentice to Humphrey Gawdy, tallow-chandler, of the parish of Christ church, in London, of the age of nineteen years and above, born at Kirkby Moorside, in the county of York; who upon the Friday next before Palm-Sunday, was committed to the Compter in Bread-street, by an alderman of London, who had rule and charge of that ward, or part of the city, where the said Leaf did dwell.—After, he coming to examination before Bonner, gave a firm and christian testimony of his doctrine and profession, answering to such articles as were objected to him by the said bishop.

First, as touching his belief and faith in the said sacrament of the altar, he answered, that after the words of consecration, spoken by the priest over the bread and wine, there was not the very true and natural body and blood of Christ in substance; and further did hold and believe, that the said sacrament of the altar, as it is used in this realm of England, is idolatrous and abominable.

It is reported of the said John Leaf, by one that was in the Compter the same time, and saw the thing, that after his examinations before the bishop, when two bills were sent unto him in the compter in Bread-street, the one containing a recantation, the other his confessions, to know to which of them he would put his hand, first hearing the bill of recantation read unto him, (because he could not read nor write himself,) that he refused. And when the other was read unto him, which he well liked of, instead of a pen he took a pin, and so pricked his hand, sprinkled the blood upon the said bill, willing the reader thereof to shew the bishop, that he had sealed the same bill with his blood already.

The Behaviour of Mr. Bradford, preacher, and a young man that suffered with him in Smithfield, named John Leaf, an Apprentice, who suffered for the testimony of Christ.

First, when they came to the stake in Smithfield to be burned, Mr. Bradford lying prostrate on the one side of the stake, and the young man, John Leaf, on the other side, prayed to themselves the space of a minute. Then one of the sheriffs said to Mr. Bradford, Arise and make an end: for the press of the people is great.

At that word they both stood upon their feet, and then Mr. Bradford took a faggot in his hand and kissed it, and so likewise the stake. And when he had so done, he desired of the sheriffs, that his servant might have his raiment. For, said he, I have nothing else to give him: and besides that, he is a poor man. And the sheriff said he should have it. And so forthwith Mr. Bradford did put off his raiment, and went to the stake; and holding up his hands, and easting his countenance to heaven, he said thus, O England, England, repent thee of thy sins! repent thee of thy sins! Beware of idolatry, beware of Antichrists, take heed they do not deceive you.

As he was speaking these words the sheriff bid tie his hands, if he would not be quiet. O master sheriff, said Mr. Bradford, I am quiet. God forgive you this, master sheriff. And one of the officers which made the fire, hearing Mr. Bradford so speaking to the sheriff, said, If you have no better learning than that, you are but a fool, and were best hold your peace. To which words Mr. Bradford gave no answer; but asked all the world forgiveness, and forgave all the world, and prayed the people to pray for him, and turned his head unto the young man that suffered with him, and said, Be of good comfort, brother; for we shall have a merry supper with the Lord this night. And so spake no more words that any man did hear, but embracing the reeds said thus, Strait is the way, and narrow is the gate, that leadeth to eternal salvation, and few there be that find it.

And thus they both ended their mortal lives, most like two lambs, without any alteration of their countenance, being void of all fear, hoping to obtain the prize of the race that they had long run at; to which I beseech Almighty God happily to conduct us, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

Touching Mr. Woodrofe, the sheriff, mention is made a little before how churlishly here he answered Mr. Bradford at the stake, not suffering him to speak, but commanding his hands to be tied, &c. The like extremity, or worse, he used also before to Mr. Rogers, whereof ye have heard before.

The said Woodrofe, sheriff, was joined in office with another called sir William Chester, for the year 1555. Between these two sheriffs such difference there was of judgment and religion, that the one (that is Mr. Woodrofe) was wont commonly to laugh, but the other to shed tears, at the death of Christ's people. And whereas the other was wont to restrain and to beat the people, which were desirous to take them by the hands that should be burned, the other sheriff contrariwise with much sorrow and mildness behaved himself.

Furthermore, here by the way to note the severe punishment of God's hand against the said Woodrofe, as against all such cruel persecutors: so it happened, that within half a year after the burning of this blessed martyr, the said sheriff was so stricken on the right side with such a palsy, or stroke of God's hand, whatsoever it was, that for the space of eight years after, till his dying day, he was not able to turn himself in his bed, but as two men with a sheet were fain to stir him; and withal such an insatiable devouring came upon him, that it was monstrous to see. And thus continued he the space of eight years together.

HERE FOLLOW THE LETTERS OF MR. BRADFORD.

And first, forsomuch as ye heard in the story before, how the earl of Derby complained in the parliament house of certain letters written by John Bradford out of prison, to Lancashire, and also he was charged both of the bishop of Winchester, and of Mr. Allen, with some letters; to the intent the reader more perfectly may understand what letters they were, (being written indeed to his mother, brethren, and sisters, out of the Tower, before his condemnation,) we will begin first with the same: the copy, with the contents whereof, is thus as followeth:

A comfortable Letter of Mr. Bradford to his Mother, a godly matron, dwelling in Manchester, and to his Brethren and Sisters, and other of his Friends there.

“Our dear and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, whose prisoner at this present (praised be his name) I am, preserve and keep you, my good mother, with my brothers and sisters, my father, John Traves, Thomas Sorroold, Laurence and James Bradshaw, with their wives and families, &c. now and for ever, Amen.

“I am at this present in prison, sure enough for starting, to confirm that I have preached unto you; as I am ready, I thank God, with my life and blood to seal the same, if God vouchsafe me worthy of that honour. For, good mother and brethren, it is a most special benefit of God to suffer for his name's sake and gospel, as now I do: I heartily thank God for it, and am sure that with him I shall be partaker of his glory, as Paul saith, ‘If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him.’ Therefore be not faint-hearted, but rather rejoice, at the least for my sake, which now am in the right and high way to heaven, for by many afflictions we must enter into the kingdom of heaven. Now will God make known his children. When the wind doth not blow, then cannot a man know the wheat from the chaff; but when the blast cometh, then flieth away the chaff, but the wheat remaineth, and is so far from being hurt, that by the wind it is more cleansed from the chaff, and known to be wheat. Gold, when it is cast into the fire, is the more precious; so are God's children by the cross of affliction. Always God beginneth his judgment at his house. Christ and the apostles were in most misery in the land of Jewry, but yet the whole land smarted for it after: so now God's children are first chastised in this world, that they should not be damned with the world; for surely great plagues of God hang over this realm.

“Ye all know there was never more knowledge of God, and less godly living and true serving of God. It was counted a foolish thing to serve God truly, and earnest prayer was not past upon. Preaching was but a pastime. The communion was counted too common. Fasting to subdue the flesh, was far out of use. Alms was almost nothing. Malice, covetousness, and uncleanness, were common every where, with swearing, drunkenness, and idleness. God, therefore, now is come, and you have heard me preach, and because he will not damn us with the world, he beginneth to punish us for carnal living. For, as for my preaching, I am most certain it is and was God's truth, and I trust to give my life for it by God's grace. And indeed I thank him more of this prison than of any parlour, yea, than of any pleasure that ever I had: for in it I find God my most sweet God always. The flesh is punished, first to admonish us now heartily to live as we profess; secondly, to certify the wicked of their just damnation, if they repent not.

“Perchance you are weakened in that which I have preached, because God doth not defend it, as you think, but suffereth the popish doctrine to come again and prevail: but you must know, good mother, that God by this doth prove and try his children and people, whether they will unfeignedly and simply hang on him and his word. So did he with the Israelites, bringing them into a desert, after their coming out of Egypt, where (I mean the wilderness) was want of all things, in comparison of that which they had in Egypt. Christ, when he came into this world, brought no worldly wealth nor quietness with him, but rather war: ‘The world (saith he) shall rejoice, but ye shall mourn and weep; but your weeping shall be turned into joy. And therefore happy are they that mourn and weep, for they shall be comforted.’ They are marked then with God's mark in their foreheads, and not with the Beast's mark, I mean the pope's shaven crown, who now with his shavelings rejoice. But wo unto them: for they shall be cast down, they shall weep and mourn. The rich glutton had here his joy, and Lazarus sorrow, but afterwards the time was changed. The end of carnal joy is sorrow. Now let the whoremonger joy, with the drunkard, swearer, covetous, malicious, and blind: for the mass will not bite them, neither make them to blush, as preaching would. Now may they do what they will, come devils to the church, and go devils home: for no man must find fault. And they are glad of this; now they have their hearts' desire, as the Sodomites had when Lot was gone: but what followed? Forsooth, when they cried ‘Peace, all shall be well,’ then came God's vengeance, fire and brimstone from heaven, and burnt up every mother's child: even so, dear mother, will it do to our Papists.

“Wherefore fear God: stick to his word, though all the world swerve from it. Die you must once, and when or how you cannot tell. Die therefore with Christ, suffer for serving him truly and after his word: for sure may we be, that of all deaths it is most to be desired to die for God's sake. This is the most safe kind of dying; we cannot doubt but that we shall go to heaven, if we die for his name's sake. And that you shall die for his name's sake, God's word will warrant you, if you stick to that which God by me hath taught you. You shall see that I speak as I think; for by God's grace I will drink before you of this cup, if I be put to it. I am at a point, even when my Lord God will, to come to him. Death nor life, prison nor pleasure, I trust in God, shall be able to separate me from my Lord God and his gospel. In peace, when no persecution was, then were you content and glad to hear me, then did you believe me; and will ye not do so now, seeing I speak that which I trust, by God's grace, if need be, to verify with my life? Good mother, I write before God to you, as I have preached before him.

“It is God's truth I have taught: it is that same infallible word whereof he said, ‘Heaven and earth shall pass, but my word shall not pass.’ The mass, and such baggage as the false worshippers of God and the enemies of Christ's cross (the Papists I say) have brought in again to poison the church of God withal, displeaseth God highly, and is abominable in his sight. Happy may he be which of conscience suffereth loss of life or goods in disallowing it. Come not at it. If God be God, follow him: if the mass be God, let them that will see it, hear or be present at it, and go to the devil with it. What is there as God ordained? His supper was ordained to be received of us in the memorial of his death, for the confirmation of our faith, and his body was broken for us, and his blood shed for pardon of our sins; but in the mass there is no receiving, but the priest keepeth all to himself alone. Christ saith, 'Take, eat.' No, saith the priest; Gape, peep. There is a sacrificing, yea, killing of Christ again as much as they may. There is idolatry, in worshipping the outward sign of bread and wine; there is all in Latin, you cannot tell what he saith. To conclude, there is nothing as God ordained. Wherefore, my good mother, come not at it.

"O, will some say, it will hinder you, if you refuse to come to mass, and to do as others do. But God will further you, be you assured, as you shall one day find; who hath promised to them that suffer hinderance or loss of any thing in this world, his great blessing here, and in the world to come life everlasting.

"You shall be counted an heretic: but not of others than of heretics, whose praise is a dispraise.

"You are not able to reason against the priests: but God will, that all they shall not be able to withstand you. Nobody will do so, but you only. Indeed, no matter, for few enter into the narrow gate which bringeth to salvation. Howbeit, you shall have with you, I doubt not, father Traves, and other my brothers and sisters, to go with you therein: but if they will not, I your son in God, I trust, shall not leave you an inch, but go before you: pray that I may, and give thanks for me. Rejoice in my suffering, for it is for your sakes, to confirm the truth I have taught. Howsoever you do, beware this letter come not abroad, but into father Traves' hands: for if it should be known that I have pen and ink in the prison, then would it be worse with me. Therefore to yourselves keep this letter, commending me to God and his mercy in Christ Jesus, who make me worthy for his name's sake to give my life for his gospel and church sake. Out of the Tower of London, the 6th day of October, 1555.

"My name I write not for causes; you know it well enough. Like the letter never the worse. Commend me to all our good brethren and sisters in the Lord. Howsoever you do, be obedient to the higher powers, that is, in no point either in hand or tongue rebel, but rather if they command that which with good conscience you cannot obey, lay your head on the block, and suffer whatsoever they shall do or say. By patience possess your souls."

After the time that Mr. Bradford was condemned, and sent to the Compter, it was purposed of his adversaries, as ye heard before, that he should be had to Manchester, where he was born, and there be burned. Whereupon he writeth to the city of London, thinking to take his last 'vale' of them in this letter.

To the City of London.

"To all that profess the gospel and true doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in the city of London, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now not only in prison, but also excommunicated and condemned to be burned for the same true doctrine, wisheth mercy, grace, and peace, with increase of all godly knowledge and piety from God the father of mercy, through the merits of our alone and omnisufficient Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the operation of the holy Spirit, for ever, Amen.

"My dearly beloved brethren in our Saviour Christ, although the time I have to live is very little, (for hourly I look when I should be had hence to be conveyed into Lancashire, there to be burned, and to render my life by the providence of God, where first I received it by the same providence,) and although the charge is great to keep me from all things whereby I might signify any thing to the world of my state; yet having, as now I have, pen and ink, through God's working, maugre the head of Satan and his soldiers, I thought good to write a short confession of my faith, and thereto adjoin a little exhortation unto you all, to live according to your profession.

"First, for my faith I do confess and pray all the whole congregation of Christ to bear witness with me of the same, that I believe constantly, through the gift and goodness of God, all the twelve articles of the Creed, commonly attributed to the apostles. This my faith I would gladly particularly declare and expound, to the confirmation and comfort of the simple; but, alas! by starts and stealth I write in manner that I do, and therefore I shall desire you all to take this brevity in good part. And this faith I hold, not because of the Creed itself, but because of the word of God, the which teacheth and confirmeth every article accordingly. This word of God, written by the prophets and apostles, contained in the canonical books of the whole Bible, I do believe to contain plentifully all things necessary to salvation, so that nothing (as necessary to salvation) ought to be added thereto; and therefore the church of Christ, nor none of his congregation, ought to be burdened with any other doctrine than hath its foundation and ground in the scriptures. In the testimony of this faith, I render and give my life, being condemned as well for not acknowledging the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar-general and supreme head of his Catholic and Universal Church, here or elsewhere upon earth, as for denying the horrible and idolatrous doctrine of transubstantiation, &c.

"To believe Christ our Saviour to be the Head of his Church, and kings in their realms to be the supreme powers, to whom every soul oweth obedience, and to believe that in the supper of Christ is a true presence of whole Christ, God and Man, to the faith of the receiver, but not to the stander by and looker upon, as it is the true presence of bread and wine to the senses of men: to believe this, I say, will not serve, and therefore as an heretic I am condemned, and shall be burned; whereof I ask God heartily mercy that I do no more rejoice than I do, having so great cause as to be an instrument wherein it may please my dear Lord God and Saviour to suffer.

"For albeit my manifold sins, even since I came into prison, have deserved at the hands of God, not only this temporal, but also eternal fire in hell, much more then my former sinful life; which the Lord pardon for his Christ's sake, as I know he of his mercy hath done, and never will lay mine iniquities to my charge, to condemnation, so great is his goodness, (praised therefore be his holy name,) although, say I, my manifold and grievous sins have deserved most justly all the tyranny that man or devil can do unto me; and therefore I confess that the Lord is just, and that his judgments be true and deserved on my behalf: yet the bishops and prelates do not persecute them in me, but Christ himself, his word, his truth, and religion. And therefore I have great cause, yea, most great cause, to rejoice that ever I was born, and hitherto kept of the Lord; that by my death, which is deserved for my sins, it pleaseth the heavenly Father to glorify his name, testify his truth, to confirm his verity, to repugn his adversaries. O good God, and merciful Father, forgive my great unthankfulness, especially herein.

"And you, my dearly beloved, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, I humbly and heartily in his bowels and blood do now, for my last farewell in this present life, beseech you, and every of you, that you will consider this work of the Lord accordingly. First, by me be admonished to beware of hypocrisy and carnal security; profess not the gospel with tongue and lips only, but in heart and verity; frame and fashion your lives accordingly; beware God's name be not evil spoken of, and the gospel less regarded, by your conversation. God forgive me that I have not so heartily professed it as I should have done, but have sought much myself therein. The gospel is a new doctrine to the old man; it is new wine, and therefore cannot be put in old bottles, without more hurt than good to the bottles. If we will talk with the Lord, we must put off our shoes and carnal affections; if we will hear the voice of the Lord, we must wash our garments, and be holy; if we will be Christ's disciples, we must deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow Christ; we cannot serve two masters. If we seek Christ's kingdom, we must seek for the righteousness thereof. To this petition, Let thy kingdom come, we must join, Thy will be done, done on earth as it is in heaven. If we will not be doers of the word, but hearers of it only, we deceive ourselves. If we hear the gospel, and love it not, we declare ourselves to be but fools, and builders upon the sand. The Lord's Spirit hateth feigning; deceitfulness the Lord abhorreth: if we come to him, we must beware that we come not with a double heart; for then may chance that God will answer us according to the block which is in our hearts, and so we shall deceive ourselves and others.

"To faith see that we couple a good conscience, lest we make a shipwreck. To the Lord we must come with fear and reverence. If we will be gospellers, we must be Christ's; if we be Christ's, we must crucify our flesh with the lusts and concupiscences thereof; if we will be under grace, sin must not bear rule in us. We may not come to the Lord, and draw nigh to him with our lips, and leave our hearts elsewhere, lest the Lord's wrath wax hot, and he take from us the good remaining. In no case can the kingdom of Christ approach to them that repent not. Therefore, my dearly beloved, let us repent and be heartily sorry that we have so carnally, so hypocritically, so covetously, so vain-gloriously, professed the gospel. Let the anger and plagues of God, most justly fallen upon us, be applied to every one of our deserts, that from the bottom of our hearts every of us may say, It is I, Lord, that have sinned against thee; it is my hypocrisy, my vain-glory, my covetousness, uncleanness, carnality, security, idleness, unthankfulness, self-love, and such like, which have deserved the taking away of our good king, of thy word and true religion, of thy good ministers by exile, imprisonment, and death; it is my wickedness that causeth success and increase of authority and peace to thine enemies. O be merciful, be merciful unto us. Turn to us again, O Lord of Hosts, and turn us unto thee; correct us, but not in thy fury, lest we be consumed in thine anger; chastise us not in thy wrathful displeasure; reprove us not, but in the midst of thine anger remember thy mercy. For if thou mark what is done amiss, who shall be able to abide it? But with thee is mercifulness, that thou mightest be worshipped. O then be merciful unto us, that we might truly worship thee. Help us, for the glory of thy name: be merciful unto our sins, for they are great; O heal us, and help us for thine honour. Let not the wicked people say, Where is their God? &c.

"On this sort, my right dearly beloved, let us heartily bewail our sins, repent us of our former evil life, heartily and earnestly purpose to amend our lives in all things, continually watch in prayer, diligently and reverently attend, hear, and read the holy scriptures, labour after our vocation to amend our brethren. Let us reprove the works of darkness. Let us fly from all idolatry. Let us abhor the Antichristian and Romish rotten service, detest the popish mass, abrenounce their Romish god, prepare ourselves to the cross, be obedient to all that are in authority, in all things that be not against God and his word; for then answer with the apostles, It is more meet to obey God than man. Howbeit, never for any thing resist, or rise against the magistrates. Avenge not yourselves, but commit your cause to the Lord, to whom vengeance pertaineth, and he in his time will reward it. If you feel in yourselves an hope and trust in God, that he will never tempt you above that he will make you able to bear; be assured the Lord will be true to you, and you shall be able to bear all brunts. But if you want this hope, fly and get you hence, rather than by your tarrying, God's name should be dishonoured.

"In sum, cast your care on the Lord, knowing for most certain that he is careful for you; with him all the hairs of your head are numbered, so that not one of them shall perish without his good pleasure and will: much more, then, nothing shall happen to our bodies which shall not be profitable, howsoever for a time it seem otherwise to your senses. Hang on the providence of God, not only when you have means to help you, but also when you have no means, yea, and when all means be against you. Give him this honour, which of all other things he most chiefly requirerth at your hands; namely, believe that you are his children through Christ, that he is your Father and God through him, that he loveth you, pardoneth you all your offences, that he is with you in trouble, and will be with you for ever. When you fall, he will put under his hand, you shall not lie still: before you call upon him he heareth you, out of the evil he will finally bring you, and deliver you to his eternal joy. Doubt not, my dearly beloved, herein doubt not, I say, this will God your Father do for you, not in respect of yourselves, but in respect of Christ your Captain, your Pastor, your Keeper, out of whose hands none shall be able to catch you; in him be quiet, and often consider your dignity, namely, how that ye be God's children, the saints of God, citizens of heaven, temples of the Holy Ghost, the thrones of God, members of Christ, and lords over all.

"Therefore be ashamed to think, speak, or do any thing that should be unseemly for God's children, God's saints, Christ's members, &c. Marvel not though the devil and the world hate you, though ye be persecuted here; for the servant is not above his master. Covet not earthly riches, fear not the power of man, love not this world, nor things that be in this world; but long for the Lord Jesus's coming, at which time your bodies shall be made like unto his glorious body; when he appeareth you shall be like unto him; when your life shall thus be revealed, then shall ye appear with him in glory.

"In the mean season, live in hope thereof. Let the life you lead be in the faith of the Son of God; for the just doth live by faith: which faith flieth from all evil, and followeth the word of God, as a lantern to her feet and a light to her steps; her eyes be above where Christ is, she beholdeth not the things present, but rather things to come; she glorieth in affliction, she knoweth that the afflictions of this life are not like to be compared to the glory which God will reveal to us and in us. Of this glory God grant us here a lively taste; then shall we run after the scent it sendeth forth. It will make us valiant men to take to us the kingdom of God: whither the Lord of mercy bring us in his good time, through Christ our Lord. To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

"My dearly beloved, I would gladly have given here my body to have been burned for the confirmation of the true doctrine I have taught here unto you. But that my country must have. Therefore I pray you take in good part this signification of my good-will towards every of you. Impute the want herein to time and trouble. Pardon me mine offensive and negligent behaviour when I was amongst you. With me repent, and labour to amend. Continue in the truth which I have truly taught unto you by preaching in all places where I have come; God's name therefore be praised. Confess Christ when you be called, whatsoever cometh thereof, and the God of peace be with us all, Amen.—This 11th day of February, 1555.

"Your brother in bonds for the Lord's sake,
"JOHN BRADFORD."

To the University and Town of Cambridge.

"To all that love the Lord Jesus and his true doctrine, being in the university and town of Cambridge, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, (now not only imprisoned, but also condemned for the same true doctrine,) wisheth grace, peace, and mercy, with increase of all godliness, from God the Father of all mercy, through the bloody passion of our Saviour Jesus Christ, by the lively working of the holy Spirit for ever, Amen.

"Although I look hourly when I should be had to the stake, my right dearly beloved in the Lord, and although the charge over me is great and strait, yet having by the providence of God secretly pen and ink, I could not but something signify unto you my solicitude which I have for you, and every of you, in the Lord, though not as I would, yet as I may. You have often and openly heard the truth, especially in this matter wherein I am condemned, disputed and preached, that it is needless to do any more, but only to put you in remembrance of the same. But hitherto have you not heard it confirmed, and as it were sealed up, as now you do and shall hear by me, that is, by my death and burning. For albeit I have deserved eternal death and hell-fire, much more than this affliction and fire prepared for me; yet, my dearly beloved, it is not these, or any of these things, wherefore the prelates do prosecute me, but God's verity and truth; yea, even Christ himself is the only cause and thing wherefore I am now condemned, and shall be burned as an heretic, because I will not grant the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar-general, and supreme head of his church here and every where upon earth, by God's ordinance, and because I will not grant such corporal, real, and carnal presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament, as doth transubstantiate the substance of bread and wine, and is received of the wicked, yea, of dogs and mice. Also I am excommunicated, and counted as a dead member of Christ's church, as a rotten branch, and therefore shall be cast into the fire.

"Therefore ye ought heartily to rejoice with me, and to give thanks for me, that God the eternal Father hath vouchsafed our mother to bring up any child in whom it would please him to magnify his holy name as he doth, and I hope for his mercy and truth's sake will do in me, and by me. O, what such benefit upon earth can it be, as that I, which deserved death by reason of my sins, should be delivered to a demonstration, a testification, and confirmation, of God's verity and truth! Thou my mother, the university, hast not only had the truth of God's word plainly manifested unto thee by reading, disputing, and preaching, publicly and privately; but now to make thee altogether excuseless, and as it were almost to sin against the Holy Ghost, if thou put to thy helping hand with the Romish rout to suppress the verity, and set out the contrary, thou hast my life and blood as a seal to confirm thee, if thou wilt be confirmed, or else to confound thee, and bear witness against thee, if thou wilt take part with the prelates and clergy, which now fill up the measure of their fathers which slew the prophets and apostles, that all the righteous blood from Abel to Bradford, shed upon the earth, may be required at their hands.

"Of this therefore I thought good before my death, as time and liberty would suffer me, to admonish thee, good mother, and my sister the town, that you would call to mind from whence you are fallen, and study to do the first works. You know, if you-will, these matters of the Romish supremacy and the Antichristian transubstantiation, whereby Christ's supper is overthrown, his priesthood evacuate, his sacrifice frustrate, the ministry of his word unplaced, repentance repelled, faith fainted, godliness extinguished, the mass maintained, idolatry supported, and all impiety cherished; you know, I say, if you will, that these opinions are not only besides God's word, but even directly against it, and therefore to take part with them, is to take part against God, against whom you cannot prevail.

"Therefore, for the tender mercy of Christ, in his bowels and blood I beseech you to take Christ's eye-salve to anoint your eyes, that you may see what you do and have done in admitting (as I hear you have admitted, yea, alas! authorized, and by consent confirmed) the Romish rotten rags, which once you utterly expelled. O be not Canis reversus ad vomitum, (the dog returned to his own vomit;) be not Sus lota reversa ad volutabrum cœni, (the sow that was washed returned to her wallowing in the mire, 2 Peter ii.) Beware lest that Satan enter in with seven other spirits, and the last end shall be worse than the first. It had been better ye had never known the truth, than, after knowledge, to run from it. Ah, wo to this world and the things therein, which hath now so wrought with you. O that ever this dirt of the devil should daub up the eye of the realm: for thou, O mother, art as the eye of the realm. If thou be light, and give shine, all the body shall fare the better: but if thou the light be darkness, alas, how great will the darkness be! What is man, whose breath is in his nostrils, that thou shouldst thus be afraid of him!

"O what are honour and life here? bubbles. What is glory in this world, but shame? Why art thou afraid to carry Christ's cross? Wilt thou come into his kingdom, and not drink of his cup? Dost thou not know Rome to be Babylon? Dost thou not know that as the old Babylon had the children of Judah in captivity, so hath this Rome the true Judah, that is, the confessors of Christ? Dost thou not know that as destruction happened unto it, so shall it do unto this? And trowest thou that God will not deliver his people now, when the time is come, as he did then? Hath not God commanded his people to come out from her? and wilt thou give ensample to the whole realm to run unto her? Hast thou forgotten the wo that Christ threatened to offence-givers? Wilt thou not remember, that it were better that a mill-stone were hanged about thy neck, and thou thrown into the sea, than that thou shouldst offend the little ones?

"And, alas, how hast thou offended! Yea, and how do thou still offend! Wilt thou consider things according to the outward show? Was not the synagogue more seemly, and like to be the true church, than the simple flock of Christ's disciples? Hath not the whore of Babylon more costly array and rich apparel externally, to set forth herself, than the homely housewife of Christ? Where is the beauty of the King's daughter, the church of Christ, without or within? doth not David say within? O remember, that as they are happy which are not offended at Christ, so are they happy which are not offended at his poor church. Can the pope and his prelates mean honestly, which make so much of the wife, and so little of the Husband? The church they magnify, but Christ they condemn. If this church were an honest woman, (that is, Christ's wife,) except they would make much of her Husband, Christ and his word, she would not be made much of by them.

"When Christ and his apostles were upon earth, who was more like to be the true church, they or the prelates, bishops, and synagogue? If a man should have followed custom, unity, antiquity, or the more part, should not Christ and his company have been cast out of the doors? Therefore bade Christ, 'Search the scriptures.' And, good mother, shall the servant be above his Master? Shall we look for other entertainment at the hands of the world, than Christ and his dear disciples found? Who was taken in Noah's time for the church? poor Noah and his family, or others? Who was taken for God's church in Sodom? Lot, or others? And doth not Christ say, As it was then, so shall it go now towards the coming of the Son of man? What meaneth Christ when he saith, Iniquity shall have the upper hand? doth not he tell that charity shall wax cold? And who seeth not a wonderful great lack of charity in those, which would now be taken for Christ's church? All that fear God in this realm truly can tell more of this than I can write.

"Therefore, dear mother, receive some admonition of one of thy poor children, now going to be burned for the testimony of Jesus. Come again to God's truth; come out of Babylon; confess Christ and his true doctrine; repent that which is past; make amends by declaring thy repentance by the fruits. Remember the readings and preachings of God's prophet, the true preacher Martin Bucer. Call to mind the threatenings of God, now something seen by thy children Leaver and others. Let the exile of Leaver, Pilkington, Grindal, Haddon, Horn, Seorie, Ponet, &c. something awake thee. Let the imprisonment of thy dear sons Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, move thee. Consider the martyrdom of thy chickens, Rogers, Saunders, Taylor; and now cast not away the poor admonition of me going to be burned also, and to receive the like crown of glory with my fellows. Take to heart God's calling by us. Be not as Pharaoh was; for then will it happen unto thee as it did unto him. What is that? hardness of heart. And what then? destruction eternal, both of body and soul. Ah, therefore, good mother, awake, awake; repent, repent; buskle thyself, and make haste to turn to the Lord. For else it shall be more easy for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for thee. O harden not your hearts; O stop not your ears to-day in hearing God's voice, though it be by a most unworthy messenger. O fear the Lord: for his anger is begun to kindle. Even now the axe is laid to the root of the tree.

"You know I prophesied truly to you before the sweat came, what would come, if you repented not your carnal gospelling. And now I tell you before I depart hence, that the ears of men will tingle to hear the vengeance of God that will fall upon you all, both town and university, if you repent not, if you leave not your idolatry, if you turn not speedily to the Lord, if you still be ashamed of Christ's truth which you know.

"O Perne, repent; O Thompson, repent; O you doctors, bachelors, and masters, repent; O mayor, aldermen, and town-dwellers, repent, repent, repent, that you may escape the near vengeance of the Lord. Rend your hearts, and come apace, calling on the Lord. Let us all say, We have all sinned, we have done wickedly, we have not hearkened to thy voice, O Lord. Deal not with us after our deserts, but be merciful to our iniquities, for they are great. O pardon our offences; in thine anger remember thy mercies. Turn us unto thee, O Lord God of hosts, for the glory of thy name's sake. Spare us, and be merciful unto us. Let not the wicked people say, Where is now their God? O, for thine own sake, for thy name's sake, deal mercifully with us. Turn thyself unto us, and us unto thee, and we shall praise thy name for ever.

"If in this sort, my dear beloved, in heart and mouth we come unto our Father, and prostrate ourselves before the throne of his grace, then surely, surely, we shall find mercy. Then shall the Lord look upon us, for his mercy's sake in Christ: then shall we hear him speak peace unto his people. For he is gracious and merciful, of great pity and compassion; he cannot be chiding for ever; his anger cannot last long to the penitent. Though we weep in the morning, yet at night we shall have our sorrow to cease: for he is exorable, and hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner; he rather would our conversion.

"O turn ye now, and convert yet once again, I humbly beseech you, and then the kingdom of heaven shall draw nigh. The eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, nor the heart of man is able to conceive, the joys prepared for us, if we repent, amend our lives, and heartily turn to the Lord. But if ye repent not, but be as you were, and go on forwards with the wicked, following the fashion of the world, the Lord will lead you on with wicked doers, you shall perish in your wickedness, your blood will be upon your own heads, your parts shall be with hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; ye shall be cast from the face of the Lord for ever and ever; eternal shame, sorrow, wo, and misery, shall be both in body and soul to you world without end. O therefore, right dear to me in the Lord, turn you, turn you, repent you, repent you, amend, amend your lives, depart from evil, do good, follow peace and pursue it.—Come out from Babylon, cast off the works of darkness, put on Christ, confess his truth, be not ashamed of his gospel, prepare yourselves to the cross, drink of God's cup before it come to the dregs, and then shall I with you and for you rejoice in the day of judgment, which is at hand, and therefore prepare yourselves thereto, I heartily beseech you. And thus I take my 'vale in æternum' with you in this present life, mine own dear hearts in the Lord.—The Lord of mercy be with us all, and give us a joyful and sure meeting in his kingdom, Amen, Amen. Out of prison, the eleventh of February, anno 1555.

"Your own in the Lord for ever,
"JOHN BRADFORD."

To Lancashire and Cheshire.

"To all those that profess the name and true religion of our Saviour Christ, in Lancashire and Cheshire, and especially biding in Manchester and thereabout, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, (now not only in bonds, but also condemned for the same true religion,) wisheth mercy and grace, peace, and increase of all godliness from God the Father of all pity, through the deserts of our Lord Jesus Christ, by the working of the most mighty and lively Spirit the Comforter for ever, Amen.

"I heard it reported credibly, my dearly beloved in the Lord, that my heavenly Father hath thought it good to provide, that as I have preached his true doctrine and gospel amongst you by word, so I shall testify and confirm the same by deed, that is, I shall with you leave my life, which by his providence I first received there (for in Manchester was I born) for a seal to the doctrine I have taught with you, and amongst you: so that if from henceforth you waver in the same, you have none excuse at all. I know the enemies of Christ, which exercise this cruelty upon me, think by killing me among you, to affray you and others, lest they should attempt to teach Christ truly, or believe his doctrine hereafter. But I doubt not but my heavenly Father will by my death more confirm you in his truth for ever. And therefore I greatly rejoice to see Satan and his soldiers supplanted in their own sapience, which is plain foolishness amongst the wise indeed, that is, amongst such as have heard God's word, and do follow it: for they only are counted wise of the wisdom of God our Saviour.

"But when I consider the cause of my condemnation, I cannot but lament that I do no more rejoice than I do: for it is God's verity and truth. So that the condemnation is not a condemnation of Bradford simply, but rather a condemnation of Christ and his truth.—Bradford is nothing else but an instrument in whom Christ and his doctrine is condemned. And therefore, my dearly beloved, rejoice, rejoice, and give thanks with me and for me, that ever God did vouchsafe so great a benefit to our country, as to choose the most unworthy (I mean myself) to be one, in whom it would please him to suffer any kind of affliction; much more this violent kind of death, which I perceive is prepared for me with you for his sake. All glory and praise be given unto God our Father, for his great and exceeding mercy towards me, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

"You know an heavy plague, or rather plagues, of God is fallen upon us, in taking away our good king, and true religion, God's true prophets and ministers, &c. and setting over us such as seek not the Lord after knowledge. Now the cause hereof is our iniquities and grievous sins: We did not know the time of our visitation; we were unthankful unto God; we contemned the gospel, and carnally abused it, to serve our hypocrisy, our vain-glory, our viciousness, avarice, idleness, security, &c. Long did the Lord linger, and tarry to have shewed mercy upon us, but we were ever the longer the worse. Therefore most justly hath God dealt with us, and dealeth with us; yea, yet we may see that his justice is tempered with much mercy, whereto let us attribute that we are not utterly consumed. For if the Lord should deal with us after our deserts, alas, how could we abide it? In his anger, therefore, seeing he doth remember his mercy undeserved, (yea, undeserved on our behalf,) let us take occasion the more speedily to go out to meet him, not with force of arms, (for we are not so able to withstand him, much less to prevail against him,) but to beseech him to be merciful unto us, and according to his wonted mercy to deal with us.

"Let us arise with David, and say, 'Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord; for in thy sight no flesh living shall be justified.' Let us send ambassadors with the centurion, and say, 'Lord, we are not worthy to come ourselves unto thee; speak the word, and we shall have peace.' Let us penitently with the publican look down on the earth, bewail our hard hearts, and cry out, 'O God, be merciful unto us, wretched sinners.' Let us with the lost son return and say, 'O Father, we have sinned against heaven and earth, and before thee, we are unworthy to be called thy children.'

"Therefore, my dearly beloved in the Lord, I your poorest brother now departing to the Lord, for my 'vale in æternum' for this present life, pray you, beseech you, and even from the very bottom of my heart, for all the mercies of God in Christ shewed unto you, most earnestly beg and crave of you out of prison, (as often out of your pulpits I have done,) that you will repent you, leave your wicked and evil life, be sorry for your offences, and turn to the Lord, whose arms are wide open to receive and embrace you, whose stretched-out hand to strike to death stayeth, that he may shew mercy upon you. For he is the Lord of mercy, and God of all comfort, he wills not the death of a sinner, but rather that ye should return, convert, and amend. He hath no pleasure in the destruction of men; his long-suffering draweth to repentance before the time of vengeance, and the day of wrath, which is at hand, doth come.

"Therefore, my dear hearts in the Lord, turn you, turn you to the Lord your Father, to the Lord your Saviour, to the Lord your Comforter. O why do you stop your ears and harden your hearts to-day, when you hear his voice by me your poorest brother? O forget not how that the Lord hath shewed himself true, and me his true preacher, by bringing to pass these plagues which at my mouth you oft heard before they came to pass, specially when I entreated of Noah's flood, and when I preached of the 22d chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, on St. Stephen's day, the last time that I was with you. And now by me the Lord sendeth you word, dear countrymen, that if you will go on forward in your impeniteney, carnality, hypocrisy, idolatry, covetousness, swearing, gluttony, drunkenness, whoredom, &c. wherewith, alas! alas! our country floweth; if, I say, you will not turn and leave off, seeing me now burned amongst you, to assure you on all sides how God seeketh you, and is sorry to do you hurt, to plague you, to destroy you, to take vengeance upon you, O your blood will be upon your own heads: you have been warned, and warned again, by me in preaching, by me in burning.

"Cease from doing evil, study to do well, away with idolatry, fly the Romish god and service, leave off from swearing, cut off carnality, abandon avarice, drive away drunkenness, fly from fornication and flattery, murder, and malice, destroy deceitfulness, and cast away all the works of darkness. Put on piety and godliness; serve God after his word, and not after custom; use your tongues to glorify God by prayer, thanksgiving, and confession of his truth, &c. Be spiritual, and by the Spirit mortify carnal affections; be sober, holy, true, loving, gentle, merciful, and then shall the Lord's wrath cease, not for this our doing's sake, but for his mercy's sake. Go to therefore, good countrymen, take this counsel of the Lord, by me now sent unto you, as the Lord's counsel, and not as mine, that in the day of judgment I may rejoice with you, and for you; the which thing I heartily desire, and not to be a witness against you. My blood will cry for vengeance, as against the Papists, God's enemies, (whom I beseech God, if it be his will, heartily to forgive, yea, even them which put me to death, and are the causers thereof, for they know not what they do,) so will my blood cry for vengeance, against you my dearly beloved in the Lord, if ye repent not, amend not, and turn unto the Lord.

"Turn unto the Lord yet once more, I humbly beseech thee, thou Manchester, thou Ashton-under-Line, thou Bolton, Bury, Wigan, Liverpool, Motrine, Steppor, Winsley, Eccles, Priestwich, Middleton, Radcliff, and thou city of Westchester, where I have truly taught and preached the word of God. Turn, I say unto you all, and to all the inhabitants thereabouts, unto the Lord our God, and he will turn unto you, he will say unto his angel, 'It is enough, put up the sword.' The which thing that he will do, I humbly beseech his goodness, for the precious blood's sake of his dear Son our Saviour Jesus Christ. Ah, good brethren, take in good part these my last words unto every one of you. Pardon me mine offences and negligences in behaviour amongst you. The Lord of mercy pardon us all our offences, for our Saviour Christ's sake, Amen. Out of prison, ready to come to you, February 11, 1555."

"To my loving Brethren, B. C. &c. their Wives and whole Families, John Bradford.

"I beseech the everlasting God to grant you all, my good brethren and sisters, the comfort of the holy Spirit, and the continual sense of his mercy in Christ our Lord, now and for ever, Amen.

"The world, my brethren, seemeth to have the upper hand, iniquity overfloweth, the truth and verity seemeth to be oppressed, and they which take part therewith are unjustly entreated; as they which love the truth, lament to see and hear as they do. The cause of all this is God's anger and mercy: his anger, because we have grievously sinned against him; his mercy, because he here punisheth us, and as a father nurtureth us. We have been unthankful for his word; we have contemned his kindness; we have been negligent in prayer; we have been so carnal, covetous, licentious, &c. We have not hastened to heaven-ward, but rather to hell-ward. We were fallen almost into an open contempt of God, and all his good ordinances; so that of his justice he could no longer forbear, but make us feel his anger, as now he hath done, in taking his word and true service from us, and permitting Satan to serve us with antichristian religion, and that in such sort, that if we will not yield to it, and seem to allow it in deed and outward fact, our bodies are like to be laid in prison, and our goods given we cannot tell to whom.

"This should we look upon as a sign of God's anger procured by our sins; which, my good brethren, every of us should now call upon our memories oftentimes, so particularly as we can, that we might heartily lament them, repent them, hate them, ask earnestly mercy for them, and submit ourselves to bear in this life any kind of punishment which God will lay upon us for them. This should we do in consideration of God's anger in this time. Now his mercy in this time of wrath is seen, and should be seen in us, my dearly beloved, in this, that God doth vouchsafe to punish us in this present life. If he should not have punished us, do not you think that we would have continued in the evils we were in? Yes, verily, we should have been worse, and have gone forwards in hardening our hearts by impenitence and negligence of God and true godliness. And then if death had come, should not we have perished both soul and body in eternal fire, in perdition? Alas, what misery should we have fallen into, if God should have suffered us to have gone on forward in our evils! No greater sign of damnation there is than to lie in evil and sin unpunished of God, as now the Papists, my dearly beloved, are cast into Jezebel's bed of security, which of all plagues is the most grievous that can be. They are bastards, and not sons, they are not under God's rod of correction.

"A great mercy it is, therefore, that God doth punish us: for if he loved us not, he would not punish us. Now doth he chastise us, that we should not be damned with the world. Now may we think ourselves God's house and children, because he beginneth his chastising at us. Now calleth he us to remember our past sins. Wherefore? that we might repent, and ask mercy. And why? that he might forgive us, pardon us, justify us, and make us his children; and so begin to make us here like unto Christ, that we might be like unto him elsewhere, even in heaven, where already we are set by faith with Christ; and at his coming in very deed we shall then most joyfully enjoy, when our sinful and vile hodies shall be made like to Christ's glorious body, according to the power whereby he is able to make all things subject to himself.

"Therefore, my brethren, let us in respect hereof not lament, but laud God; not be sorry, but be merry; not weep, but rejoice and be glad, that God doth vouchsafe to offer us his cross, thereby to come to him to endless joys and comforts. For if we suffer, we shall reign; if we confess him before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven; if we be not ashamed of his gospel now, he will not be ashamed of us in the last day, but will he glorified in us, crowning us with crowns of glory and endless felicity: for 'blessed are they that suffer persecution for righteousness sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' Be glad, saith Peter, for the Spirit of God resteth upon you: After that you are a little afflicted, God will comfort, strengthen, and confirm you. And therefore, my good brethren, be not discouraged for cross, for prison, or loss of goods, for confession of Christ's gospel and truth, which ye have believed, and lively was taught amongst you in the days of our late good king and most holy prince, king Edward. This is most certain, if you lose any thing for Christ's sake, and for contemning the antichristian service, set up again amongst us, as you for your parts even in prison shall find God's great and rich mercy, far passing all worldly wealth; so shall your wives and children in this present life find and feel God's providence, more plentifully than tongue can tell: for he will shew merciful kindness on thousands of them that love him. The good man's seed shall not go a-begging his bread. You are good men, so many as suffer for Christ's sake.

"I trust you all, my dearly beloved, will consider this gear with yourselves, and in the cross see God's mercy, which is more sweet and to be set by than life itself, much more than any pelf of this world. This mercy of God should make you merry and cheerful: for the afflictions of this life are not to be compared to the joys of the life prepared for you. You know the way to heaven is not the wide way of the world, which windeth to the devil, but it is a strait way, which few walk in; for few live godly in Christ Jesus; few regard the life to come; few remember the day of judgment; few remember how Christ will deny them before his Father, that do deny him here; few consider that Christ will be ashamed of them in the last day, which are ashamed of his truth and service; few cast their accounts, what will be laid to their charge in the day of vengeance; few regard the condemnation of their own consciences, in doing that which inwardly they disallow; few love God better than their goods.

"But I trust you are of this few, dearly beloved; I trust you be of that little flock, which shall inherit the kingdom of heaven; I trust you are the mourners and lamenters which shall be comforted with comfort which never shall be taken from you, if now you repent your former evils, if now you strive against the evils that are in you, if now you continue to call upon God, if now you defile not your bodies with any idolatrous service used in the antichristian churches, if you grieve not the good Spirit of God, which is given you as a gage of eternal redemption, counsellor and master to lead you into all truth; which good Spirit I beseech the Father of mercy to give to us all, for his dear Son's sake Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom I commend you all, and to the word of his grace, which is able to help you all, and save you all that believe it, follow it, and serve God hereafter.

"And of this I would ye were all certain, that all the hairs of your heads are numbered, so that not one of them shall perish, neither shall any man or devil be able to attempt any thing, much less to do any thing to you, or any of you, before your heavenly Father, which loveth you most tenderly, shall give them leave; and when he hath given them leave, they shall go no further than he will, nor keep you in trouble any longer than he will. Therefore cast on him all your care, for he is careful for you. Only study to please him, and to keep your consciences clean, and your bodies pure, from the idolatrous service which now every where is used, and God will marvellously and mercifully defend and comfort you; which thing ye do for his holy name's sake in Christ our Lord, Amen."

To his dearly beloved in Christ, Erkinalde Rawlins, and his Wife.

"God, our dear and most merciful Father through Christ, be with you, my good brother and sister, as with his children for ever, and in all things so guide you with his holy Spirit, the leader of his people, as may be to his glory, and your own everlasting joy and comfort in him, Amen. Because I have oftentimes received from either of you comfort corporal, (for the which I beseech the Lord, as to make me thankful, so to recompense you both now and eternally,) I cannot but go about (Lord help hitherto for thy mercy's sake) to write something for your comfort spiritually.

"My dearly beloved, look not upon these days, and the afflictions of the same here with us, simply as they seem unto you, that is, as dismal days, and days of God's vengeance, but rather as lucky days, and days of God's fatherly kindness towards you, and such as you be; that is, toward such as repent their sins and evil life past, and earnestly purpose to amend, walking not after the will of the world, and most part of men, for the preservation of their self, which, will they, nill they, they shall leave sooner or later; and to whom or how it shall be used, they know not. Indeed, to such as walk in their wickedness, and wind on with the world, this time is a time of wrath and vengeance, and their beginning of sorrow is but now, because they condemn the chastisements of their Father, which by these cleansing days would work their weal, which they will not: and because they will not have God's blessing, which both ways he hath offered unto them by prosperity and adversity, therefore it shall be kept far enough from them: as when the sick man will no kind of physick at the hands of the physician, he is left alone, and so the malady increaseth, and destroyeth him at the length. To such men indeed these days are and should be doleful days, and days of wo and weeping, because their damnation draweth nigh.

"But unto such as be penitent, and are desirous to live after the Lord's will, (among whom I do not only count you, but, as far as a man may judge, I know ye are,) unto each, I say, this time is and should be comfortable. For, first, now your Father chastiseth you and me for our sins; for the which if he would have destroyed us, then would he have letten us alone, and left us to ourselves, in nothing to take to heart his fatherly visitation, which here it pleaseth him to work presently, because elsewhere he will not remember our transgressions, as Paul writeth; he chastiseth us in this world, lest with the world we should perish. Therefore, my dear hearts, call to mind your sins to lament them, and to ask mercy for them in his sight, and withal undoubtedly believe to obtain pardon and assured forgiveness of the same, for twice the Lord punisheth not for one thing.

"So that I say, first we have cause to rejoice for these days, because our Father suffereth us not to lie in Jezebel's bed, sleeping in our own sins and security, but, as mindful of us, doth correct us as his children. And therefore be glad, my dear hearts and folks, knowing certainly, even by these visitations of the Lord, that ye are his dear elect children, whose faults your Father doth visit with the rod of correction, but his mercy will he never take away from us, Amen.

"Secondly, ye have cause to rejoice for these days, because they are days of trial, wherein not only ye yourselves, but also the world, shall know that ye be none of his, but the Lord's darlings. Before these days came, Lord God, how many thought of themselves they had been in God's bosom, and so were taken and would be taken of the world! But now we see whose they are; for to whom we obey, his servants we are: if we obey the world, (which God forbid, and hitherto ye have not done it,) then are we the world's; but if we obey God, then are we God's: which thing (I mean, that ye are God's) these days have declared, both to you, to me, and to all other that know you, better than ever we knew it. Therefore you have no cause to sorrow, but rather to sing, in seeing yourselves to be God's babes, and in seeing that all God's children do so count you.

"If the devil dwelt in you (which the Lord forbid) he would not stir up his knights to besiege your house, to snatch your goods, or suffer his fiends to enter into your hogs. But because Christ dwelleth in you, as he doth by faith, therefore stirreth he up his first-begotten son, the world, to seek how to disquiet you, to rob you, to spoli you, to destroy you: and perchance your dear Father, to try and to make known unto you, and to the world, that ye are destinate to another dwelling than here on earth, to another city than man's eyes have seen at any time, hath given or will give power to Satan, and to the world, to take from you the things which he hath lent you, and by taking them away, to try your fidelity, obedience, and love towards him, (for ye may not love them above him,) as by giving that ye have, and keeping it, he hath declared his love towards you.

"Satan perchance telleth God, as he did of Job, that ye love God for your goods' sake. What now then, if the Lord, to try you with Job, shall give him power on your goods and body accordingly, should ye be dismayed? should ye despair? should ye be faint-hearted? should ye not rather rejoice, as did the apostles, that they were counted worthy to suffer any thing for the Lord's sake? After a little while that he hath afflicted and tried you, (saith Peter,) he will visit, comfort, and confirm you. As to Jacob wrestling with the angel, at the length morning came, and the sun arose; so, dear hearts, doubtless it will happen unto you. Howbeit, do ye as Job and Jacob did, that is, order and dispose your things that God hath lent you, as ye may, and whiles ye have time. Who knoweth whether God hath given you power thus long, even to that end?

"Go to, therefore, dispose your goods, prepare yourselves to trial, that either ye may stand to it like God's champions, or else, if you feel such infirmity in yourselves that ye be not able, give place to violence, and go where you may with free and safe conscience serve the Lord. Think not this counsel to come by chance or fortune, but to come from the Lord. Other oracles we may not look for now. As God told Joseph in a dream by an angel, that he should fly; so, if you feel such infirmity in yourselves as should turn to God's dishonour, and your own destruction withal, know that at this present I am as God's angel, to admonish you to take time whiles you have it, and to see that in no case God's name by you might be dishonoured. Joseph might have objected the omission of his vocation, as perchance ye will do. But, dear hearts, let vocations and all things else give place to God's name, and the sanctifying thereof.

"This I speak, not as though I would not have you rather tarry, and to stand to it: but speak it in respect of your infirmity, which if you feel to be so great in you that you are not certain of this hope, that God will never tempt you above your ability; fly and get you hence, and know that thereby God will have you tried to yourselves and to others. For by it you shall know how to take this world, and that your home here is no home, but that ye look for another, and so give occasion to others less to love this world, and perchance to some to doubt of their religion. Wherein though they be earnest, yet would not they lose so much as ye do for your religion, which ye do confirm to me and others by your giving place to violence.

"Last of all, ye have cause to rejoice over these our days, because they be the days of confirmation, in the which, and by which, God our heavenly Father maketh us like unto Christ's image here, that we may be like unto him elsewhere. For if that we suffer with him, then we shall reign also with him; if we be buried with him, then we shall rise with him again; if that we company with him in all troubles and afflictions, then we shall rejoice with him in glory; if we now sow with him in tears, we shall reap with him in gladness; if we confess him before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven; if we take his part, he will take our's; if we lose ought for his name's sake, he will give us all things for his truth's sake. So that we ought to rejoice and be glad: for it is not given to every one to suffer loss of country, life, goods, house, &c. for the Lord's sake. What can God the Father do more unto us, than to call us into the camp with his Son? What may Christ our Saviour do more for us, than to make us warriors? What can the Holy Ghost do unto us above this, to mark us with the cognizance of the Lord of hosts?

"This cognizance of the Lord standeth not in forked caps, tippets, shaven crowns, or such other baggage and anti-christian pelf, but in suffering for the Lord's sake. The world shall hate you, saith Christ. Lo! there is the cognizance and badge of God's children: the world shall hate you. Rejoice therefore, my dearly beloved, rejoice that God doth thus vouchsafe to begin to conform you and to make you like to Christ. By the trial of these days ye are occasioned more to repent, more to pray, more to contemn this world, more to desire life everlasting, more to be holy, (for holiness is the end wherefore God doth afflict us,) and so to come to God's company. Which thing because we cannot do, as long as this body is as it is, therefore by the door of death we must enter with Christ into eternal life, and immortality of soul and body: which God of his merey send shortly, for our Saviour Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

WILLIAM MINGE.

The next day after Mr. Bradford and John Leaf did suffer in Smithfield, William Minge, priest, died in prison at Maidstone, being there in bonds of religion, and like to have suffered also, if he had lived the fury of his adversaries, whose nature was to spare and favour none that favoured Christ's pure gospel; which William Minge with as great constancy and boldness yielded up his life in prison as if it had pleased God to have called him to suffer by the fire, as the other good and godly men had done at the stake, which he himself was ready also so to do, if it had pleased God to have called him thereunto.

JAMES TREVISAM, buried in the Fields.

Upon the 3d of July, 1555, died one James Trevisam, in the parish of St. Margaret, in Lothbury, upon a Sunday, who being impotent and lame, kept his bed; for he could not rise out of it of a long time. This Trevisam had a servant, one John Small, which read on the Bible, and as he was in reading, Berd, the promoter, came to the house, and would needs go up the stairs; where he found four persons besides him and his wife, to wit, the young man that read, and two men and a woman. All which folks the said Berd, the promoter, apprehended and carried to the Compter, where they remained about a fortnight, for all the friends they could make. Moreover, the said Berd would have had also James the lame man himself to Newgate in a cart, and brought the cart to the door, but for neighbours; nevertheless, the poor man was fain to put in two sureties for his forthcoming; for he could not go out of his bed, being not only impotent, but also very sick the same time. So within a few days the said James lying in extremity, the parson of the church (named Mr. Farthing) came to him, and had communication with him, and agreed well, and so departed. It happened after the priest was come down into the street, there met him one Toller, a founder. Yea, saith he, be ye agreed? I will accuse you: for he denieth the sacrament of the altar. Upon that the parson went to him again, and then the priest and he could not agree. And so the parson went to the bishop of London, and told him. The bishop answered, that he should be burnt, and if he were dead he should be buried in a ditch. And so when he died, the parson was against his wife as much as he could, neither would let her have a coffin to put him in, nor any thing else, but was fain to bear him upon a table to Moorfields, and there was he buried. The same night the body was cast above the ground, and his sheet taken from him, and he left naked. After this, the owner of the field seeing him, buried him again; and a fortnight after the summer came to his grave, and summoned him to appear at Paul's before his ordinary, to answer to such things as should be laid against him. But how much farther they carried this ridiculous farce, the last effort of their malice and cruelty, is not known.

The History of Mr. JOHN BLAND, Preacher and Martyr, who steadfastly suffered for the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

The 12th day of July, John Bland, John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphrey Middleton, were all four burned at Caunterbury together for one cause; of which number Frankesh and Bland were ministers and preachers of the word of God, the one being parson of Adesham, the other the vicar of Rolvinton. This Mr. Bland was a man so little born for his own commodity, that no part of his life was separated from the common and public utility of all men. For his first doings were there employed to the bringing up of children in learning and virtue; under whom were trained divers towardly young men; in the number of whom was Dr. Sands, a man of singular learning and worthiness, whom I here gladly name for his singular gifts of virtue and erudition.

After this, he coming to the ministry in the church of God, or rather being called thereto, was inflamed with incredible desire to profit the congregation; which may appear by this, that whereas he was cast into Canterbury prison for the preaching of the gospel, and delivered once or twice from thence at the suit of his friends, yet would he needs preach the gospel again as soon as he was delivered. Whereupon he being the third time apprehended, when his friends yet once again would have found the means to have delivered him, if he would have promised to abstain from preaching; he stood in it earnestly, that he would admit no such condition, notably well expressing unto us the manner and example which we read in the apostle Paul, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation, or anguish, or hunger, or nakedness, or danger, or perseeution, or the sword," &c. But to express the whole life and doings of this godly martyr, seeing we have his own testimony concerning the same, it shall be best to refer the reader to his own report, writing to his father of the whole discourse of his troubles, from the beginning almost to the latter end, in order and manner as ye shall hear.--

First, the 3d of September, being Sunday, after service ended, ere I had put off my surplice, John Austen came to the table, commonly called the Lord's table, and laid both his hands upon it, saying, Who set this here again? Now they say they took the table down the Sunday before, which I knew not, neither do I know who set it up again. The clerk answered, that he knew not. Then Austen said, He is a knave that set it here. I was then going down the church, marvelling what he meant, and said, Goodman Austen, the queen's highness hath set forth a proclamation, that ye may move no sedition. And ere I could speak any more, he said, Thou art a knave. And I said, Well, goodman Austen, that I have said I have said. By God's soul, quoth he, thou art a very knave. Then my clerk spake to him; but what I am not sure. But he said, Ye are both heretic knaves, and have deceived us with this fashion too long, and if ye say any service here again, I will lay the table on his face; and in that rage he with others took up the table, and laid it on a chest in the chaneel, and set the tressels by it. Wherefore I rode by and by to Mr. Isaac, and shewed him the cause, both how seditiously he had spoken, and performed it with a like deed. Mr. Isaac directed a warrant to the constable, which was immediately served; so that he was brought before him the same night, and was bound by recognizance, with sureties, to appear if he were called. But we agreed so well then, that it was never called for, the table was brought down, and was permitted as before.

The 26th of November, being Sunday, Richard Austen and his brother Thomas came to the aforesaid table after the communion was done, and as I was going by them, Richard said unto me, Mr. Parson, we have to speak to you. And I said, What is your will? And he said, You know that you took down the tabernacle wherein the rood did hang, and such other things; we would know what recompense you will make us. For the queen's proceedings are, as you know, that such must up again.

Quoth I, I know no such proceeding as yet; and as for that I did, I did it by commandment.

No, said Thomas Austen; ye will not know the queen's proceedings. Yes, said I, I refuse not to know them.

Then said Richard, Ye are against the queen's proceedings; for you say there are abominable uses and devilishness in the mass.

Goodman Austen, (said I) if I so said, I will say it again, and, God willing, stand to the proof of it.

Masters all, quoth Richard Austen, bear record of these words; and went his way.

Quoth Thomas Austen, Thou wilt as soon eat this book as stand to them. No, quoth I, not so soon. Tell us, quoth he, what devilishness is it, that is in the mass.

I often preached it unto you, said I, and ye have not believed it, nor borne it away, nor will now neither, though I should tell you.

Quoth he, Thou art an heretic, and hast taught us nothing but heresy: for thou canst say nothing that is true.

Yes, goodman Austen, I can say that God is in heaven, and ye will say, I trow, that it is true; and so have I taught you truly.

Quoth he, Thou hast taught us like an heretic, and hast said, that there is no devil in hell.

Well, said I, lie on; methinks you can say little truth. Many other taunts he gave, too long to write. And at the last he said, Ye pulled down the altar: will ye build it again?

No, quoth I, except I be commanded; for I was commanded to do that I did.

Well, if you will not, (said he,) then will I; for I am churchwarden.

I charge you (said I) that you do not, except you have authority.

I will (said he) not let for your charge; for we will have a mass here on Sunday, and a preacher that shall prove thee an heretic, if thou dare abide his coming.

Yes, quoth I, God willing, I will abide and hear him; for sure I am that he cannot disprove any doctrine that I have preached.

Yes, quoth he, and that thou shalt hear, if thou run not away ere then.

No, goodman Austen, I will not run away.

Marry, quoth he, I cannot tell; thou art as like yea and nay. With many other words we came out of the church door, and so departed.

When the Sunday came, I looked for our preacher, and at the time of morning prayer I said to the clerk, Why do ye not ring? Ye forget that we shall have a sermon to-day. No, said he, Mr. Miles's servant hath been here this morning, and said, his master hath letters from my lord chancellor, that he must go to London, and cannot come. That day I did preach to them a sermon in his stead. Now have they slandered me, that I had prepared a company from divers places to have troubled him; but they agreed not in their lie. For some said, I had them at Adesham, and that Richard Austen had knowledge, and sent for the king's constable to see the peace kept; which is found a lie. Others said, I had them lying in wait for him between Canterbury and Adesham. Others said, I had them in both places, that if the one missed the other should not. God forgive them all. Now upon these two matters they boast that they sent two bills of complaint to the council.

Upon the Innocents' day, being the 28th day of December, they had procured the priest of Stodmarsh to say them mass; he had nigh made an end of matins ere I came: and when he had made an end of matins, he said to me, Mr. Parson, your neighbour hath desired me to say matins and mass: I trust ye will not be against the queen's proceedings. No, quoth I, I will offend none of the queen's majesty's laws, God willing. What say ye? quoth he; and made as he had not heard. And I spake the same words to him again, with an higher voice; but he would not hear, though all the chaneel heard. So I cried the third time, that all the church heard, that I would not offend the queen's laws; and then he went to mass.

And when he was reading the epistle, I called the clerk unto me with the beckoning of my finger, and said unto him, I pray you desire the priest, when the gospel is done, to tarry a little: I have something to say to the people. And the clerk did so.

And the priest came down into the stall where he sat; and I stood up in the chancel door, and spake to the people of the great goodness of God, always shewed unto his people unto the time of Christ's coming; and in him and his coming, what benefit they past, we present, and our successors, have; and among other benefits, I spake of the great and comfortable sacrament of his body and blood; and after I had declared briefly the institution, the promise of life to the good, and damnation to the wicked, I spake of the bread and wine, affirming them to be bread and wine after the consecration, as yonder mass-book, saying, Panem sanctum vite, et Calicem salutis perpetue, &c. "Holy bread of eternal life, and the cup of perpetual salvation." So that like as our bodily mouths eat the sacramental bread and wine, so doth the mouth of our souls (which is our faith) eat Christ's flesh and blood. And when I had made an end of that, I spake of the misuse of the sacrament in the mass; so that I judged it in that use no sacrament, and shewed how Christ bade us all eat and drink, and one only in the mass eateth and drinketh, and the rest kneel, knock, and worship; and after these things ended, as briefly as I could, I spake of the benefactors of the mass, and began to declare what men made the mass, and recited every man's name, and the patch that he put to the mass; and ere I had rehearsed them all, the churchwarden, and the constable his son-in-law, violently came upon me, and took my book from me, and pulled me down, and thrust me into the chancel, with an exceeding roar and cry. Some cried, Thou heretic! some, Thou traitor! some, Thou rebel! and when every man had said his pleasure, and the rage was somewhat past, Be quiet, good neighbours, (said I,) and let me speak to you quietly. If I have offended any law, I will make answer before them that are in authority to correct me. But they would not hear me, and pulled one on this side, and another on that, and began again.

Then Richard Austen said, Peace, masters! no more till mass be done; and they ceased. Then said I to the churchwarden and the constable, either holding me by the arm, Masters, let me go into the church-yard till your mass be done. No, quoth the churchwarden, thou shalt tarry here till the mass be done. I will not, quoth I, but against my will. And they said, Thou shalt tarry, for if thou go out, thou wilt run away. Then said I to the constable, Lay me in the stocks, and then ye shall be sure of me; and turned my back to the altar. By that time Richard Austen had devised what to do with me, and called to the constable and the churchwarden, and bade them put me into a side chapel, and shut the door to me, and there they made me tarry till mass was ended. When the mass was ended, they came into the chapel to me, and searched what I had about me. Then said Thomas Austen, churchwarden, after many brablings that they made with me, Thou keepest a wife here amongst us, against God's law and the queen's. Ye lie, Goodman Austen, said I; it is not against God's law, nor, as I suppose, against the queen's. Thus they brought me out of the church, and without the door they railed on me, without pity or mercy. But anon the priest came out of the church, and Ramsey, that of late was clerk, said unto him, Sir, where dwell you? And therefore Thomas Austen took him by the arm, and said, Come on, sirrah, you are of his opinion; and took his dagger from him, and said he should go with him. I am content, said he; and a little mocked them in their envions talk. By this time there came in at the church stile one John Gray, of Wingham, servant to John Smith, and seeing them hold Ramsey by the arms, said to him, How now, Ramsey, have you offended the queen's law? No, quoth he, there is no transgression. Therewith Thomas Austen took him, and said, Ye are one of their opinion, ye shall go with them for company: and took his dagger from him, and then demanded what he did there? But after, I think, for very shame they let him go again; but they carried me and Ramsey to Canterbury, with eighteen persons, weaponed.

The next day they made a bill against me, but it served not their purpose, which was, that they would have had me to prison. But James Chapman and Bartholomew Joyes were bound in twenty pounds either of them for my appearance at the next general sessions, or in the mean time to appear, if I were sent for, before the queen's majesty's council, or any other commissioners sent by the queen's authority. And Ramsey was bound to the peace, and to be of good behaviour till the next sessions.

Now the 23d or 24th of February, sir Thomas Finch, knight, and Mr. Harges, sent for me and my sureties to Mr. Finch's place, and took me from my sureties, and sent me to the castle of Canterbury, by sir Thomas Moyle's commandment, they said; where I lay ten weeks, and then was bailed, and bound to appear at the next sessions holden at Canterbury; but after they changed it to be at Ashford, on the Thursday in Whitsun-week, being the 19th of May; but in the mean time the matter was exhibited to the Spiritual Court.

The first Examination of Mr. John Bland in the Spiritual Court, before Dr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, and Mr. Collins, commissary.

The 18th day of May, Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, made the mayor's sergeant to bring me before him and Mr. Collins, commissary, into Christ's church, and they went with me into a chamber in the suffragan of Dover's house. Then the archdeacon said, Art thou a priest? And I said, I was one. And he said, Art thou any graduate of any university? And I said, Yea. What degree, said he, hast thou taken? The degree, quoth I, of master of arts. The more pity, quoth he, that thou shouldst believe thyself as thou hast done. Thou hast been a common preacher licensed, hast thou not? And I said, I have been so. Marry, quoth he, so I understand.

What hast thou preached?

And I said, God's word, to the edifying, I trust, of his people.

No, no, quoth he; to the destroying of their souls and thine both, except the mercy of God be all the greater. I pray thee, what hast thou preached? tell me.

I told you, quoth I, what I have preached.

Nay, but tell me, quoth he, what one matter hast thou preached to the edifying of the people, as thou sayest?

I will tell you no particular matter; for I perceive you would have some matter against me.

No, by my faith, quoth he, but that only I would win thee from heresies that thou art bewrapt in, and hast infected others withal. For thou hast preached, as I am informed, that the blessed sacrament of the altar is not the very body and blood of Jesus Christ after the consecration. Tell me, hast thou not thus preached? and is not this thine opinion?

Sir, quoth I, I perceive, as I said, that ye seek matter against me. But seeing that I am bound in the sessions to my good behaviour for preaching, which may be broken with words, and well I know not with what words; and also both mine authority to preach, and my living, are taken from me, I think I am not bound to make you an answer.

Collins. Mr. Bland, do you not remember, that St. Peter biddeth you make answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the faith that is in you?

Bland. I know that, and am content so to answer as that text biddeth: But I know that Mr. Archdeacon doth not ask me after that manner, but rather to bring me into trouble.

Then they said, No, ye shall not be troubled for any thing that ye say here.

Bland. I am content for knowledge sake to commune with you in any matter, but not otherwise.

And so they fell in reasoning more than the space of an hour, of the sacrament, both against me. At the last Mr. Collins said, Mr. Bland, will ye come and take in hand to answer such matter on Monday next as shall be then laid to you?

Bland. Sir, ye said I should not be troubled for any thing that should be said here for learning's sake. And they said, Ye shall not, but it is for other matters.

Sir, said I, I am bound to appear, as some tell me, on Thursday next at Ashford; I am in doubt whether I can or no. Yet I have purposed to be there, and so to go to London to Mr. Wiseman, for an obligation that he hath, whereby I should receive certain money to pay my debts withal.

Then said Mr. Archdeacon, I will write to Mr. Wiseman, that ye shall sustain no loss.

Bland. That shall not need: for I can sustain no great loss, if I do not go. But I pray you, sir, to let me have a longer day.

No, quoth he.—Sir, said I, I cannot well come to you on Monday.

Harpsf. Wilt thou not come, when he so gently speaketh to thee, where he may command thee?

Bland. I do not deny to come, but I desire a longer day.

Harpsf. Thou shalt have no other day; I charge thee to come on Monday.

Bland. Sir, I perceive it shall be for this or like matters: will it please you or Mr. Collins, for God's sake, to confer scriptures privately with me in this matter, seeing ye say ye would so gladly win me?

Harpsf. With all my heart will I take the pains, and I will also borrow my lord of Dover's library, to have what books thou wilt.—And thus they departed.

Now the 17th of May, at Ashford, I could not be released, although I was called to the Spiritual Court for the same matter, but was bound to appear at the sessions holden at Crambroke, the 3d of July.

Another Appearance of Mr. Bland before the Archdeacon and his Fellows.

The 21st day of May, I appeared in the Chapter-house, where was a great multitude of people, unlooked for of me; and Mr. Archdeacon said thus to me, Ye are come here according as ye were appointed; and the cause is, that it hath pleased the queen's highness here to place me, to see God's holy word set forth, and to reform those that are here fallen into great and heinous errors, to the great displeasure of God, and the decay of Christ's sacraments, and contrary to the faith of the Catholic church, whereof thou art notably known to be one that is sore poisoned with the same, and hast infected and deceived many with thy evil preaching; which if thou wilt renounce, and come home again to the Catholic church, both I and many other more would be very glad: and I for my part shall be right glad to shew you the favour that lieth in me, as I said unto you, when you were appointed hither, because ye then refused to satisfy again the people that ye had deceived. And whereas it is feigned by you, that I should openly dispute the matter with you this day, although I did neither so intend nor appoint, yet I am content to dispute the matter with thee, if thou wilt not without disputation help to heal the souls that are brought to hell-ward by thee. What sayest thou?

Bland. I do protest before God and you all, that neither is my conscience guilty of any error or heresy, neither that I ever taught any error or heresy willingly. And where your mastership saith, that I have feigned an open disputation with you; it is not true, as I can thus prove: Upon Saturday I was at Ugden's, and there Mr. Bingham laid it to my charge, that such an open disputation as ye have here offered, should be this day between you and me; whereat I much marvelled, and said to him, That before that present I never heard any such word, neither would I answer nor dispute; and to this can Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Seth, of Overland, and Mr. Ugden, witness; and further I said to them, that I never spake to you of any disputation, nor you to me. Now if your mastership have any thing to say to me by the law, I will make answer to it.

Harpsf. Hear ye what he saith! His conscience is clear: I pray thee whereon groundest thou thy conscience? let me hear what thy faith is?

Bland. I know not why ye should more ask me a reason of my faith, than any other man in this open audience.

Harpsf. Why, thou heretic, art thou ashamed of thy faith? If it were a Christian belief, thou needest not be ashamed of it.

Bland. I am not ashamed of my faith: for I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, &c. with all the other articles of the Creed? and I do believe all the holy scriptures of God to be most certain and true.

Harpsf. Wilt thou declare no more than this?

Bland. No.

Harpsf. Well, I will tell thee whereon I ground my faith: I do believe and ground my faith and conscience upon all the articles of the Creed, and upon all the holy scriptures, sacraments, and holy doctors of the church, and upon all the general councils that ever were since the apostles' time. Lo, hereupon ground I my faith; with many words more, which I well remember not. And when he could get no other answer of me than I had said before, he called for a scribe to make an act against me. And after much communication, I said, By what law and authority will ye proceed against me? Mr. Collins said, By the canon law.

Bland. I doubt whether it be in strength or no. Yet I pray you let me have a counsellor in the law, and I will make answer according to the law.

Harpsf. Why, thou heretic, thou wilt not confess thy faith to me, that have authority to demand it of thee, and yet I have confessed my faith to thee before all this audience. As concerning the blessed sacrament of the altar, thou hast taught, that after the consecration it is bread and wine, and not the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. How sayest thou, hast thou not thus taught?

Bland. Sir, as concerning this matter of the sacrament, When I was with you and Mr. Collins, ye said then it was for other matters that I should come hither; and further, that ye would be content at my desire to confer scripture with me, to see if ye could win me; and ye said ye would borrow my lord of Dover's library, that I should have what book I would. And now ye require me thus to answer, contrary to your promise, ere any conference be had, and seek rather to bring me into trouble than to win me.

Harpsf. I will, as God shall help me, do the best to thee that I can, if thou wilt be any thing conformable; and I trust to dissolve all thy doubts, if thou be willing to hear; and I also will desire these two worshipful men, my lord of Dover and Mr. Collins, to hear us.

Bland. No, ye shall pardon me of that: there shall be no such witness. But when we agree, set to our hands. Hereat made the people a great noise against me, for refusing the witness; and here had we many more words than I can rehearse. But at the last I said, Sir, will ye give me leave to ask you one question? And he said, Yea, with all my heart: for in that thou askest any thing, there is some hope that thou mayest be won.

Bland. Sir, when it pleased Almighty God to send his angel unto the Virgin Mary to salute her, and said, "Hail, full of grace," &c. came any substance from God our Father into the Virgin's womb to become man? Whereat as well Mr. Archdeacon as my lord of Dover and Mr. Collins staid. But my lord spake the first, and said, the Holy Ghost came to her; and ere he had brought out his sentence, Mr. Syriac Peters said, Virtus altissimi obumbravit. Truth, said Mr. Archdeacon, it was the power of God, sent by the Holy Ghost. They had forgotten that genitus fuit ex substantia Patris; or else they perceived whereunto this question tended, and so both they and I left it: by what words I cannot tell. But I said, Sir, shall I ask one other? And he said, Yea. Is there in the sacrament, after the consecration, Christ's natural body, with all the qualities of a natural body, or no?

Hark, said Mr. Archdeacon, hear ye this heretic? He thinks it an absurdity to grant all the qualities of Christ's natural body to be in the sacrament. But it is no absurdity: for even that natural body that was born of the Virgin Mary, is glorified, and that same body is in the sacrament after the consecration. But perceive ye not the arrogancy of this heretic, that will put me to answer him, and he will not answer me! He thought to put me to a pinch with this question; for I tell you it is a learned question.

Bland. So if ye be so much discontented with me, I will say no more; yet I would all men heard, that ye say the glorified body of Christ is in the sacrament, after the consecration.

Harpsf. I may call thee gross ignorant. Thou gross ignorant, is not the same body glorified that was born of the Virgin Mary? Is it then any absurdity to grant that to be in the sacrament?—And whiles he spake many other words, I said to Mr. Petit, That the sacrament was instituted, delivered, and received of his apostles, before Christ's body was crucified; and it was crucified before it was glorified. Which saying Mr. Petit partly recited to Mr. Archdeacon.

Harpsf. Thou art without all learning. Was not Christ's body given to his apostles, as in a glorified act? and yet no inconvenience, although his natural body was not crucified; for when he was born of the Virgin Mary without pain, was not that the act of a glorified body? And when he walked on the water, and when he came into the house of his apostles, the doors being shut fast, were not these acts of a glorified body?

Then my lord of Dover helped him to a better place, and said, When Christ was in mount Tabor, he was there glorified in his apostles' sight.

Harpsf. Ye say truth, my lord; he was glorified in the sight of three of his apostles.

Bland. This methinks is new doctrine.

Harpsf. Well, seeing he will by no other way be reformed, let the people come in and prove these matters against him.

And therewith the archdeacon brought forth a copy of the bill of complaint that was put against me at Christmas, and about that we talked a little. And then Mr. Archdeacon rose up, and said, See ye, good people, that know this matter, that ye come in, and prove it against him. Whereunto answered Thomas Austen, I pray you (said he) let us be no more troubled with him. And then spake John Austen, and Heath with one eye, and began to accuse me; but no answer they could have of me, but, Do to me what you can by law, and I will answer it. Then said Thomas Austen, Bland, ye were once adjured.

Bland. Ye say not truly, Goodman Austen; I was never adjured.—Either (said he) ye were adjured, or else ye had the king's pardon.—Neither of both: ye speak this out of malice.

Then Mr. Archdeacon departed, and left Mr. Collins to command me to appear the next day. Howbeit, for certain other urgent business that I had, I did not appear, but wrote a letter to Mr. Commissary, desiring him to respite the matter till my coming home again; and if he would not, I would be content to submit myself to the law when I came home.

Now about the 28th day of June, I came to Mr. Commissary to shew him of my return, and offered myself to satisfy the law, if it were proceeded against me, before Mr. Coeks of Surrey, and Marks the apparitor; but Mr. Commissary said gently, he had done nothing against me. And so appointed me to appear before him the Friday se'nnight after.

Now in the mean time was the sessions holden at Crambroke, where I was bound to appear; and carrying surety with me to be bound again, I did appear the third day of July. And sir John Baker said, Bland, ye are, as we hear say, a Scot; where were ye born and brought up? And I said, I was born in England. And he said, Where? And I said in Sedber, and brought up by one Dr. Lupton, provost of Eaton college. Well, said he, I know him well; remain to your bond till afternoon.

Then said sir Thomas Moyle, Ah, Bland, thou art a stiff-necked fellow; thou wilt not obey the law, nor answer when thou art called. Mr. Sheriff, take him to your ward.

And the bailiff set me in the stocks with others, and would not hear me speak one word; and so we remained in the gaol of Maidstone till a fortnight before Michaelmas, or thereabout; and then we were carried to Rochester, to the assize holden there, where we were among the prisoners two days; and when we were called, and the judges of assize asked our causes, when my cause was rehearsed, Mr. Barrow, clerk of the peace, said, that I was an excommunicate person.

Then Mr. Koper, of Linsted, talked with the judges; but what, I am not able to say. But the judges of assize said, Take them to Maidstone again, and bring them to the sessions that shall be holden next at the town of Malden. Howbeit, the sheriff did not send for us, so that we tarried at Maidstone till the sessions holden at Greenwich, the 18th and 19th of February. I and others being within the bar among the felons, and irons upon our arms, were called out the latter day by the gaoler and bailiffs, and eased of our irons, and carried by them into the town to sir John Baker, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and two others whom I know not.

Baker. Bland, wherefore were ye cast into prison?

Bland. I cannot well tell: your mastership cast me in.

Baker. Yea, but wherefore were you in before that time?

Bland. For an unjust complaint put upon me.

Baker. What was the complaint?

Bland. I told him as truly and briefly as I could.

Baker. Let me see thy book; and I took him a Latin Testament.—Will ye go (said he) to the church, and follow the queen's proceedings, and do as an honest man should do?

Bland. I trust in God to do no otherwise but as an honest man should do.

Baker. Will ye do as I said?

Bland. Will it please your mastership to give me leave to ask you a question?—Baker. Yea.—Bland. Sir, may a man do any thing that his conscience is not satisfied to be good?

Baker. Away! away! and threw down the book, and said, It is no Testament. And I said, Yes. And Mr. Web took it up, and said unto me marvellous gently, Mr. Bland, I knew you when ye were out of this opinion; I would to God ye would reform yourself. I said, If ye have known me of another opinion than I am now, it was for lack of knowledge.

Baker. Yea, sayest thou so! by St. Mary, an thou hold thee there, I will give six faggots to burn thee withal, ere thou shouldest be unburned. Hence, knave! hence!

And so were we sent into our place again within the bar; and at night, when judgment of felons and all was done, we were called, and the judge said to the gaoler, Take them with you, and deliver them to the ordinary, and if they will not be reformed, let them be delivered to us again, and they shall have judgment and execution. And one of our company said, My lord, if we be killed at your hands for Christ's sake, we shall live with him for ever.

Then came we to the castle of Canterbury, and there we remained till the 2d day of March, at which day we were brought into the Chapter-house of Cree-church, where were set the suffragan of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, Mr. Mills, with others; and then went to them Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Petit, Mr. Web, and Mr. Harde, justices. And when I was called, Mr. Web said, Here we present this man unto you, as one vehemently suspected of heresy.

And I said, Mr. Web, ye have no cause to suspect me of heresy. I have been a prisoner this whole year, and no matter proved against me: I pray you, wherefore have I been so long kept in prison?

Web. Leave your arrogant asking of questions, and answer to that that is laid to your charge.

Bland. I do so: for I say you have no cause to suspect me of heresy.

Web. Yes: ye denied to sir John Baker to be conformable to the queen's proceedings.

Bland. Is it a just cause to suspect me of heresy, for asking a question with leave?

Then stood up Mr. Petit, and said, Ye were cast into prison, because you fled away from your ordinary.

Bland. Then have I had wrong: for I never fled, nor disobeyed my ordinary, nor did any thing contrary to the law; let them now say if I did. But they said nothing. And when I saw they held their peace, I said, Mr. Commissary, have you been the cause of this mine imprisonment?—No, quoth he: ye know that when ye went from me, ye were appointed to appear the Friday after the sessions.

Here I was suffered to speak no more, but shut up in a corner till my companions were likewise presented; and then we were sent to Westgate into prison, and were put in several close holds, that never one of us could speak to another, nor any man was permitted to come to us. We were four times at this appearance: but one they despatched, by what means I cannot tell, whose name was Cornwall, a tanner.

The Answer of Mr. Bland, in his Appearance before the Commissary and others, in the Spiritual Court.

Mr. Collins said, Mr Bland, ye know that ye are presented unto us as one suspected of heresy: how say ye, be ye contented to reform yourself to the laws of this realm, and of the holy church?

Bland. I deny that I am suspected justly of heresy, and that ye heard when I was presented, that I denied the suspicion to be just, but to defend the unjust punishment that I have suffered: neither can ye prove that any occasion hath been given by me, whereby any man should suspect me therein. But if you have any law or authority to proceed against me for any thing done for a whole year ago and more, I will answer to it.

Collins. Ye were convented before Mr. Archdeacon and me, and matter of heresy laid to your charge.

Bland. That matter was done and said a whole year ago, and for that I have been in prison this year or more. If ye have any thing against me by any law, I desire you to let me know the law and the matter, and I will answer according to the law.

Then said my lord suffragan, But that I am one of the judges, I would rise and stand by thee, and accuse thee to be a sacramentary, and bring witness to prove it; yea, and further, that thou hast called the mass an abominable idol.

Bland. You, my lord, never heard me say so: but I heard you once say, That in your conscience ye had abhorred the mass three years.

Thou liest, quoth he, I never said so.

Bland. My lord, if they might be heard, I can bring witness to prove it, with the day, time, and place: and I once did hear Mr. Collins at a visitation in Wingham say, That Christ was a full satisfaction for all sins present, past, and to come, contrary to that he saith now.

Mr. Collins said, This is but a drift; you were better answer now, for else you shall go to prison again, and be called on Monday, and have articles laid to you; and if ye then answer not directly, ye shall be condemned pro confesso, and that will be worse for you.

Bland. Sir, I do not now, nor will then, deny to answer to any thing that ye can lay to my charge by the law: wherefore I trust ye will let me have the benefit of the law.

Collins. This is the law, that if ye be required of the ordinary, Reddere rationem fidei, (to give a reason of thy faith,) then may ye not deny it: and that we do now.

Bland. To that then will I answer: for I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, with all the other articles of the same Creed; and I believe all the articles contained both in the Creed called the Mass Creed, and in the Creed of Athanasius; and I do believe, that all the holy scriptures, and all things therein contained, are most true.

Collins. This will not serve you: ye must answer to all such articles in all these as shall be laid to you, or asked of you.

Bland. Let me know the law that it is in that force, (without any just cause of suspicion proved against me,) and I will answer.

Collins. How say ye, will ye answer?

Bland. Sir, I have answered you.

Have him away, said my lord of Dover; he had better have answered.

Bland. My lord, I am ready to answer, if ye have any thing against me by the law.

B. Dover. Ye have preached many heresies in Adesham, where I am parson now; and therefore ye must make answer to them.

Bland. Lay them to my charge by the law, and I will answer them, if ye can approve that I am bound to answer to that was done a year or more ago. For if ye may do that, ye may also lay to my charge, and compel me to answer to, all things done in all my life, I trow.

Collins. It is not a year ago since you were before Mr. Archdeacon and me.

Bland. It is truth, it is a year and ten weeks since the words were spoken; and I have been a prisoner ever since, and have been at five sessions, and never could have my cause tried. Methinks your eharities should think it punishment enough, if I had been guilty.

Collins. All this will not serve you; you must needs answer, and it will be better for you to answer now than another time. Will you reform yourself, and go to the church, and worship Christ in the blessed sacrament of the altar, and be obedient unto all the queen's laws?

Bland. I pray you wherefore am I brought hither?

Collins. To answer to such things as are demanded of you.

Bland. Sir, I thought ye had some matters against me by the law.

Collins. Well, on Monday at nine o'clock ye shall see the law, and have articles laid unto you.

Then they espied Mr. Cox, the lawyer, and called him in, and said, Here is a lawyer can tell you are bound by the law to answer. And he said as they had said.

Collins. Do ye not believe, that after the consecration of the blessed sacrament of the altar, there remaineth no substance of bread, but the substance of Jesus Christ, both God and man?

Bland. Master Commissary, I know not by any law why ye should ask me that question more than any other man here.—And after a little talk, my lord of Dover asked me this question, Dost not thou believe, after the consecration, that it is the body of Christ? And I said, No, I do not so believe: for the scriptures do not teach me that there should remain the flesh of Christ, to eat as a man should eat man's flesh.

Then Mr. Glasier said, That was the opinion of the Capernautes; there is no man here of that opinion; and spake long of cutting of Christ's body, as men cut flesh in the shambles.

Then master doctour Faucet said, Mr. Bland, forasmuch as you and I were brought up both in one house, and born both in one parish, I would be as glad as any man alive to do you good; but ye may not thus stand against the church. For Christ saith, Ye must humble yourself, and take up his cross, and follow him. And to humble yourself in this place, is to be content, and not stick to your own judgment, but to humble yourself to the holy church, which hath determined, that after the consecration there remaineth no bread, but the natural body and blood of Christ.

Bland. Mr. Doctor, if ye take humbling of ourselves, in that place, to admit the determination of the church, then must we know by the scriptures that the same church determined nothing but according to the scriptures, as this is not: and therefore I do not believe any such transubstantiation, nor ever will, God willing. Then said he, I have done with you; I will no more pray for you than for a dog.

Then said Mr. Glasier, How think ye did Paul, when he said, "Is not the bread that we break a partaking of the body of Christ?" Did he mean bakers' bread?

Bland. Though he did not mean bakers' bread, that doth not prove that he brake natural and real flesh.

Glasier. No, by St. Mary, we say not so; but we say it is the natural body glorified, under the forms of bread and wine.

Bland. Then the apostles had it not as we have; or else his glorified body was crucified for us.

Glasier. Tush, ye do not understand the scriptures. For Christ's body was ever glorified, in that it was so marvellously united to the Godhead: yea, and he shewed his body divers times glorified, as in the mount Tabor; and when he walked on the water, we see he was light, and had no weight in him. Was not that then a glorified body?

Bland. Then belike Peter's body was glorified, if walking on the water was the deed of a glorified body; and the iron that Elizeus made to swim upon the water was glorified iron!

Tush! quoth my lord of Dover; that was done by prayer. But they made such a noise with laughing, that I heard no more what my lord said.

Bland. Masters, I know that it availeth us nothing to reason with you, no more than it booted you in the time of the gospel. For then neither the reason of Eekius, Cochlaeus, nor yet of detection of the devil's sophistry of my lord chancellor's doing, could take any place. And it is known to some that be here, that something I can say in them.

Dover. No, you know Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, and such other.

Bland. Indeed, my lord, I have seen part of their works.

Dover. That is seen by thee to-day.

Glasier. I was glad when I heard you say ye believed the Catholie church: and now go you from it.

Bland. No, that I do not.

Glasier. Ye know that Christ saith, "If thy brother have offended thee, go and reconcile him between thee and him. If he hear thee not, take two or three with thee, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all things may be established. If he hear not them, dic Ecclesiae; if he hear not the church, take him as an heathen." I pray you where could ye have found this church of your's fifty years ago?

Bland. Ye know that the true church did not at all times flourish, but was wonderfully perseented.

Then my lord cried, No more: I command you to hold your peace. Have him away, and bring in another.

Collins. Ye shall come again on Monday, at nine of the clock, and in the mean time ye shall have whom ye will to confer withal; your friend Dr. Faucet, or Mr. Glasier, if ye desire them.

Bland. I will refuse to talk with no man.

The Monday after we were brought forth to the same place again; and then Mr. Collins began to speak to me, but after what manner, it is clean out of my mind; but the end was, that I would reform myself. But as I did before, I demanded what they had to lay to my charge, and to see the law, which they said before I should see.

Dover. What needs that? we have enough against you, for ye denied to me transubstantiation in the sacrament.

Bland. I did refuse to answer, till ye promised that I should see the law, whereby ye may compel me to answer.

My lord took the scribe's book, and read the answer that I made to Dr. Faucet's reason, which I knew not that they had written.

Bland. My lord, I made you no such answer when ye asked me; I take Mr. Collins and Mr. Glasier to witness.—Then they brought forth a decretal, a book of the bishop of Rome's law, to bind me to answer, which my heart abhorred to look upon. The effect was, that the ordinary had authority to examine, and that they so examined must needs answer. But I said, that it meant of such as were justly suspected, as I was not. And here we had much communication: for I charged them with unjust imprisonment; which they could not avoid.

But Mr. Oxenden would have helped them, and said, the justices put me in prison for a sermon seditiously spoken, and for troubling a priest at mass.

Bland. That is not true: for after I had been ten weeks in prison, I was bailed, till I was cast in again, and, as the justice said, for the disobeying mine ordinary; which I never did.

Collins. Will ye be content to confer with some? It will be better for you; now we offer it you, because ye would not desire it.

Bland. As I did not refuse before, no more will I now. But I did not perceive before, but that one thing might have come, without any leave-asking, to confer the scriptures: and therefore I looked that Dr. Faucet would have come to me without desiring, if any commodity to me had been in conference; for though I was never able to do him good, yet once I was his tutor.

Collins. Are ye content to come to his chamber at afternoon?

Bland. Sir, I am a prisoner, and therefore it is meet that I obey, and come whither you will; and so departed.—At this time we were three. But they took another to appear before them the Tuesday se'nnight after: and when he came, I knew not what was done, but that I hear they excommunicated him, and let him go; his name was Miller, a clothier.

Here followeth a certain Conference between Mr. Bland and Mr. Mills, in which he confuted the absurd doctrine of Transubstantiation.

Mills. We say that Christ is in or under the sacrament really and corporally, which are the forms of bread and wine, and that there is his body contained invisibly; and the qualities which we do see, as whiteness and roundness, be there without substance by God's power, as quantity and weight be there also by invisible measure.

Bland. This is your own divinity, to make accidents the sacrament, and Christ's real body invisibly contained in them, and so to destroy the sacrament. And yet the doctors say, Materia sacramenti est panis et vinum: The matter of the sacrament is bread and wine. And God by his power worketh no miracles with Hoc est corpus meum; This is my body; so to change the substance of bread and wine into his body and blood, in that he maketh accidents to be without their substance by invisible measure. I am ashamed to see you so destroy Christ's sacrament, contrary to your own doctors, and trifle with God's word.

Mills. To Christ is given all power in heaven and earth, so that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be and is where he listeth; and is in the sacrament really and corporally, without occupying of a place; for a glorified body occupieth no place.

Bland. Mark your own reason: all power is given to Christ both in heaven and earth; by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he list: ergo, he is in the sacrament really and corporally, without occupying of place. I deny your argument; for it followeth neither of your major nor minor. And, first, I would learn of you, how you know that Christ listeth to be present at every priest's list: for if the priest list not to say your mass, then Christ listeth not to be there. Again, ye say all power is given unto Christ both in heaven and in earth, so that this is the cause, by your reason, that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he list: and by that reason he had no power of his Godhead till he had his human body, and then he was not equal with the Father in divinity: for all power was not given to Christ, before the humanity and the Godhead were knit together, neither was he the Son. Here is more danger than ye were aware of, if ye would stand to it with just judges.

Mills. We eat Christ's flesh and blood spiritually, when we receive it with faith and charity. And we also do eat it corporally in the sacrament; and the body that we so receive hath life. For the Godhead is annexed thereto: which although it be received with the body of Christ, yet it is not visible after a gross sort; and the flesh of Christ that we receive is lively, for it hath the Spirit of God joined to it. And if a man be drunken, it is not by receiving of the blood of Christ: for it is contrary to the nature of Christ's blood. If he be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without substance of blood.

Bland. I am glad that you are so much against all men, to say that Christ's body is alive in the sacrament; it may fortune to bring you to the truth in time to come. Methink it is evil to keep Christ's body alive in the pix; or else must ye grant, that he is alive in receiving, and dead in the pix. And ye say truth, that it is not the natural receiving of Christ's blood that maketh a man drunken; for it is the nature of wine that doth that, which ye deny not.

And more truth ye confess than ye did think, when ye said, If a man be drunken, it is by qualities and quantities, without the substance of blood; for indeed blood hath no such qualities with it. By which it is evident that there is no natural blood.

If a man be drunken with wine consecrated, it must be a miracle, as I think you will have it, that the said accidents should be without their natural substance, and work all the operation of both substance and accidents: and so it followeth, that a man may be drunken by miracle. The body that ye receive, ye say, is alive, because it is annexed to the Godhead; and the flesh that ye receive is lively, because it hath the Spirit of God joined to it.

This division is of your new inventions, to divide the body and the flesh, the one alive by the Godhead, the other lively by God's Spirit, and both one sacrament: ye make of it a thing so fantastical, that ye imagine a body without flesh, and flesh without a body; as ye do qualities and quantities without substance, and a living body without qualities and quantities.

Mills. If case so require, and there be a godly intent in the minister to consecrate, after the consecration thereof there is present the body and blood of Christ, and no other substance, but accidents without substance to a true believer.

Bland. Ye grant three absurdities: that in a tun of wine consecrated is nothing but accidents; and to increase it withal, ye have brought in two inconveniences; first, that it is not the word of God that doth consecrate, but the intent of the priest must help it; and if that lack, ye seem to grant no consecration, though the priest speak the word: and yet your doctors say, that the wickedness of the priest minisheth not the sacrament.

And to an unbeliever ye seem to say, that it is not the same that it is to the true believer; and then must the believer have something to do in the consecration. Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charibdim.

Mills. The substance of Christ's body doth not fill the mouse's belly: for although he doth receive the outward forms of bread and wine, yet he doth not receive the substance inwardly, but without violation. And a mouse doth not eat the body of Christ, to speak properly; for it doth not feed him spiritually or corporally, as it doth man, because he doth not receive it to immortality of the flesh.

Bland. Ye make not your doctrine plain to be understood: we must know how a mouse can receive the substance inwardly and outwardly. Ye say he doth not receive the substance inwardly, but without violation: ergo, with violation he receiveth the substance inwardly. Ye say that the mouse cannot violate Christ's body: but he violateth the substance that he eateth. And this your proper speech doth import as much as that the mouse should eat the sacrament to as great effect, and the same thing, as doth the unworthy receiver. For if that be the cause that she properly eateth not the body of Christ, because she doth not feed upon it spiritually nor corporally, nor receiveth it to my inducement of immortality, as ye say; then it followeth, that the unbeliever and the mouse receiveth both one thing. And yet it cannot be denied, but the mouse will live with consecrated bread; and then ye must grant this absurdity, that a substance is nourished and fed only with accidents.

Mills. Men's bodies be fed with Christ's body, as with immortal meat, by reason of the Godhead annexed, to eternal life; but men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine: and we deny that by the sacramental eating any gross humour turned into blood is made miraculously in the body.

Bland. Where it cannot be denied that a man may live, and naturally be nourished in his natural body, with the sacramental bread and wine consecrated; ye cannot avoid that. But then ye turn to the spiritual nourishing of man's body, by Christ's body and Godhead annexed; which is nothing to put away the absurdity, that either a man's natural body should be fed naturally with accidents, or else to have them changed into gross humours. But ye say, men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine; and then must ye needs grant that qualities and quantities must be made substance in man, or else is all that is the nutriment in man accidents, and no substance.

Mills. If the forms of bread and wine be burned, or worms engendered, it is no derogation to the body of Christ, because the presence of his body ceaseth to be there, and no substance cometh again.

Bland. Ye grant here that a substance may be made of accidents, as ashes or worms: but I think you will have it by your miracles; and this I count a greater absurdity than the other, that Christ's body should cease to be there, and no substance to come again; for no word in all the whole Bible seems to serve you for the ceasing of his presence, though we granted you (which we do not) that it were there. God Almighty open your hearts, if it be his will and pleasure, to see the truth. And if I thought not my death to be at hand, I would answer you to all the rest, in these and other my doings.

I submit myself to our Saviour Jesus Christ, and his holy word, desiring you in the bowels of Christ to do the same.

The last Appearance and Examination of Mr. John Bland.

Hitherto ye have heard the troublesome handling of this faithful and blessed servant of God, John Bland, tossed to and fro from prison to prison, from session to session. At last he was brought before the bishop of Dover, the commissary, and the archdeacon, at Canterbury, the 13th day of June. The name of this bishop was Richard Thornton; the commissary was Robert Collins, whom the cardinal by his letters patent had substituted to be his factor, before his coming over to England; the archdeacon was Nicholas Harpsfield. Under these a great number of innocent lambs of Christ were cruelly slain at Canterbury, among whom this aforesaid Mr. Bland was one of the first; (which were John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, Thomas Thacker, Humphrey Middleton, and William Cocker:) who, as it is said, being brought before the bishop and his colleagues, was examined of articles; to whom it was objected by the commissary, whether he believed that Christ was really in the sacrament, or no, &c. To this he answered, and said, that he believed that Christ is in the sacrament as he is in all other good bodies; so that he judged not Christ to be really in the sacrament.

Whereupon, the day being on Monday, he was bid to appear again upon Wednesday next, and from thence he was deferred again to Monday following, being the 20th of June, in the same Chapter-house, then to hear further what should be done in case he would not relent to their mind. The which day and place he appearing as before, was required to say his mind plainly and fully to the aforesaid articles, being again repeated to him.

This done, and his answers and confession taken, respite was given him yet a few days to deliberate with himself. So the 25th day of the said month of June, he making his appearance again in the said Chapter-house, there openly and boldly withstood the authority of the pope; whereupon his sentence was read, and so he condemned and committed to the secular power. Touching the form and tenor of the sentence, (because all their sentences of course agree in one,) read before in the history of Mr. Rogers.

The History of JOHN FRANKESH, HUMPHREY MIDDLETON, and NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

Having now passed over the examinations of Mr. Bland, let us further proceed to the rest of his fellow-captives, being joined the same time with him in the like cause and like affliction. The names of whom were John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphrey Middleton, Thacker, and Cocker; of whom Thacker only gave back. The rest constantly standing to the truth, were altogether condemned by the suffragan of Canterbury, the 25th of June, the year above expressed. Touching whose examinations I shall not need long to stand, forasmuch as the articles ministered against them were all one; so in their answers they little or nothing disagreed, as hereafter by the Lord's help you shall hear. In the mean time, because Nicholas Sheterden in his examinations had a little more large talk with the archdeacon and the commissary, I will first begin with the same.

The first Examination or Reasoning of Nicholas Sheterden, with Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon, and Mr. Collins, the commissary, for which they sent him to prison.

First, the archdeacon and commissary affirmed, that the very words of Christ, when he said, "This is my body," did change the substance, without any other interpretation or spiritual meaning of the words.

Shet. Then belike when Christ said, "This cup is my blood," the substance of the cup was changed into his blood, without any other meaning; and so the cup was changed, and not the wine.

Arch. Not so: for when Christ said, "This cup is my blood," he meant not the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Shet. If Christ spake one thing and meant another, then the bare words did not change the substance; but there must be a meaning sought as well of the bread as of the cup.

Arch. There must be a meaning sought of the cup otherwise than the words stand. But of the bread it must be understood only as it standeth, without any other meaning.

Shet. Then do ye make one half of Christ's institution a figure, or borrowed speech, and the other half a plain speech, and so ye divide Christ's supper.

Arch. Christ meant the wine, and not the cup, though he said, "This cup is my blood."

Shet. Then shew me whether the words, which the priest doth speak over the cup, do change the substance, or whether the mind of the priest doth it?

Arch. The mind of the priest doth it, and not the words.

Shet. If the mind of the priest doth it, and not the words, if the priest then do mind his harlot or any other vain thing, that thing so minded was there made; and so the people do worship the priest's harlot instead of Christ's blood: and again, none of the people can tell when it is Christ's blood, or when it is not, seeing the matter standeth in the mind of the priest. For no man can tell what the priest meaneth, but himself; and so are they ever in danger of committing idolatry.

Then was the archdeacon somewhat moved, and sat him down, and said to the commissary, I pray you, Mr. Commissary, speak you to him another while; for they are unreasonable and perverse answers, as ever I heard of. Then stood up the commissary, and said:

Com. Your argument is much against yourself; for ye grant that the bread is a figure of Christ's body: but the cup can be no figure of his blood, nor yet his very blood: and therefore Christ did not mean the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Shet. My argument is not against me at all: for I do not speak to prove that the cup is his blood, nor the figure of his blood, but to prove that the bare words being spoken of the priest, do not change the substance no more of the bread, than they do change the cup into blood.

Com. It could not be spoken of the cup, when he said, "This cup is my blood;" but he meant the wine in the cup.

Shet. Then it remaineth for you to answer my question to the archdeacon, that is, Whether the mind of the priest, when he speaketh over the cup, doth change it into blood, or the bare words?

Com. Both together doth it, the words and the mind of the priest together; yea, the intent and the words together doth it.

Shet. If the words and intent together do change the substance, yet must the cup be his blood, and not the wine; forasmuch as the words are, "This cup is my blood," and the intent, ye say, was the wine; or else the words take none effect, but the intent only.

After, the commissary in his chamber said, it was the intent of the priest before he went to mass, without the words; for the priest did intend to do as holy church had ordained; then the intent made the sacrament to take effect.

Shet. If the sacraments take effect of the intent of the priest, and not of God's word, then many parishes, having a priest that intendeth not well, are utterly deceived, both in baptizing, and also worshipping that thing to be God, which is but bread, because, for lack of the priest's intent, the words do take none effect in it; so that by this it is ever doubtful whether they worship Christ or bread, because it is doubtful what the priests do intend.

Then the commissary would prove to me that Christ's Manhood was in two places at one time, by these words of Christ, in John, the third chapter, where he saith, "No man ascendeth up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven;" that is to say, "the Son of man which is in heaven." By this he would prove, that Christ was then in heaven, and in earth also, naturally and bodily.

Shet. This place and others must needs be understood of the unity of the person, in that Christ was God and Man, and yet the matter must be referred to the Godhead, or else ye must fall into great error.

Com. That is not so: for it was spoken of the Manhood of Christ, forasmuch as he saith, the Son of man which is in heaven.

Shet. If ye will needs understand it to be spoken of Christ's Manhood, then must ye fall into the error of the Anabaptists, which deny that Christ took flesh of the Virgin Mary; for if there be no body ascended up but that which came down, where is then his incarnation? for then he brought his body down with him.

Com. Lo, how you seek an error in me, and yet see not how ye err yourself! For it cannot be spoken of the Godhead, except ye grant that God is passable, for God cannot come down, because he is not passable.

Shet. If that were a good argument, that God could not come down, because he is not passable; then it might be said by the like argument, that God could not sit, and then heaven is not his seat; and then say, as some do, that God hath no right hand for Christ to sit at.

Then the commissary affirmed plainly, that it was true, God hath no right hand indeed.

Shet. O what a spoil of Christ's religion will this be, that because we cannot tell how God came down, therefore we shall say, that he came not down at all; and because we cannot tell what manner of hand he hath, to say that he hath no hand at all; and then he cannot reach the utmost part of the sea. O misery! at length it will come to pass that God cannot sit, and then how can heaven be his seat? and if heaven be not his seat, then there is no heaven; and then at length I doubt you will say there is no God, or else no other God but such as the heathen gods are, which cannot go nor feel.

Com. Why, doth not the scripture say, that God is a Spirit? and what hand can a spirit have?

Shet. Truth it is, God is a Spirit, and therefore is worshipped in spirit and truth; and as he is a Spirit, so he hath a spiritual power, so he hath a spiritual seat, a spiritual hand, and a spiritual sword; which we shall feel, if we go this way to work as we begin. Because we know not what God hath, therefore if we say he hath none, then it may as well be said there is no Christ.

Then the commissary said, he would talk no more with me; and so departed. And also the commissary was compelled to grant, that Christ's testament was broken, and his institution was changed from that he left it: but he said they had power so to do.

My first answering after their Law was established.

Because I know ye will desire to hear from me some certainty of my estate, I was called before the suffragan and seven or eight of the chief priests, and examined of certain articles; and then I required to see their commission.

They shewed it to me, and said, There it is, and the king and queen's letters also. Then I desired to have it read: and so in reading I perceived, that on some notable suspicion he might examine upon two articles, Whether Christ's real presence were in the sacrament, and whether the Church of England be Christ's Catholic Church.

To that I answered, that I had been a prisoner three-quarters of a year, and, as I thought, wrongfully; reason would therefore that I should answer to those things wherefore I was prisoner.

The suffragan said, his commission was, I must answer directly, yea or no.

This commission, said I, was not general to examine whom he will, but on just suspicion.

He said, I was suspected and presented to him.—Then I required that the accusation might be shewed.

He said he was not bound to shew it, but he commanded me in the king and queen's name to answer directly.

Shet. And I as a subject do require of you justice: for that I have done I ask no favour.

He said I was suspected.—I bade him prove that suspicion, or what cause he had to suspect.

Suff. Thou wast cast into prison for that cause.

Shet. That was a pretty suspicion, because I had suffered imprisonment contrary to God's law and the realm, and therefore I must now for amends be examined of suspicion without cause, to hide all the wrong done to me before! For when I was cast into prison, there was no law but I might speak as I did: therefore in that point I could no more be suspect than you, which preached the same yourself not long before.

Suff. That was no matter to thee what I preached.

Shet. Well, yet in the king and queen's name I must answer directly; and therefore I require, as a subject, that ye do not extend beyond your commission, but prove me suspect more than yourself.

Then said Mr. Mills, I had written to my mother, and he did see the letter, wherein I persuaded my mother to my opinions.

Shet. In that I did but my duty, to certify her I was not in prison for any evil; and that was before the law also; and therefore no more suspicion was in me than was in them which taught the like.

Mills. Well, ye are required here to answer directly, or no.

Shet. First then, I require of you to prove this suspicion. And thus we tossed it to and fro; at last the bishop said, he himself did suspect me. I asked, whereby? Well, said he, I myself did suspect thee, and it is no matter whereby.

Shet. But your commission doth not serve you so to do, without cause of suspicion.

Suff. Well, yet did I suspect you.

Shet. It is not meet for you to be my accuser and my judge also, for that is too much for one man.

Mills. If you were a Christian man you would not be ashamed of your faith being required.

Shet. I am not ashamed indeed, I thank God, for if any man did come to me, either to teach or learn, I would declare it; but forasmuch as I perceive you come neither to teach nor to learn, I hold it best not to answer you.

Mills. If you will not, then will we certify the king's council.

Shet. I am therewith content that you should certify that I had suffered three quarters' prison wrongfully, and therefore I desire to be justified or condemned, first for that I suffered such imprisonment; and then I will not refuse to answer your articles, though they were a bushel of them. But to say that I would answer, whereby you should heal all your wrong done to me against the law of God and the realm, I will not.

Here much ado there was to prove that he had no wrong, and again, that it was not they that did it. But, said he, the commissary was one of them. He answered, No, it was the archdeacon. He said, You sat with him, and he asked your counsel in it; and yet if it were he, it was your church, except the archdeacon and you be divided one from another. Well, said they, will ye now deny what ye said then, and promise here to submit yourself henceforth, and ye shall be delivered?

Shet. I am not so much bound to you to grant any such promise; and again you shall well know that I would not promise to go cross the street for you: but if I did at any time offend your law, let me have the punishment; I ask no favour.

Then said they, that it was obstinacy in him that he would not answer, and a token that his faith was naught, seeing he was ashamed to utter it.

Nay, said he, you shall well know I am not ashamed of my faith; but because you do so greedily seek blood, I will answer only to that you have against me.

Suff. Nay, you shall answer to the articles, or else be condemned upon suspicion.

Shet. I am content with that; yet all men shall know that as ye suspect and can prove no cause, so shall ye condemn me without a matter, and then shall all men know ye seek my blood, and no justice.

Suff. No, we seek not thy blood, but thy conversion.

Shet. That we shall see; for then shall you prove my perversion first, before you condemn me on your suspicion, without proof of the same; and by that I shall know whether you seek blood or no.

At last stepped up one Lovels, a lawyer, which would prove his imprisonment not to be wrong, but right, by old statutes of Edward IV. and Henry, &c. but at last he was compelled to forsake those statutes from Michaelmas to Christmas, and then he said it was no wrong. To this Nicholas said, if he could prove that men might wrongfully imprison before a law, and in the mean while make laws, and then under that hide the first wrong, then he said true, or else not.

The last Examination, with the Condemnation of Mr. Bland, John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphrey Middleton.

And thus much touching the particular examinations of Nicholas Sheterden, and of Mr. Bland. Now to touch something also of the other martyrs, which the same time were examined, and suffered with them together, to wit, Humphrey Middleton, of Ashford, and John Frankesh, vicar of Rolvynden, in the dioecese of Kent above-mentioned, here first would be declared the articles which publicly in their last examinations were jointly and severally ministered unto them by the aforesaid Thornton, bishop of Dover.

To the seven articles then being propounded to the five persons above-named, to wit, John Frankesh, John Bland, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphrey Middleton, and one Thacker, first answered John Frankesh somewhat doubtfully, desiring further respite to be given him of fourteen days. Thacker alone relented, and was content to take penance. Thus the aforesaid four were condemned by the bishop of Dover, the 25th day of June, anno 1555.

And so being given to the secular power, they were burned at Canterbury, the 12th of July, at two several stakes, but all in one fire together; where they in the sight of God, and of his angels, and before men, like true soldiers of Jesus Christ, gave a faithful testimony to the truth of his holy gospel, sealing with their blood the doctrines which they had so constantly professed.

The Prayer of Mr. Bland before his Death.

"The Lord Jesus, for whose love I do willingly leave this life, and desire rather the bitter death of his cross, with the loss of all earthly things, than to abide the blasphemy of thy holy name, or else to obey man in breaking of thy commandments; thou seest, O Lord, that whereas I might live in worldly wealth to worship false gods, and honour thy enemy, I chose rather the torments of this body, and loss of this my life, and have counted all things but vile dust and dung, that I might win thee: which death is more dear unto me than thousands of gold and silver. Such love, O Lord, hast thou laid up in my breast, that I hunger for thee, as the deer that is wounded desireth the soil. Send thy holy comforter, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and strengthen, this weak piece of earth, which is void of all strength of itself. Thou rememberest, O Lord, that I am but dust, and not able to do any thing that is good. Therefore, O Lord, as thou of thy accustomed goodness hast bidden me to this banquet, and counted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongst thine elect; give me strength against this element, that as it is to my sight most irksome and terrible, so to my mind it may be, at thy commandment, as an obedient servant, sweet and pleasant; and through the strength of thy holy Spirit, I may pass through the strength of this fire, into thy bosom, according unto thy promise, and for this mortality to receive immortality, and for this corruptible to put on incorruption. Accept this burnt-offering and sacrifice, O Lord, not for the sacrifice itself, but for thy dear Son's sake my Saviour; for whose testimony I offer this free-will offering with all my heart and with all my soul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my sins, as I forgive the whole world. O sweet Saviour, spread thy wings over me. O God, grant me thy Holy Ghost, through whose merciful inspiration I am come hither. Conduct me unto everlasting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit; Lord Jesus, receive my soul. So be it."

The Prayer of Nicholas Sheterden before his Death.

"O Lord, my God and Saviour, which art Lord in heaven and earth, maker of all things visible and invisible, I am the creature and work of thy hands; Lord God, look upon me, and other thy people, which at this time are oppressed of the worldly-minded for thy law's sake; yea, Lord, thy law itself is now trodden under foot, and men's inventions exalted above it; and for that cause do I, and many, refuse the glory, praise, and commodity of this life, and do choose to suffer adversity, and to be banished; yea, to be burnt with the books of thy word, for the hope's sake that is laid up in store. For, Lord, thou knowest, if we would but seem to please men in things contrary to thy word, we might by their permission enjoy these commodities that others do, as wife, children, goods, and friends, which all I acknowledge to be thy gifts, given to the end I should serve thee. And now, Lord, that the world will not suffer me to enjoy them, except I offend thy laws, behold, I give unto thee my whole spirit, soul, and body; and, lo, I leave here all the pleasures of this life, and do now leave the use of them for the hope's sake of eternal life purchased in Christ's blood, and promised to all them that fight on his side, and are content to suffer with him for his truth, whensoever the world and the devil shall persecute the same.

"O Father, I do not presume unto thee in mine own righteousness; no, but only in the merits of thy dear Son, my Saviour. For the which excellent gift of salvation I cannot worthily praise thee, neither is my sacrifice worthy, or to be accepted with thee, in comparison of our bodies mortified, and obedient unto thy will: and now, Lord, whatsoever rebellion hath been or is found in my members against thy will, yet do I here give unto thee my body to the death, rather than I will use any strange worshipping; which I beseech thee accept at my hand for a pure sacrifice. Let this torment be to me the last enemy destroyed, even death, the end of misery, and the beginning of all joy, peace, and solace; and when the time of resurrection cometh, then let me enjoy again these members then glorified, which now be spoiled and consumed by the fire. O Lord Jesus, receive my spirit into thy hands. Amen.

NICHOLAS HALL and CHRISTOPHER WAID, Martyrs.

The same month of July, next after the suffering of the Kentish men above-named, followed the death and martyrdom of Nicholas Hall, bricklayer, and Christopher Waid, of Dartford, which both were condemned by Maurice, bishop of Rochester, about the last day of the month of June. The six articles ministered to them were of the same ordinary course and effect with the articles of the other martyrs before specified.

The Execution and Martyrdom of Christopher Waid.

Christopher Waid, of Dartford, in the County of Kent, linen-weaver, was condemned by Maurice, bishop of Rochester, and appointed to be burned at Dartford aforesaid. At the day appointed for his execution, which was in the month of July, there was betimes in the morning carried out of the town in a cart, a stake, and therewith many bundles of reeds, to a place a quarter of a mile out of the town, called the Brinth, into a gravel-pit thereby, the common place of the execution of felons. Thither also was brought a load of broom faggots, with other faggots and tall wood. Unto which place resorted the people of the country in great number, and there tarried his coming; insomuch, as thither came divers fruiterers with horse loads of cherries, and sold them. About ten of the clock cometh riding the sheriff, with a great many other gentlemen and retinue, appointed to assist him therein, and with them Waid, riding, pinioned by one Margery Polley, of Tunbridge, both singing of a psalm; which Margery, as soon as she espied afar off the multitude gathered about the place where he should suffer, waiting his coming, she said unto him very loud and cheerfully, You may rejoice, Waid, to see such a company gathered to celebrate your marriage this day.

And so passing by the place, which joined hard to the highway, they were carried straight down to the town, where she was kept until the sheriff returned from Waid's execution. And Waid being made ready, and stripped out of his clothes in an inn, had brought in to him a fair long white shirt from his wife, which being put on, and he pinioned, was led up on foot again to the aforesaid place; and coming straight to the stake, he took it in his arms, and kissed it, setting his back unto it, and standing in a pitch-barrel, which was taken from the beacon, being hard by. Then a smith brought a hoop of iron, and with two staples made him fast to the stake under his arms.

As soon as he was thus settled, he spake, with his hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, with a cheerful and loud voice, the last verse of the 86th Psalm: "Shew some good token upon me, O Lord, that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed: because thou, Lord, hast helped me and comforted me." Near unto the stake was a little hill, upon the top whereof were pitched up four stays, quadrangle wise, with a covering round about like a pulpit; into which place (as Waid was thus praying at the stake) entered a friar with a book in his hand; whom when Waid espied, he cried earnestly unto the people, to take heed of the doctrine of the Whore of Babylon, exhorting them to embrace the doctrine of the gospel preached in king Edward's days. Whom the sheriff, thus speaking to the people, often interrupted, saying, Be quiet, Waid, and die patiently. I am, said he, I thank God, quiet, Mr. Sheriff, and so trust to die. All this while the friar stood still, looking over the coverlet, as though he would have uttered somewhat. But Waid very mightily admonished the people to beware of that doctrine; which when the friar perceived, (whether he were amazed, or could have no audience of the people,) withdrew himself out of the place immediately, without speaking any word, and went away down to the town.

Then the reeds being set about him, he pulled them, and embraced them in his arms, always with his hands making a hole against his face, that his voice might be heard; which they perceiving that were his tormentors, always cast faggots at the same hole, which, notwithstanding, he still as he could put off, his face being hurt with the end of a faggot cast thereat. Then fire being put unto him, he cried unto God often, Lord Jesus, receive my soul! without any token or sign of impatiency in the fire, till at length, after the fire was once thoroughly kindled, he was heard by no man to speak, still holding his hands up over his head towards heaven, even when he was dead, and altogether roasted, as though they had been stayed up by a prop under them.

This sign did God shew upon him, whereby his very enemies might perceive that God had, according to his prayer, shewed such a token upon him, even to their shame and confusion. And this was the order of this godly martyr's execution, this was his end; whereby God seemed to confound and strike with the spirit of dumbness the friar, who was risen up to have spoken against him; and also no less wonderfully sustained those hands which he lifted up to him for comfort in his torment.

The Apprehension, Examination, Condemnation, and Burning, of DIRICK CARVER and JOHN LAUNDER.

The 22d day of July, 1555, was burned at Lewes, within the county of Sussex, one Dirick Carver, late of the parish of Brighthamsted, in the same county. And the next day, being the 23d day of the same month, was also burned at Stening another, named John Launder, late of Godstone, in the county of Surry. Which two men were, with others, about the end of the month of October, anno 1554, apprehended by Edward Gage, gentleman, as they were at prayer within the dwelling-house of the said Dirick; and by him were sent up unto the queen's council. Who after examination, sent them as prisoners to Newgate, there to attend the leisure of Bonner, bishop of London. From whence (upon the bishop's receipt of a letter from the lord marquis of Winchester) they were brought by the keeper of the prison the 8th of June next after, into the bishop's chamber at his house in London; and there being examined upon divers points of religion, they made their several confessions, subscribing and signing them with their own hands. Which being read, the bishop objected unto them certain other articles, causing them to swear truly, and directly to answer thereunto: which articles they confessed to be true, referring themselves chiefly to their former confessions.

This done, after long persuasions and fair exhortations, they were demanded whether they would stand to their answers? To whom Launder said, I will not go from these answers so long as I live. The other also affirmed the same; and therefore they were commanded to appear again before the bishop in the Consistory at Paul's the 10th of the same month; which articles and confession do here ensue.

The Confession of Dirick Carver, before Bonner, bishop of London.

Dirick Carver, beer-brewer, of Brighthamsted, in the county of Sussex, where he hath dwelled by the space of eight or nine years, born in the village of Dilson, by Stockom, in the land of Lake, forty years of age, or thereabout, and now prisoner in Newgate, where he hath remained at the council's commandment since Allhallow-day last past; being examined concerning his faith and belief in the sacrament of the altar, saith that he hath and doth believe, that the very substance of the body and blood of Christ is not in the said sacrament, and that there is no other substance remaining in the said sacrament, after the words spoken by the priest, but only the substance of bread and wine.

Item, Being examined concerning the mass in Latin, now used in the church of England, he believeth that there is no sacrifice in the said mass, and that there is in it no salvation for a Christian man, except it should be said in the mother tongue, that he might understaid it; and concerning the ceremonies of the church, he saith and believeth that they be not profitable to a Christian man.

Item, Being examined concerning auricular confession, he answereth, that he hath and doth believe that it is necessary to go to a good priest for good counsel; but the absolution of the priest, laying his hand on any man's head, as is now used, is nothing profitable to a Christian's salvation. And further he saith, that he hath not been confessed, nor received the sacrament of the altar, since the coronation of the queen that now is.

Item, Concerning the faith and religion now taught, set forth, and believed, in the church of England, he answereth and believeth, that the faith and doctrine now taught, set forth, and used, in the said church of England, is not agreeable to God's word. And furthermore he saith, that bishop Hooper, Cardmaker, Rogers, and others of their opinion, which were of late burned, were good Christian men, and did preach the true doctrine of Christ, as he believeth, and did shed their blood for the same.

And further being examined, he saith, that since the queen's coronation, he hath had the Bible and Psalter in English read in his house at Brighthampsted divers times, and likewise since his coming into Newgate; but the keeper hearing thereof, did take them away. And saith also, that about a twelvemonth now past he had the English procession said in his house, with other English prayers. And further said, that Thomas Iveson, John Launder, and Wm. Vesie, being prisoners with him in Newgate, were taken with this examine in his house at Brighthamsted, as they were hearing of the gospel then read in English, a little before Allhallow-day last past, and brought into the court; and being examined thereupon by the council, were committed by them to prison in Newgate.

The Confession of John Launder, before Bonner, bishop of London.

John Launder, husbandman, of the parish of Godstone, in the county of Surry, of the age of twenty-five years, born at Godstone aforesaid, being examined, doth confess and say, that about two days next before Allhallow-tide last past, this examine and one Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveson,

William Vesie, with divers other persons to the number of twelve, (being all together in their prayers, saying the service in English, set forth in the time of king Edward VI. in the house of the said Dirick, situate at Brighthamsted, in Sussex,) were apprehended by one Mr. Edward Gage, and by him sent up hither to London, to the king and queen's council, and by them (upon his examination) committed to Newgate, where he with his said other fellows hath ever since remained in prison.

And further being examined, he doth confess and say, that the occasion of his coming to the said Brighthamsted was upon certain business there to be sped for his father; and so being there, and hearing that the said Dirick was a man that did much favour the gospel, this examinee did resort to his house and company, whom before that time he did never see or know, and by reason of that his resort he was apprehended as before. And further doth confess and believe, that there is here in earth one whole and universal Catholic church, whereof the members be dispersed through the world, and doth believe also that the same church doth set forth and teach only two sacraments, viz. the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of our Lord; and whosoever doth teach or use any more sacraments, or yet any ceremonies, he doth not believe that they be of the Catholic church, but doth abhor them from the bottom of his heart. And doth further say and believe, that all the services, sacrifices, and ceremonies, now used in this realm of England, yea, and in all other parts of the world, which hath been used after the same manner, be erroneous and naught, and contrary to Christ's institution.

Also he doth confess and believe, that in the sacrament (now called the sacrament of the altar) there is not really and truly contained, under the forms of bread and wine, the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance; but his belief and faith therein is as followeth, viz. that when he doth receive the material bread and wine, he doth receive the same in a remembrance of Christ's death and passion, and so receiving it, he doth eat and drink Christ's body and blood by faith, and none otherways, as he believeth.

And moreover he doth confess, say, and believe, that the mass now used in the realm of England, or elsewhere in all Christendom, is naught and abominable, and directly against God's word, and his Catholic church, and that there is nothing said or used in it good and profitable.

Also he doth believe and confess, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made to any priest, or to any other creature, but every person ought to acknowledge and confess his sins only to God; and also that no person hath any authority to absolve any man from his sins, and also believeth that the right and true way (according to the scripture) after a man hath fallen from grace to sin, to arise to Christ again, is to be sorry for his offences, and to do the same or the like no more; and not to make any auricular confession of them to the priest, either to take absolution for them at the priest's hands. All which his said opinions he hath believed by the space of these seven or eight years past, and in that time hath divers and many times openly argued and defended the same, as he saith, &c.

Upon Monday, being the tenth day of June, these two persons, with others, were brought by the keeper unto the bishop's consistory, as it was before commanded, at one of the clock in the afternoon, where the bishop first beginning with the said Dirick Carver, caused his confession, with the articles and answers, to be openly read unto him, (which order he kept as the condemnation of every prisoner,) asking him whether he would stand to the same? To whom the said Dirick answered, that he would: For your doctrine (quoth he) is poison and sorcery; if Christ were here, you would put him to a worse death than he was put to before. You say, that you can make a god!—ye can make a pudding better. Your ceremonies in the church be beggary and poison. And further I say, that auricular confession is contrary to God's word, and even poison.

The bishop seeing his constancy, and that neither his accustomed flatteries nor yet his cruel threatenings could once move this good man to incline to their idolatry, pronounced his usual and general blessing, as well towards this Dirick, as also upon the said John Lannder, although severally; who (after the like manner of process used with him) remained in the same constancy as did the other; and therefore were both delivered unto the sheriffs, who were there present, but afterwards were conveyed to the places above-named, and there most joyfully gave their bodies to be burned in the fire, and their souls into the hands of Almighty God, by Jesus Christ, who hath assured them to a better hope of life.

This Dirick was a man whom the Lord had blessed as well with temporal riches as with his spiritual treasures; which riches yet were no clog or let unto his true professing of Christ, the Lord by his grace so working in him; of which there was such havoc made by the greedy raveners of that time, that his poor wife and children had little or none thereof.

During his imprisonment, although he was well stricken in years, and as it were past the time of learning, yet he so spent his time, that being at his first apprehension utterly ignorant of any letter of the book, he could before his death read perfectly any printed English.—Whose diligence and zeal are worthy no small commendation, and therefore I thought it good not to pass it over in silence, for the encouragement and example of others.

Moreover, at his coming into the town of Lewes to be burned, the people called upon him, beseeching God to strengthen him in the faith of Jesus Christ. He thanked them, and prayed unto God that of his mercy he would strengthen them in the like faith. And when he came to the sign of the Star, the people drew near unto him, where the sheriff said, that he had found him a faithful man in all his answers. And as he came to the stake, he kneeled down and made his prayers, and the sheriff made haste.

Then his book was thrown into the barrel, and when he had stripped himself, as a joyful member of God, he went into the barrel himself. And as soon as ever he came in, he took up the book, and threw it among the people; and then the sheriff commanded in the king and queen's name, on pain of death, to throw in the book again. And immediately that faithful member spake with a joyful voice, saying:

“Dear brethren and sisters, I witness to you all, that I am come to seal with my blood Christ's gospel, because I know that it is true; it is not unknown unto all you, but that it hath been truly preached here in Lewes, and in all places of England, and now it is not. And because that I will not deny here God's gospel, and be obedient to man's laws, I am condemned to die. Dear brethren and sisters, as many of you as do believe upon the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, unto everlasting life, see you do the works appertaining to the same. And as many of you as do believe upon the pope of Rome, or any of his laws, which he sets forth in these days, you do believe to your utter condemnation, and except the great mercy of God prevent, you shall burn in hell perpetually.”

Immediately the sheriff spake unto him, and said, If thou dost not believe on the pope thou art damned, body and soul. And further the sheriff said unto him, Speak to thy God, that he may deliver thee now, or else to strike me down to the example of this people: but this faithful member said, The Lord forgive you your sayings.

And then spake he again to all the people there present, with a loud voice, saying, "Dear brethren, and all you whom I have offended in words or in deed, I ask you for the Lord's sake to forgive me, and I heartily forgive all you which have offended me in thought, word, or deed." And he said further in his prayer, "O Lord my God, thou hast written, He that will not forsake wife, children, house, and all that ever he hath, and take up thy cross, and follow thee, is not worthy of thee: but thou, Lord, knowest that I have forsaken all, to come unto thee. Lord, have mercy upon me, for unto thee I commend my spirit; and my soul doth rejoice in thee." These were the last words of that faithful member of Christ, before the fire was put to him. And after that the fire came to him, he cried, O Lord, have mercy upon me! and sprung up in the fire, calling upon the name of Jesus; and so he ended.

THOMAS IVESON, Martyr.

At Chichester, about the same month, was burned one Thomas Iveson, of Godstone, in the county of Surry, carpenter; whose apprehension, examination, and condemnation, forasmuch as it was at one time, and in one form, with Dirick Carver and John Launder, I do here omit, referring the reader to their history and process before mentioned, saving only this his several confession and private answers made before bishop Bonner at his last examination in the Consistory, I thought not good to omit; who being examined upon the aforesaid articles, answered as followeth:

1. Item, That I believed that there is but one Catholic, Universal Church of Christ, through the whole world, which hath and holdeth the true faith, and all the necessary articles of Christian belief, and all the sacraments of Christ, with the true use and administration of the same.

2. Item, That he is necessarily bounden to believe, and give credit, in all the said faith, articles of belief, religion, and the sacraments of Christ, and the administration of the same.

3. Item, That the faith, religion, and administration of sacraments, which now is believed, used, taught, and set forth, in this our church of England, is not agreeing with the truth and faith of Christ, nor with the faith of the said Catholic and Universal Church of Christ.

4. Item, Concerning the sacrament of the altar, he believeth that it is a very idol, and detestable before God as it is now ministered.

5. Item, That the mass is wicked, and not of the institution of Christ, but that it is of man's invention. And being demanded whether any thing used in the mass be good, he said that he would answer no further.

6. Item, That he had not received the sacrament of the altar since it had been ministered as now it is in England, neither was confessed at any time within these seven years; nor he hath not heard mass by the same space.

7. Item, That auricular confession is not necessary to be made to a priest; for that he cannot forgive nor absolve him from his sins.

8. Item, Concerning the sacrament of baptism, that it is a sign and token of Christ, as circumcision was, and none otherwise; and he believeth that his sins are not washed away thereby, but his body only washed: for his sins be washed away only by Christ's blood.

9. Item, That there be in the Catholic Church of Christ only two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of the Lord, and no more, which are not rightly used at this present time in England, and therefore be unprofitable.

10. Item, He believeth that all ceremonies now used in the church of England are vain, superfluous, superstitious, and wicked.

Furthermore, the said Iveson being earnestly desired to recant, said in this wise: "I would not recant and forsake my opinion, and belie, for all the goods in London; I do appeal to God's mercy, and will be none of your church, nor submit myself to the same; and that I have said, I will say again. And if there came an angel from heaven, to teach me any other doctrine than that which I am now in, I would not believe him." Which answer thus made, he was condemned as an heretic, and with the same persons was committed to the secular power, as they term it; and at the place above mentioned was burned, persevering still in his faith unto the end.

JOHN ALEWORTH.

In the latter end of this month of July, John Aleworth died in prison, at the town of Reading, being there in bonds for the cause and testimony of the truth of the Lord's gospel.—Whom although the Catholic prelates, according to their usual solemnity, did exclude out of their Catholic burial; yet we see no cause why to exclude him out of the number of Christ's holy martyrs, and heirs of his holy kingdom.

JAMES ABBES, a Martyr of blessed memory, suffering for the true cause of Christ's Gospel.

Among many that travelled in these troublesome days to keep a good conscience, these was one James Abbes, a young man, which through compulsion of the tyranny then used, was enforced to have his part with his brethren in wandering and going from place to place, to avoid the peril of apprehending. But when time came that the Lord had another work to do for him, he was caught by the hands of wicked men, and brought before the bishop of Norwich, Dr. Hopton; who examining him of his religion, and charging him therewith very sore, both with threats and fair speeches, at the last the said poor James did yield, and relented to their naughty persuasions, although his conscience consented not thereto.

Now when he was dismissed, and should go from the bishop, the bishop calling him again, gave him a piece of money, either 60d. or 20d. whether I know not; which when the said James had received, and was gone from the bishop, his conscience began to throb, and inwardly to accuse his fact, how he had displeased the Lord by consenting to their illusions: in which grievous combat with himself being piteously vexed, he went immediately to the bishop again, and there threw him his said money which he had received at his hand, and said, it repented him that he ever gave his consent to their wicked persuasions, and that he gave his consent in taking of his money.

Now this being done, the bishop with his chaplains did labour afresh to win him again, but in vain; for the said James Abbes would not yield for any of them, although he had played Peter before through infirmity; but stood manfully in his Master's quarrel to the end, and abode the force of the fire, in the consuming of his body into ashes; which tyranny of burning was done in Bury the 2d day of August, anno 1555.

A Discourse of the Apprehension, Examination, and Condemnation of JOHN DENLEY, Gentleman, JOHN NEWMAN, and PATRICK PACKINGHAM, martyred for the Testimony of Christ's Gospel.

In the midst of this tempestuous rage of malignant adversaries, persecuting and destroying the poor flock of Christ, many there were, which, though they were not spiritual men, yet thought to help forward for their parts, and, as one would say, to heap up more coals to this furious flame of persecution; whether of a blind zeal or a pharisaical flattery, I know not. Amongst which was one Edmund Tyrel, esq. and at that time a justice of peace within the county of Essex, an assister, as it seemeth, to cruel murderers of God's saints: who, as he came from the burning and death of certain godly martyrs, met with John Denley, gentleman, and one John Newman, both of Maidstone, in Kent, travelling upon the way, and going to visit such their godly friends as then they had in the county of Essex. And upon the sight of them, first upon suspicion apprehended and searched them, and at last finding the confessions of their faith in writing about them, sent them up unto the queen's commissioners.

Forasmuch as mention is made of a certain writing in paper found about them of their faith; what this writing was, and what were the contents of it, the copy thereof ensueth:

Certain Notes collected and gathered out of the Scriptures by John Denley, Gentleman, with a Confession of his Faith touching the Sacrament of Christ's body and blood, found about him ready written at his apprehension.

Christ is in the sacrament, as he is where two or three are gathered together in his name.

The difference of doctrine between the faithful and the Papists concerning the sacrament, is, that the Papists say that Christ is corporally under or in the forms of bread and wine; but the faithful say, that Christ is not there, neither corporally nor spiritually; but in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine, he is spiritually, but not corporally.

For figuratively he is in the bread and wine, and spiritually he is in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine; but really, carnally, and corporally, he is only in heaven, from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

My belief in the sacrament of the blessed body and blood of my Saviour Jesus Christ.

And concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, my belief is this, that the bread and wine is appointed unto a sacrament; and that after thanks be given to God the Father, then it doth represent unto me the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ; not that the bread is the body, or the wine the blood, but that I in faith do see that blessed body of our Saviour broken on the cross, and his precious blood plentifully shed for the redemption of my sins. Also in faith I hear him call us unto him, saying, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are laden, and I will refresh you," Isa. lv. a. b. Matt. xi. &c. In faith I come unto him, and I am refreshed; so that I believe that all that do come unto the table of the Lord in this faith, fear, and love, being sorry for their offences, intending earnestly to lead a godly conversation in this vale of misery, do receive the fruit of the death of Christ, which fruit is our salvation.

I do understand (spiritually) that as the outward man doth eat the material bread which comforteth the body, so doth the inward man (through faith) eat the body of Christ, believing that as the bread is broken, so was Christ's body broken on the cross for our sins; which comforteth our souls unto life everlasting, and signifying thereby, that even as that bread was divided among them, so should his body and fruit of his passion be distributed unto as many as believed his words. But the bread broken and eaten in the supper, monisheth and putteth us in remembrance of his death, and so exciteth us to thanksgiving, to laud and praise God for the benefits of our redemption.

And thus we there have Christ present; in the inward eye and sight of our faith we eat his body, and drink his blood; that is, we believe surely that his body was crucified for our sins, and his blood shed for our salvation.

Christ's body and blood is not contained in the sacramental bread and wine, as the Papists have said, and as some do yet say, as ye read in these scriptures following: First, read in St. Matt. ix. Luke v. Matt. xxiv. and xxvi. Mark xvi. Luke xxiv. John xiii. Luke xxiii. in the end, John xiv. xv. xvi. xvii. Acts i. iii. vii. ix. Rom. viii. Psal. viii. 1 Cor. x. xi. Exod. xiii. Col. i. Eph. i. iv. Phil. ii. 1 Thes. i. iv. Heb. i. v. viii. ix. x. xii. 1 Pet. iii. Psal. xi. lxxvii. ciii. x.

Christ's material body is not in all places, as these scriptures do testify hereafter.

First, read St. Matthew the last, Mark the last, Luke the last, John xi. 20, 21. These places of the scriptures do plainly declare, that his body that was born of the Virgin Mary, cannot be in more places than one, and that is in heaven, on the right hand of God, and not in the sacrament, nor in all places, as the Papists have affirmed and yet do affirm.

Therefore, whosoever they be that do worship the creatures of bread and wine, do commit idolatry, and make abominable idols of them, and take the glory from God, and give it to his creatures, which is contrary to the mind of God; as these scriptures hereafter do testify, first in Exod. xx. 22, 23, 24. Lev. xix. Deut. iv. vi. Psal. lxxx. Isa. xlv. Mal. ii. Mat. iv. Luke iv. Acts xiv. Rev. xiv. Psal. xcvi. 1 Cor. i. Eph. iv. 1 Tim. ii. 1 John v. Rev. xix. xxii.

JOHN DENLEY.

Now to return to the commissioners again: They receiving these prisoners before mentioned, after they saw they could little prevail with their own persuasions, sent them unto bishop Bonner, to be handled after his fatherly and charitable discretion; which how discreet and favourable it was, as well the history of others, as also the sequel of this, doth manifestly declare. For the 28th of June next following, he caused the said Denley and Newman, with one Patrick Packingham, to be brought into his chamber within his palace, there examining them upon their confessions, (which Tyrel had found about them,) objecting also unto them certain other articles of his own. To which they all answered in effect one thing, although Denley answered more largely than the others, and therefore I thought it enough only to manifest his, as sufficient, and in no part differing from the others, except that Packingham had one article of no great force objected to him, which the rest had not.

This done, the bishop used with them his accustomed persuasions; to which Mr. Denley said, God save me from your counsel, and keep me in the mind that I am in, for that you count heresy I take to be the truth: and thereupon they were commanded to appear in the bishop's consistory the fifth of July then next coming, in the afternoon, where these articles were objected against them:

The Articles objected by Edmund Bouuer, bishop of London, against John Denley, John Newman, and Patrick Packingham, jointly and severally, the 28th of June, 1555.

First, That the said Denley now is of the diocese of London, and the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

Secondly, That the said Denley hath not believed, nor doth believe, there is any Catholic church of Christ here in earth.

Thirdly, That the said D. hath not believed, nor doth believe, that this church of England is any part or member of the said Catholic church.

Fourthly, That the said D. hath believed and doth believe, that the mass now used in this realm of England is naughty and full of idolatry and evil, and plain against God's word, and therefore he, the said D. hath not heard it, nor will hear it.

Fifthly, That the said D. hath believed, and doth so believe, that auricular confession used now in this realm of England, is not good, but contrary to God's word.

Sixthly, That the said D. hath believed, and doth so believe, that absolution given by the priest hearing confession, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but is contrary thereto.

Seventhly, That the said D. hath believed, and doth so believe, that Christening of children, as it is now used in the church of England, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but against it; likewise, confirming of children, giving of orders, saying of matins and even-song, anointing or anelling of sick persons, making of holy bread and holy water, with the rest of the church.

Eighthly, That the said D. hath believed, and doth so believe, that there are but two sacraments in Christ's Catholic church, that is to say, the sacrament of baptism and sacrament of the altar.

Ninthly, That the said D. hath believed, and doth so believe, that forasmuch as Christ is ascended up into heaven, therefore the very body of Christ is not in the sacrament of the altar.

Tenthly, That thou Patrick Packingham, now being of the age of 21 at the least, being within the house of the bishop of London, at Paul's, and by him brought, to the great chapel to hear mass there, the said 23d of June, the year of our Lord 1555, didst irreverently stand in the said chapel, having thy cap on thy head all the mass while; and didst also refuse to receive holy water and holy bread at the priest's hands, there contemning and despising both the mass, and the said holy water and holy bread.

Answer of John Denley, and the rest, to the Articles objected.

To the first article I answer, it is very true. To the second article I answer, that it is not true: for I believe the holy Catholic church, which is builded upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Christ being the head; which holy church is the congregation of the faithful people, dispersed through the whole world, the which church doth preach God's holy word truly, and doth also minister the two sacraments, that is to say, baptism and the supper of the Lord, according to his blessed word.

To the third article I answer, that I do believe that this church of England, using the faith and religion which is now used, is no part or member of the aforesaid Catholic church, but is the church of Antichrist, the bishop of Rome being the head thereof; for it is plain that they have altered the testament of God, and set up a testament of their own devising, full of blasphemy and lies; for Christ's testament is, that he would have all things done to the edifying of the people, as it appeareth when he taught them to pray, Matt. iv. and also it appeareth by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiv.

Also it is written in the 46th Psalm, "For God is King of all the earth: O sing praises unto him with understanding," &c. So it doth appear that this church of England, now used, is not builded upon Christ, if St. Paul's words be true, and also the Psalms; therefore this church is not builded on the prophets, apostles, or Christ, as I before declared.

To this fourth article I answer, and I do believe, (as I have afore said,) that the mass, now used in this realm of England, is wicked and abominable idolatry, and blasphemy against God's holy word; for Christ in his holy supper instituted the sacraments of bread and wine, to be eaten together in remembrance of his death till he come, and not to have them worshipped, and make an idol of them: for God will not be worshipped in his creatures, but we ought to give him praise for his creatures, which he hath created for us. For he saith in the second commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath; thou shalt not bow down to them nor worship them." So that it appeareth by this commandment, that we ought not to worship the sacrament of bread and wine; for it is plain idolatry. For he saith, "No similitude;" therefore, "Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them." I pray you what do you call kneeling down, holding up the hands, knocking of the breast, putting off the cap, and making courtesy, with other like superstition? You would make men to be so blind, that this is no worshipping.

Peradventure you will object and say, You do not worship the bread and wine, but Christ's body which was born of the Virgin Mary, contained under the forms of bread and wine. But that is a very lie: for Christ's body that was born of the Virgin Mary is in heaven, if St. Paul's words be true, as undoubtedly they are: for he saith in the 10th of the Hebrews, "But this man, after he hath offered one sacrifice for sins, is set down for ever on the right hand of God, and from thence tarrieth till his foes be made his footstool."

Also, in the 9th chapter he saith, "For Christ is not entered into holy places that are made with hand, which are similitudes of true things, but is entered into very heaven, to appear now in the sight of God for us," &c. Also Phil. iii. "But our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Saviour, even the Lord Jesus Christ," &c. 1 Thes. i. "For they themselves shew of you, what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from images, to serve the living God, and to look for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from death, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come," &c. Also John xvi. "I went out from the Father, and came into the world." Again, "I leave the world, and go to the Father," &c. John xvii. "Now I am not in the world, and they are in the world, and I come to thee." All these places of the scripture, with other more, prove plainly to them that have ears to hear, that Christ's body that was born of the Virgin Mary is in heaven, and not in the sacramental bread and wine; and therefore it is idolatry to worship them, &c.

To this fifth article I answer, that I do believe, as I have afore said, that auricular confession is not good as it is now used. Touching my sins, wherein I have offended God, I must seek to him for remission thereof: for our Saviour Christ saith in the 11th of St. Matthew, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are laden, I will ease you," &c. The prodigal son (Luke xv.) saith, "I will arise and go to my father, and I will say to him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son," &c. Psalm xxxi. "I said, I will acknowledge mine offences, and accuse myself unto the Lord; and so thou forgavest me the wickedness of my sins," &c. Job xiii. "But I will reprove mine own ways in his sight; he shall make me whole: and there may no hypocrite come before him." Sirach (xxxiv.) saith, "Who can be eleasend of the unclean?" And there was but one of the ten lepers that were eleasend that came to Christ to give him thanks: he asked for the other nine. But if I have offended my neighbour, I must reconcile myself to my neighbour; and if I be a notorious sinner, after the first and second admonition, it ought to be declared to the congregation, and the minister of the congregation hath power by the word to excommunicate me, and I am to be taken as an heathen person, not for a day or forty days, but unto such time as I do openly in the congregation acknowledge my fault; then the minister hath power by the word to preach to me or them the remission of our sins in the blood of Jesus Christ, as it is written in the 13th of the Acts of the Apostles, and Matt. xviii. Other confession I know none.

To the sixth article, I, the said John Denley, have answered in the fifth.

To the seventh article I answer, that as touching the sacrament of baptism, (which is the christening of children,) it is altered and changed; for St. John used nothing but the preaching of the word and the water, as it doth appear, when Christ required to be baptized of him, and others also which came to John to be baptized, as it appeareth, Matt. iii. Mark i. Luke iii. And Acts viii. the chamberlain said, "See, here is water, what letteth me to be baptized?" It appeareth here that Philip had preached unto him; for he said, "Here is water." We do not read that he asked for any cream, nor oil, nor for spittle, nor conjured water, nor conjured wax, nor yet eroyson, nor salt; for it seemeth that Philip had preached no such things to him; for he would as well have asked for them as for water: and the water was not conjured, but even as it was afore. Also Acts x. "Then answered Peter, Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized? &c. Acts xvi. And Paul and Silas preached unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house; and he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their wounds; and so was he baptized, and all they of his household straightway." Where ye see nothing but preaching the word, and the water. The like also is to be said of the rest of the ceremonies of your church.

To the eighth article I answer shortly, that there be sacraments no more but two; baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, except ye will make the rainbow a sacrament: for there is no sacrament but hath a promise annexed to it.

To the ninth article I do answer you, that ye have my mind written already. For it was found about me when I was taken, and also ye know my mind in the fourth article, plainly expressed concerning the bodily presence: for Christ's body is in heaven, and will not be contained in so small a piece of bread. And as the words which Christ spake are true indeed, so must they also be understood by other of the scriptures which Christ spake himself, and also the apostles after him. And thus I make an end, &c.

By me, JOHN DENLEY.

The first day of the month of July, the said three prisoners were brought into the Consistory in St. Paul's church, where he proceeded against them after the usual form and manner of law, reading first their confessions, articles, and answers, and then tempting them, sometime with fair promises, other whiles with threatenings, which were always his chiefest arguments and reasons to persuade withal. In the end, seeing their unmoveable constancy, upon the 5th of July he condemned them as hereticks, and gave them unto the sheriffs of London, as to his common executioners, who kept them until they were commanded by writ to send them to their several places of suffering; which was for Mr. Denley, Uxbridge, where the 8th day of August he was burned; and being set in the fire with the burning flame about him, he sung in it a psalm.

Then cruel Dr. Story, being there present, commanded one of the tormentors to hurl a faggot at him; whereupon being hurt therewith upon the face that he bled again, he left his singing, and clapt both his hands on his face. Truly, quoth Dr. Story to him that hurled the faggot, thou hast marred a good old song!

The said John Denley being yet still in the flame of fire, put his hands abroad, and sung again, yielding at last his spirit into the hands of God through his Son Jesus Christ.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Denley at Uxbridge, which was the 8th of August, suffered also not long after Patriek Packingham, at the same town of Uxbridge, about the 28th of that month. This man was charged by Bonner, as ye heard in the 10th article before, for his behaviour shewed in the bishop's chapel, who at the mass-time there standing, would not put off his cap; which was taken for a heinous offence. The said Packingham also being strongly exhorted by Bonner to recant, protested in these words to the bishop, That the church which he believed was no Catholic church, but was the church of Satan, and therefore he would never turn to it, &c.

Furthermore, as touching the other, (who was John Newman, pewterer, dwelling at Maidstone in Kent,) he was burned the last of August, at Saffron Walden, in the county of Essex, whose examination, and confession of his faith and belief, for which he was cruelly burnt and persecuted, hereunder followeth:

John Newman first was apprehended in Kent, dwelling in the town of Maidstone, and there was examined before Dr. Thornton, suffragan, and others, at Tenderden. From thence he was brought to Bonner, and there condemned with Mr. Denley and Mr. Packingham, and burned at Saffron Walden, as is before storied. But because his examination and answers before the suffragan came not then to my hands, I thought here in this place to bestow them, rather than they should be utterly suppressed. And first what his answer was by writing to the said suffragan, after his apprehension, you shall hear by the tenor of his own words, as follow:

"It may please you to understand, that for the space of all the time of king Edward's reign, we were diligently instructed with continual sermons, made by such men whose faith, wisdom, learning, and virtuous living, was commended unto all men under the king's hand and seal, and under the hands of the whole council. These men taught diligently a long time, persuading us, by the allegations of God's word, that there was no transubstantiation, nor corporal presence in the sacrament. Their doctrine was not believed of us suddenly, but by their continual preaching, and also by our continual prayer unto God, that we might never be deceived : but if it were true, that God would incline our hearts unto it ; and if it were not true, that we might never believe it. We weighed that they laboured with God's word, and we asked the advice of our friends, neither could we find that they preached false doctrine. We considered also, as we did learn, that the king's grace and his council, and the most part of the whole realm, believed as they taught, because no man preached the contrary. Also we know that the preachers were commanded by the king and laws of the realm, to preach unto us such doctrine as was to the authority of God's word agreeable, and no other, and by their diligent setting forth of it by the king's commandment, and the consent of the whole council, and by the authority of the parliament, we embraced it, and received it as a very infallible truth, taught unto us for the space of seven years. Wherefore, until such time as our consciences are otherwise taught and instructed by God's word, we cannot with safeguard of our consciences take it, as many suppose at this time. And we trust in God that the queen's merciful highness, neither yet her most honourable council, will in a matter of faith use compulsion nor violence, because faith is the gift of God, and cometh not of man, neither of man's laws, neither at such time as men require it, but at such time as God giveth it."

The Examination and Answers of J. Newman, martyr, before Dr. Thornton and others.

First, one of the doctors beginneth, asking in this wise : How say you to this, "This is my body which is given for you?"

Newman. It is a figurative speech, one thing spoken and another meant ; as Christ saith, "I am a vine, I am a door, I am a stone," &c. Is he therefore a material stone, a vine, or a door?

Doc. This is no figurative speech : for he saith, "This is my body which is given for you ;" and so saith he not of the stone, vine, or door ; but that is a figurative speech.

New. Christ saith, "This cup is the new testament in my blood." If ye will have it so meant, then let them take and eat the cup.

Doc. Nay, that is not so meant ; for it is a common phrase of speech among ourselves : we say to our friend, Drink a cup of drink ; and yet we mean he should drink the drink in the cup.

New. Why, if ye will have the one so understood, ye must so understand the other.

Doc. Nay, it is a common use of speech to say, Drink a cup of ale or beer ; and therefore it is no figurative speech.

New. The often using of a thing doth not make that thing otherwise than it is ; but wheresoever one thing is spoken, and another meant, it is a figurative speech.

Doc. Well, we will not stand hereabout.—How say ye of the real presence? is not Christ's natural body there, that was born of the Virgin Mary?

New. No, I do not so believe, neither can I so believe ; for the soul of man doth not feed upon natural things, as the body doth.

Doc. Why, how then doth it feed?

New. I think the soul of man doth feed as the angels in heaven, whose feeding is only the pleasure, joy, felicity, and delectation, that they have of God : and so the soul of man doth feed and eat, through faith, the body of Christ.

Collins. Yea, but if the body do not feed upon natural things, the soul cannot continue with the body : therefore the body must needs feed upon natural things, that both may live together.

New. I grant it to be true ; but yet the soul doth live otherwise than the body which doth perish : therefore natural things do but feed the body only. I pray you what did Judas receive at the supper?

Col. Marry, Judas did receive the very body of Christ, but it was to his damnation.

New. Why, was the devil entered into him before? Then he had the devil and Christ in him at one time.

Col. Nay, the devil did enter into him afterward.

New. Yea, and before too : what do ye think? had he but one devil? Nay, I think he had rather a legion of devils at the latter end.

Col. Well, put the case it be so : what say you to that?

New. Marry, if Christ and the devil were both in Judas at once, I pray you how did they two agree together?

Col. We grant that they were both in Judas at that time : for Christ may be where the devil is, if he will ; but the devil cannot be where Christ is, except it please Christ.

New. Christ will not be in an unclean person that hath the devil.

Thornton. Why, will ye not believe that Christ was in hell? and ye will grant that the devil is there ; and so might he be in Judas, if it pleased him.

New. Christ would not suffer Mary Magdalen to touch him, which sought him at his grave, and did love him entirely ; much less will he suffer an ungodly man to receive him into his unclean body.

Thorn. Yes, seeing God may do all things, he may do what he list, and be where he will. And doth not the Psalm say, he is in hell, and in all places? why should we then doubt of his being there?

New. Though his Godhead be in all places, yet that is not sufficient to prove that his humanity is in all places.

Thorn. No! do you not believe that God is omnipotent, and may do all things?

New. I do believe that God is almighty, and may do all that he will do.

Thorn. Nay, but if he be omnipotent, he may do all things, and there is nothing impossible for him to do.

New. I know God is almighty, and can do all that he will : but he cannot make his Son a liar, he cannot deny himself, nor can he restore virginity once violated and defiled.

Thorn. What is that to your purpose? God doth not defile virginity : we speak but of things that God doth.

New. Why, will ye have the humanity of Christ in all places as the Deity is?

Thorn. Yea, he is in all places as the Deity is, if it please him.

New. I will promise you that seemeth to me a very great heresy, for heaven and earth are not able to contain the divine power of God ; for it is in all places, as here and in every place. And yet ye say, that wheresoever the Deity is, there is also the humanity, and so ye will make him no body, but a fantastical body, and not a body indeed.

Thorn. Nay, we do not say he is in all places as the Deity is, but if it please him he may be in all places with the Deity.

New. I promise you, that seemeth to me as great an heresy as ever I heard in my life, and I dare not grant it, lest I should deny Christ to be a very Man, and that were against all the scriptures.

Thorn. Tush, what shall we stand reasoning with him? I dare say he doth not believe that Christ came out of his mother, not opening the matrix. Do you believe that Christ rose from death, and came through the stone?

New. I do believe that Christ rose from death ; but I do not believe that he came through the stone, neither doth the scripture so say.

Thorn. No, how say you ! he doth not believe that Christ came through the stone ; and if he doth not believe this, how shall he believe the other ? If he could believe this, it were easy for him to believe the other.

New. The scripture doth not say he went through the stone, but it saith the angel of God came down and rolled away the stone, and for fear of him the keepers became even as dead men.

Thorn. Ah, fool, fool, that was because the women should see that he was risen again from death.

New. Well, the scripture maketh as much for me as it doth for you, and more too.

Thorn. Well, let us not stand any longer about this : back again to the real presence. How say ye, is the body of Christ really in the sacrament, or no ?

New. I have answered you already.

Thorn. Well, do ye not believe that it is there really ?

New. No, I believe it not.

Thorn. Well, will ye stand to it ?

New. I must needs stand to it, till I be persuaded by a further truth.

Thorn. Nay, ye will not be persuaded, but stand to your own opinion.

New. Nay, I stand not to mine own opinion, God I take to witness, but only to the scriptures of God, and that can all those that stand here witness with me, and nothing but the scriptures : and I take God to witness, that I do nothing of presumption, but that that I do is only my conscience ; and if there be a further truth than I see, except it appear a truth to me, I cannot receive it as a truth. And seeing faith is the gift of God, and cometh not of man, (for it is not you that can give me faith, nor no man else,) therefore I trust ye will bear the more with me, seeing it must be wrought by God ; and when it shall please God to open a further truth to me, I shall receive it with all my heart, and embrace it as his great gift.

The Arguments of John Newman.

If the body of Christ were really and bodily in the sacrament, then whosoever received the sacrament, received also the body : The wicked receiving the sacrament, receive not the body of Christ : Ergo, the body of Christ is not really in the sacrament.

Arg. They which eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ, dwell in him, and he in them. The wicked dwell not in Christ, nor he in them : Ergo, the wicked eat not the flesh, nor drink the blood, of Christ.

Arg. They that have Christ dwelling in them bring forth much fruit, John xv. "He that dwelleth in me, and I in him, bringeth forth much fruit : " The wicked bring forth no fruit of goodness : Ergo, they have not Christ's body dwelling in them.

Arg. Where remembrance is of a thing, there is imported the absence thereof : Remembrance of Christ's body is in the sacrament, " Do this in remembrance of me," &c. Ergo, Christ's body there is imported to be absent.

Marry, they will say, we see him not with our outward eyes, but he is commended under the forms of bread and wine, and that we see is nothing but a quality, or an accident. But let them shew me a quality or an accident without a substance, and I will believe them.

Thus much concerning Newman's examinations and arguments.

The Examinations, Answers, and Condemnation of WILLIAM COKER, WM. HOPPER, HENRY LAWRENCE, RICHARD COLLIAR, RICHARD WRIGHT, and WILLIAM STERE, before the Bishop of Dover.

Mention was made a little before of certain other Kentish men, called forth and examined by Thornton, bishop of Dover, N. Harpsfield, R. Faucet, and R. Collins : The names of these were William Coker, William Hopper, Henry Lawrence, Richard Colliar, Richard Wright, and W. Stere. To the articles brought against them they answered for themselves as followeth :

First, William Coker said, he would answer no otherwise than he had already answered ; and being offered to have longer respite of six days after, he refused to take it ; and so upon the same, sentence of condemnation was read against him the 11th of July.

William Hopper first seemed to grant to the faith and determination of the Catholic church ; after calling himself better to mind, constantly sticking to the truth, he was condemned the next week after, the 16th of July.

Henry Lawrence examined the 16th of July, and partly deferred to the 2d of August, answered to the articles objected against him, first denying auricular confession, and that he neither had nor would receive the sacrament ; because, saith he, the order of the holy scriptures is changed in the order of the sacrament.

Moreover, the said Lawrence was charged for not putting off his cap when the suffragan made mention of the sacrament, and did reverence to the same ; the said Lawrence answering in these words, " What ! ye shall not need to put off your cap : for it is not so holy that you need to put off your cap thereunto."

Further, being opposed concerning the verity of the sacrament given to Christ's disciples, he affirmed, that even as Christ gave his very body to his disciples, and confessed it to be the same ; so likewise Christ himself said he was a door, &c. adding, moreover, that as he had said before, so he saith still, that the sacrament of the altar is an idol, and no remembrance of Christ's passion, and contrary he knoweth not. At last, required to put to his hand in subscribing to his answers, he wrote these words under the bill of their examinations, Ye are all of Antichrist, and him ye fol— (an here they held his hand ; belike he would have written out follow, &c.) And so upon the same, sentence was given against him the 2d of August.

Richard Colliar, of Ashford, having the 16th of August to appear, examined of the sacrament of the popish altar, answered and said, that he did not believe that after the consecration there is the real and substantial body of Christ, but only bread and wine, and that it is most abominable, most detestable, and most wicked, to believe otherwise, &c. Upon this the sentence was read against him, and he condemned the 16th of August. After his condemnation he sang a psalm. Wherefore the priests and their officers railed at him, saying he was out of his wits.

Richard Wright, the same place and day, being the 16th of August, appearing, and required of the judge what he believed of the real presence in the sacrament, answered again, that as touching the sacrament of the altar and the mass, he was ashamed to speak of it, or to name it, and that he allowed it not, as it was used in the church. Against whom the sentence was also read the day and place afore said.

William Stere, of the aforesaid parish of Ashford, likewise detected and accused, was brought to appear the said 16th day of August; where he in the said chapter-house of Canterbury, being required to make answer to the positions laid unto him by the judge, made answer again, that he should command his dog, and not him: and further declared, that Dick of Dover (so they termed Richard Thornton, bishop of Dover,) had no authority to sit against him in judgment, and asked where his authority was? Who then shewed him certain bulls and writings from Rome, as he said. William Stere denying that to be of sufficient force, the said Dick said also he had authority from the queen. Then the martyr alleging that the bishop of Canterbury (who then was in prison) was his diocesan, urged him to shew his authority from the archbishop, or else he denied his authority to be sufficient. And as touching the sacrament of the altar, he found it not, he said, in the scripture, and therefore he would not answer thereunto.

And, moreover, the judge speaking of the sacrament of the altar, with reverence thereof and putting off his cap, he said, that he needed not to reverence that matter so highly. And thus (saying to the judge, that he was a bloody man, &c.) the sentence was pronounced against him; after which sentence being read, he said, that the sacrament of the altar was the most blasphemous idol that ever was, &c.

And thus these six heavenly martyrs and witness-bearers to the truth, being condemned by the bloody suffragan and archdeacon of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Fawcet, were burned all together in the same town of Canterbury, at three stakes and one fire, about the latter end of August.

RICHARD HOOK.

Likewise, Richard Hook, about the same season, and for the like matter, was burned at Chichester.

The Persecution of TEN MARTYRS together, sent by certain of the Councile to Bonner, to be examined.

After the burning of these six above named, next followed the persecution of ten other true servants and saints of the Lord; not such saints as the pope maketh, or which are mentioned in Legenda Sanctorum, or in Vitis Patrum, or in the fabulous book De Vita Sanctorum Wallensium, &c. but such as are spoken of in the holy Apocalypse, of whom it is written, "These be they that follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, and which have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb."—The names of these were Elizabeth Warne, George Tankerfield, Robert Smith, Stephen Harwood, Thos. Fust, William Hale, Thos. Leyes, George King, John Wade, and Joan Lashford.

The prisons of London beginning now to be replenished with God's saints, and still more and more coming in, the council and commissioners thinking to make ready despatch with the poor prisoners, caused these ten above named to be sent with their letter directed to Bonner, bishop of London, by him to be examined and rid out of the way. The copy of which their letter, with their names subscribed, here followeth to be read and noted:

A Letter sent by the Commissioners to the Bishop of London, Dr. Bonner.

"After our hearty commendations to your good lordship, we send you here John Wade, William Hale, George King, Thomas Leyes, of Thorpe, in Essex, Thomas Fust, hosier, Robert Smith, painter, Stephen Harwood, brewer, George Tankerfield, cook, Elizabeth Warne, Joan Lashford, of London, sacramentaries; all which we desire your lordship to examine, and to order according to the ecclesiastical laws: praying your lordship to appoint some of your officers to receive them at this bearer's hand.—And thus most heartily fare your lordship well. From London this 2d of July.

"Your lordship's loving friends,

"Nicholas Hare,	Richard Rede.
William Roper,	William Cooke."

The History of ELIZABETH WARNE, Widow, burnt at Stratford Bow.

Elizabeth Warne, widow, late the wife of John Warne, upholsterer, and martyr, who also was burned in the end of the month of May last past, as before in his story is recorded. This Elizabeth had been apprehended, amongst others, the first day of January, in a house in Bow-church yard, in London, as they were gathered together in prayer, and at that present was carried to the Compter, where she lay as prisoner until the 11th day of June; at which time she was brought into Newgate, and remained there in the like case unto the second day of July. Then she was sent by the king and queen's commissioners unto Bonner, bishop of London, who the 6th day of the same month caused her with divers others (as Robert Smith, George Tankerfield, &c.) to be brought before him into his palace, and there examined her upon sundry articles, such as of common order be ministered unto the poor saints and martyrs of God, as you may more plainly perceive by other more large and ample processes already mentioned.

The chiefest objection that he used either towards her, or the most part of those, was touching the real and corporal presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, as the chief ground and foundation for their Catholic dignity. Many other matters he objected against them, as for not coming to the church, for speaking against the mass, for despising their ceremonies and new-found sacraments, with divers other fond and trifling toys, not worthily any mentioning.

In the end, when she had been divers times brought before him and other his adherents, and there earnestly exhorted to recant, she said, "Do what ye will: for if Christ were in an error, then am I in an error." Upon which answer, she was the 12th day of the same month of July adjudged and condemned as an heretic, and so delivered unto the secular power, as they term it, to be by them put to death; which thing was accomplished in her the same month above mentioned.

The chief procurer of her death was Dr. Story, being as it is thought of some alliance either to her the said Elizabeth, or else to her late husband. Who, though he was at the first apprehension of his said kinswoman a very earnest suitor for her deliverance to Dr. Martin, then one of the king and queen's commissioners in matters of religion, (himself not being as yet made commissioner,) and had by his suit obtained her deliverance for that present, as Dr. Martin himself hath reported; yet afterwards, upon what occasion God only knoweth, except upon some burning charity, the said Dr. Story obtaining now the room of one of the commissioners, caused not only the said John Warne, but also his wife, and afterwards his daughter, to be again apprehended, never leaving them until he had brought them all to ashes. Such was the rage of that devout Catholic and white child of the mother church, that neither kindred nor any other consideration could prevail with him. The Lord rid his poor church from all such hydras!

GEORGE TANKERFIELD, a faithful Martyr and Witness of the Gospel.

George Tankerfield, of London, cook, born in the city of York, about the age of 27 or 28 years, was in king Edward's days a papist, till the time queen Mary came in, and then perceiving the great cruelty used by the pope's side, was brought into a misdoubt of their doings, and began (as he said) in his heart to abhor them. And as concerning the mass, whereof he had but a doubtful opinion before, and much striving with himself in that case; at length he fell to prayer, desiring God in mercy to open to him the truth, that he might be thoroughly persuaded therein, whether it were of God or no: if not, that he might utterly hate it in his heart, and abhor it. Which according to his prayer the Lord mercifully heard, working daily more and more in him to detest and abhor the same: and so he was moved to read the Testament, whereby (as he said) the Lord enlightened his mind with the knowledge of the truth, working lively faith in him to believe the same, and utterly to detest all papistry; and so he came no more to their doings. And not only that, but also this lively faith (said he) kindled such a flame in him, as would not be kept in, but utter itself by confession thereof, reproving his own former doings to his friends, exhorting them likewise to convert, and turn to the truth with him. And thus he began to be noticed among them, till at the last he was sent for, as followeth:

It pleased God to strike him with sickness, whereby he lay long; and on a certain day, to take the air abroad, he rose up; and went and walked into the Temple fields. In the mean season came Beard home to his house, and inquired for him, pretending to his wife, that he came only to have him to come and dress a banquet at the lord Paget's. The wife, because of his apparel, which was very brave, took him to be some honest gentleman, and so with all speed prepared herself to fetch her husband, having a good hope he should now earn some money; and lest this gentleman should be annoyed with tarrying, she fetched him a cushion to sit him soft, and laid a fair napkin before him, and set bread thereon, and came to her husband, who when he heard it, said, "A banquet, woman! indeed it is such a banquet as will not be very pleasant to the flesh: but God's will be done." And when he came home, he saw who it was, and called him by his name: which when his wife perceived, and wherefore he came, like a tall woman, would play Peter's part, and instead of a sword took a spit, and had run him through, had not the constable, which Beard had sent for by his man, come in withal, who rescued him; yet she sent a brickbat after him, and hit him on the back. And so Tankerfield was delivered to the constable, and brought to Newgate, about the last day of February, anno 1555, by the said Beard, yeoman of the guard, and Simon Ponder, pewterer, constable of St. Dunstan's in the West, sent in by Roger Chomley, knight, and by Dr. Martin.

Tankerfield thus being brought to prison by his adversaries, at length, with the others above named, was brought to his examination before Bonner; who, after his accustomed manner, brought his articles and positions unto him.

And after many fair words of exhortation, which Bonner then used, after his ordinary manner, to convert, or rather pervert, him, he answered boldly again, saying moreover, That the church whereof the pope is supreme head, is no part of Christ's Catholic church; and adding therunto, and pointing to the bishop, spake to the people, saying, Good people, beware of him, and such as he is, for these be the people that deceive you, &c.

These, with other words more, he spake; whereupon the bishop, reading the sentence of the popish condemnation, gave him to the secular power.

And so this blessed servant of God was had to St. Alban's, and there with much patience and constancy ended his life the 26th day of August, for the defence of the truth, which at length will have the victory.

Certain Notes concerning G. Tankerfield, after he came to suffer martyrdom at St. Alban's.

He was brought unto St. Alban's by the high sheriff of Hertfordshire, Edward Brocket, esq. and one Pulter of Hitchen, who was under-sheriff. Their inn was the Cross-keys, where was a great concourse of people to see and hear the prisoner; among which multitude some were sorry to see so godly a man brought to be burned, others praised God for his constancy and perseverance in the truth. Contrariwise, some there were which said, it was pity he did stand in such opinions; and others, both old women and men, cried against him; one called him heretic, and said it was pity that he lived. But George Tankerfield did speak unto them so effectually out of the word of God, lamenting their ignorance, and protesting unto them his unspotted conscience, that God did mollify their hardened hearts, inso-much that some of them departed out of the chamber with weeping eyes.

There came unto him a certain schoolmaster, who retained unto Sir Thomas Pope, kut. This man had a certain communication with George Tankerfield the day before he was coming towards St. Alban's, as touching their sacrament of the altar, and other points of papistical religion; but as he urged Tankerfield with the authority of the doctors, wresting them after his own will; so on the other side Tankerfield answered him mightily by the scriptures, not wrested after the mind of any man, but being interpreted after the will of the Lord Jesus, &c. So that as he would not allow such allegations as Tankerfield brought out of the scriptures, without the opinions of the doctors; so again Tankerfield would not credit his doctrine to be true, except he could confirm it by the scriptures. In the end Tankerfield prayed him that he would not trouble him in such matters, for his conscience was established, &c. and so he departed from him, wishing him well, and protesting that he meant him no more hurt than his own soul.

When the hour drew on apace that he should suffer, he desired the wine-drawer that he might have a pint of malmsey and a loaf, that he might eat and drink that in remembrance of Christ's death and passion, because he could not have it ministered unto him by others in such a manner as Christ commanded; and then he kneeled down, making his confession unto the Lord with all which were in the chamber with him; and after that he had prayed earnestly unto the Lord, and had read the institution of the holy supper by the Lord Jesus out of the evangelists, and out of St. Paul, he said, "O Lord, thou knowest it, I do not this to derogate authority from any man, or in contempt of those which are thy ministers, but only because I cannot have it ministered according to thy word," &c. and when he had spoken these and such like words, he received it with giving of thanks.

When some of his friends willed him to eat some meat, he said he would not eat that which should do others good, that had more need, and that had longer time to live than he.

He prayed his host to let him have a good fire in the chamber: he had so; and then he, sitting on a form before the fire, put off his shoes and hose, and stretched out his legs to the flame, and when it had touched his foot, he quickly withdrew his legs, shewing how the flesh did persuade him one way, and the spirit another way. The flesh said, O thou fool, wilt thou burn, and needest not? The spirit said, Be not afraid, for this is nothing in respect of fire eternal. The flesh said, Do not leave the company of thy friends and acquaintance which love thee, and will let thee lack nothing. The spirit said, The company of Jesus Christ, and his glorious presence, doth exceed all fleshly friends. The flesh said, Do not shorten thy time, for thou mayest live, if thou wilt, much longer. The spirit said, This life is nothing unto the life in heaven, which lasteth for ever, &c. All this time the sheriffs were at a certain gentleman's house at dinner not far from the town, whither also resorted knights and many gentlemen out of the country, because his son was married that day; and until they returned from dinner, the prisoner was left with his host to be kept and looked unto. And George Tankerfield was all that time kindly treated by his host; and considering that his time was short, his saying was, That although the day was never so long,—yet at the last it ringeth to evening song.

About two of the clock, when the sheriffs were returned from dinner, they brought George Tankerfield out of his inn unto the place where he should suffer, which is called Rome-land, being a green place nigh unto the west end of the abbey church; unto which when he was come, he kneeled down by the stake that was set up for him, and after he had ended his prayers he arose, and with a joyful faith he said, that although he had a sharp dinner, yet he hoped to have a joyful supper in heaven.

While the faggots were set about him, there came a priest unto him, and persuaded him to believe on the sacrament of the altar, and he should be saved. But George Tankerfield cried out vehemently, and said, "I defy the Whore of Babylon, I defy the Whore of Babylon: fie on that abominable idol. Good people, do not believe him; good people, do not believe him." And then the mayor of the town commanded to set fire to the heretic, and said, if he had but one load of faggots in the whole world, he would give them to burn him. There was a certain knight by, who went unto Tankerfield, and took him by the hand, and said, Good brother, be strong in Christ. This he spake softly; and Tankerfield said, O sir, I thank you: I am so, I thank God.

Then fire was set unto him, and he desired the sheriff and all the people that they would pray for him: the most part did so. And so embracing the fire, he bathed himself in it, and calling on the name of the Lord Jesus, he was quickly out of pain, &c.

After the martyrdom was ended, and that he was fallen asleep in the Lord, there were some superstitious old women, who did blasphemously say, that the devil was so strong with him, and all such heretics as he was, that they could not feel any pain almost, nor yet be sorry for their sins.

The History and Examinations of ROBERT SMITH, constantly maintaining the truth of God's word, and suffering for the same in the month of August.

Robert Smith was brought unto Newgate the 5th of November, in the first and second year of the king and queen by John Matthew, yeoman of the guard of the queen's side, by the commandment of the council. This Smith first gave himself unto service in the house of sir Thomas Smith, knight, being then provost of Eaton; from thence he was preferred to Windsor, having there in the college a clerkship of ten pounds a year. Of stature he was tall and slender, active about many things, but chiefly delighting in the art of painting, which many time (rather for his mind's sake than for any living or lucre) he did practise and exercise. In religion he was fervent, after he had once tasted the truth; wherein he was much confirmed by the preachings and readings of one Mr. Turner, of Windsor, and others. Whereupon at the coming of queen Mary he was deprived of his clerkship by her visitors, and not long after he was apprehended, and brought to examination before Bonner, as here followeth, written and testified with his own hand.

The first Examination of Robert Smith before Bishop Bonner.

About nine o'clock in the morning, I was amongst the rest of my brethren brought to the bishop's house, and I first of all was brought before him into his chamber, to whom the bishop said as followeth, after he had asked my name.

Bonner. How long is it ago since the time that ye were confessed to any priest?

Smith. Never since I had years of discretion; for I never saw it needful, neither commanded of God, to come to shew my faults to any of that sinful number whom ye call priests.

Bonner. Thon shewest thyself even at the first chop to be a rank heretic, which being weary of painting, art entered into divinity, and so fallen, through thy departing from thy vocation, into heresy.

Smith. Although I have understanding in the said occupation, yet I praise God, I have had little need all my life hitherto to live by the same, but have lived without the same in mine own house as honestly in my vocation as ye have lived in yours, and yet used the same better than ever yon used the pulpit.

Bonner. How long is it ago since ye received the sacrament of the altar, and what is your opinion in the same?

Smith. I never received the same since I had years of discretion, nor ever will, by God's grace: neither do esteem the same in any point, because it hath not God's ordinance, neither in name, nor in other usage, but rather is set up and erected to mock God withal.

Bonner. Do ye not believe that it is the very body of Christ that was born of the Virgin Mary, naturally, substantially, and really, after the words of consecration?

Smith. I shewed you before, it was none of God's ordinance, as ye use it; then much less to be God, or any part of his substance, but only bread and wine erected to the use aforesaid; yet nevertheless, if ye can approve it to be the body ye speak of by the word, I will believe it; if not, I will, as I do, account it a detestable idol, not God, but contrary to God and his truth.

Then after many raging words and vain objections, he said, there was no remedy, but I must be burned.

Smith. Ye shall do no more unto me than ye have done to better men than either of us both. But think not thereby to quench the Spirit of God, neither thereby to make your matter good: for your sore is too well seen to be healed so privily with blood. For even the very children have all your deeds in derision; so that although ye patch up one place with authority, yet shall it break out in forty to your shame.

Then after much ado, and many railing sentences, he said, (throwing away the paper of mine examination,) Well, even now, by my troth, even in good earnest, if thou wilt go and be shaven, I will tear this paper in pieces.

To which I answered, it would be too much to his shame to shew it to men of discretion.

After which answer I was carried down to the garden with my gaoler, and there remained until my brother Harwood was examined; and then being again brought up before the said Bonner, he demanded if I agreed with Harwood in his confession upon these articles following.

Bonner. What say you to the Catholic church? Do ye not confess there is one in earth?

Smith. Yes, verily, I believe that there is one Catholic church, or faithful congregation, which (as the apostle saith) is builded upon the prophets and apostles, Christ Jesus being the head corner-stone. Which church in all her words and works maintaineth the word, and bringeth the same for her authority, and without it doth nothing, nor ought to do; of which I am assured I am by grace made a member.

Bonner. Ye shall understand I am bound when my brother offendeth, and will not be reconciled, to bring him before the congregation: now, if your church be the same, where may a man find it, to bring his brother before the same?

Smith. It is written in the Acts of the Apostles, that when the tyranny of the bishops was so great against the church in Jewry, they were fain to congregate in houses and private places, as they now do; and yet were they nevertheless the church of God. And seeing they had their matters redressed, being shut up in a corner, may not we do the like now-a-days?

Bonner. Yea, their church was known full well. For St. Paul writ to the Corinthians, to have the man punished and excommunicate, that had committed evil with his father's wife. Whereby we may well perceive it was a known church; but yours is not known.

Smith. Then could you not persecute it as ye do: but as ye say the church of God at Corinth was manifest both to God and Paul, even so is this church of God in England, whom ye persecute, both known to God, and also even to the very wicked, although they know not, nor will not know, their truth nor conversation; yea, and your sinful number have professed their verity, and maintained the same a long season.

Bonner. Well, thou sayest that the church of God was only at Corinth, when Paul writ unto them, and so will I put in writing, shall I?

Smith. I do marvel greatly, my lord, that ye are not ashamed to lay snares for your brethren on this manner. This is now the third snare you have laid for me: first, to make me confess that the church of England is not the church of Christ? secondly, to say it is not known; thirdly, to say the church of God is not universal, but particular. And this is not the office of a bishop: for if an innocent had come in your way, you would have done your best, I see, to have entangled him.

Harpsf. Well, friend, (quoth one of my lord's chaplains) you are no innocent, as it appeareth.

Smith. By the grace of God I am what I am, and this grace in me I hope is not in vain.

Well, (quoth my lord, laughing,) tell me how sayest thou of the church?

Smith. I told you whereupon the true church is builded, and I affirm in England to be the congregation of God, and also in omnem terram, as it is written, "Their sound is gone forth into all lands, and that this is the afflicted and persecuted church, which ye cease not to imprison, slay, and kill. And in Corinth was not all the congregation of God, but a number of those holy and elect people of God. For neither Paul nor Peter were present at Corinth when they wrote, and yet were they of the church of God, as many thousands more, which also communicate in that holy Spirit.

Bon. What call ye Catholic, and what call you Church?

Smith. Catholic is universal, and Church is a congregation knit together in unity.

Then after much like vain talk, it was laid to my charge, that my fellow and I spake one thing. Whereof I praised God, and was sent again to a garden.

Then brought they up my lord mayor to hear our matter above in the chamber, and I first of all was called into the chamber, where my lord intended to sup. Where my lord mayor being set with the bishop and one of the sheriffs, wine was walking on every side; I stand before them as an out-cast; which made me remember how Pilot and Herod were made friends, but no man was sorry for Joseph's hurt. But after my lord had well drunk, my articles were sent for and read, and he demanded whether I said not as was written?

Smith. That I have said, I have said; and what I have said, I do mean utterly.

Bon. Well, my lord mayor, your lordship hath heard somewhat, what a stout heretic this is, and that his articles have deserved death; yet nevertheless, forsomuch as they report me to seek blood, and call me bloody Bonner, whereas God knoweth I never sought any man's blood in all my life, I have kept him from the Consistory this day, whither I might have brought him justly: and yet here before your lordship I desire him to turn, and I will with all speed despatch him out of trouble: and this I profess before your lordship and all this audience.

Smith. Why, my lord, do ye put on this fair vizard before my lord mayor, to make him believe that ye seek not my blood, to eloak your murders through my stoutness, as ye call it? Have ye not had my brother Tomkins before you, whose hand when you had burned most cruelly, ye burnt also his body; and not only of him, but of a great many of the members of Christ, men that feared God and lived virtuously, and also the queen's majesty's most true subjects, as their goods and bodies have made manifest! And seeing in these saints ye have shewed so little mercy, shall it seem to my lord and his audience, that ye shew me more favour? No, no, my lord. But if ye mean as ye say, why examine me of that I am not bound to answer you unto?

Bon. Well, what sayest thou by the sacrament of the altar? is it not the very body of Christ, flesh, blood, and bone, as it was born of the Virgin?

Smith. I have answered, that it is none of God's order, neither any sacrament, but man's own vain invention; and shewed him the Lord's institution. But when he was so earnest before the audience, declaring that we know nothing, bringing out his Hoc est corpus meum, (This is my body,) to lay in my dish, I proved before the audience that it was a dead god, declaring the distinction appointed between the two creatures of bread and wine, and that a body without blood hath no life.

At which Harpsfield found himself much offended, and took the tale out of my lord's mouth, saying, I will prove by the scriptures that ye blaspheme God in so saying: for it is given in two parts, because there is two things shewed, that is to say his body and his passion, as saith St. Paul; and therefore is the bread his body, and the wine the representation of his death and blood-shedding.

Smith. Ye falsify the word, and wreck it, to serve your purpose. For the wine was not only the shewing of his passion, but the bread also: for our Saviour saith, "So oft as ye do this, do it in remembrance of me." And St. Paul saith, "So oft as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew the Lord's death till he come.—And here is as much reverence given to the one as to the other.

Wherefore, if the bread be his body, the cup must be his blood, and as well ye make his body in the cup, as his blood in the bread.

Then up rose my lord, and went to the table, where my lord mayor desired me to save my soul. To whom I answered, I hope it was saved through Christ Jesus; desiring him to have pity on his own soul, and remember whose sword he carried.

At which I was carried into the garden, and there abode until the rest of my friends were examined; and so were we sent away with many foul farewells to Newgate again, my lord bishop giving the keeper a charge to lay me in limbo.

Another Examination of Robert Smith.

Upon Saturday, at eight of the clock, I was brought to his chamber again, and there by him examined as followeth:

Bon. Thou Robert Smith, &c. sayest that there is no Catholic church here on earth.

Smith. Ye have heard me both speak the contrary, and ye have written as a witness of the same.

Bon. Yea, but I must ask thee this question. How sayest thou?

Smith. Must ye of necessity begin with a lie? it maketh manifest that ye determine to end with the same. But there shall no liars enter into the kingdom of God. Nevertheless, if ye will be answered, ask mine articles that were written yesterday, and they shall tell you that I have confessed a church of God, as well in earth as in heaven, and yet all one church, and one man's members, even Christ Jesus.

Bon. Well, what sayest thou to auricular confession? is it not necessary to be used in Christ's church, and wilt thou not be shriven of the priest?

Smith. It is not needful to be used in Christ's church, as I answered yesterday. But if it be needful for your church, it is to pick men's purses. And such pick-purse matters is all the whole rabble of your ceremonies: for all is but money matters that ye maintain.

Bon. Why, how art thou able to prove that confession is a pick-purse matter? Art thou not ashamed so to say?

Smith. I speak by experience: for I have both heard and seen the fruits of the same. For first it hath been, we see, a bewrayer of king's secrets, and the secrets of other men's consciences; who being delivered, and glad to be discharged of their sins, have given to priests great sums of money to absolve them, and sing masses for their soul's health.

And for ensample, I began to bring in a pageant, that by report was played at St. Thomas of Acre's, and where I was sometime a child waiting on a gentleman of Norfolk, which being bound in conscience through the persuasion of the priest, gave away a great sum of his goods, and forgave unto Mr. Gresham a great sum of money, and to another as much. The priest had for his part a sum, and the house had an annuity to keep him; the which thing when his brother heard, he came down to London, and after declaration made to the council, how by the subtlety of the priest he had robbed his wife and children, recovered a great part again, to the value of two or three hundred pounds, of Mr. Gresham and his other friend; but what he gave to the house could not be recovered. This tale began I to tell. But when my lord saw it savoured not to his purpose, he began to revile me, and said, By the mass, if the queen's majesty were of his mind, I should not come to talk before any man, but should be put into a sack, and a log tied unto the same, and so should be thrown into the water.

To which I answered again, saying, I know you speak by practice, as much as by speculation: for both you and your predecessors have sought all means possible to kill Christ secretly: record of Mr. Hunne, whom your predecessor caused to be thrust in at the nose with hot burning needles, and then to be hanged, and said the same Hunne to have hanged himself; and also a good brother of yours, a bishop of your profession, having in his prison an innocent man, whom because he saw he was not able by the scriptures to overcome, he made him privily to be snarled, and his flesh to be torn and plucked away with a pair of pincers, and bringing him before the people, said the rats had eaten him. Thus according to your oath is all your dealing, and hath been; and as you, taking upon you the office, do not without oaths open your mouth, no more do you without murder maintain your traditions.

Bonner. Ah, ye are a generation of liars; there is not one true word that cometh out of your mouths.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I have said that Jesus Christ is dead for my sins, and risen for my justification; and this is no lie.

Then made he his man to put in my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and would have had me recite it again; which when I would not do, he made his man to put in such sums as he imagined. At the end of this cometh in Mr. Mordant, knight, and sat down to hear my examination. Then said my lord, How sayest thou, Smith, to the seven sacraments? believest thou not that they be God's order, that is to say, the sacrament of, &c.

Smith. I believe, that in God's church are but two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of regeneration, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper: and as for the sacrament of the altar, and all your sacraments, they may well serve your church, but God's church hath nothing to do with them, neither have I any thing to do to answer them, nor you to examine me of them.

Bonner. Why, is God's order changed in baptism? In what point do we dissent from the word of God?

Smith. First, in hallowing your water; in conjuring of the same; in baptizing children with anointing and spitting in their mouths, mingled with salt; and with many other lewd ceremonies, of which not one point is able to be proved in God's order.

Bonner. By the mass, that is the most unshamefaced heretic that ever I heard speak.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord; ye keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, ye catch me at my words; but I will watch thee as well, I warrant thee.

By my troth, my lord, (quoth Mr. Mordant,) I never heard the like in all my life. But I pray you, my lord, mark well his answer for baptism. He disallowed therein holy ointment, salt, and such other laudable ceremonies, which no Christian man will deny.

Smith. That is a shameful blasphemy against Christ, so to use any mingle-mangle in baptizing young infants.

Bonner. I believe, I tell thee, that if they die before they be baptized, they be damned.

Smith. Ye shall never be saved by that belief: but I pray you, my lord, shew me, are we saved by water or by Christ?

Bonner. By both.

Smith. Then the water died for our sins; and so must ye say, that the water hath life, and it being our servant, and created for us, is our saviour! This, my lord, is a good doctrine, is it not?

Bonner. Why, how understandest thou the scriptures? "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And again, "Suffer (saith our Saviour) these children to come unto me:" and if thou wilt not suffer them to be baptized after the laudable order, thou hinderest them to come unto Christ.

Smith. Where ye allege St. John, Except a man, &c. and will thereby prove the water to save, and so the deed or work to save and put away sins, I will send you to St. Paul, which asketh of the Galatians, Whether they received the Spirit by the deeds of the law, or by the preaching of faith; and there concludeth that the Holy Ghost accompanieth the preaeling of faith, and with the word of faith entereth into the heart. So now if baptism preach to me the washing in Christ's blood, so doth the Holy Ghost accompany it, and it is unto me as a preacher, and not a saviour. And where ye say, I hinder the children to come unto Christ, it is manifest by our Saviour's words that ye hinder them to come, that will not suffer them to come to him without the necessity of water. For he saith, Suffer them to come unto me, and not unto water; and therefore if ye condemn them, ye condemn both the merits and words of Christ: for our Saviour saith, "Except ye turn and become as children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And so brought I out many other ensamples, to make manifest that Christ hath cleansed original sin, bringing in ensamples out of the scriptures for the same.

Bonner. Then thou makest the water of none effect, and then put away water.

Smith. It is not, saith St. Peter, the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience consenteth unto God. And to prove that water only bringeth not the Holy Ghost, it is written in the 8th of the Acts, that Simon received water, but would have received the Holy Ghost for money. Also, that the Holy Ghost hath come before baptism, it is written that John had the Holy Ghost in his mother's womb. Cornelius. Paul, and the queen of Candace's servant, with many others, received the Holy Ghost before baptism. Yea, and although your generation have set at naught the word of God, and like swine turned his words upside down, yet must his church keep the same in that order which he left them, which his church dare not break; and to judge children damned that be not baptized, it is wicked.

Mord. By our Lady, sir, but I believe that if my child die without water he is damned.

Bonner. Yea, and so do I, and all Catholic men, good Mr. Mordant.

Smith. Well, my lord, such catholic such salvation.

Bonner. Well, sir, what say you to the sacrament of orders?

Smith. Ye may call it the sacrament of misorders: for all orders are appointed of God. But as for your shaving, anointing, greasing, polling, and rounding, there are no such things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, my lord, if ye had grace and intelligence, ye would not so disfigure yourself as ye do.

Bonner. Sayest thou so? now by my troth I will go shave myself to anger thee withal. (And so sent for his barber, which immediately came; and before my face at the door of the next chamber he shaved himself, desiring me before he went to answer to these articles :) What say you to holy bread and holy water, to the sacrament of anointing, and to all the rest of such ceremonies of the church?

Smith. I say they be baubles for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exercise themselves in; and therefore they may go among the refuse.

Then went away Mr. Mordant, and my lord went to shaving, leaving there certain doctors, as he called them, to assay what they could do, of whom I was baited for half an hour; of whom I also asked this question, Where were all you in the days of king Edward, that ye spake not that which ye speak now?

Doct. We were in England.

Smith. Yea, but then ye had the faces of men, but now ye have put on lions' faces again; as saith St. John, Ye shew yourselves as full of malice as ye may be. For ye have for every time a visor; yea, and if another king Edward should arise, ye would then say, Down with the pope, for he is Antichrist, and so are all his angels.

Then was I reviled, and so sent away, and brought in again to come before these men; and one of them that baited me before, asked if I disallowed confession? To whom I answered, Look in mine articles, and they shall shew you what I allow.

Doct. Your articles confess that you allow not auricular confession.

Smith. I allow it not, because the word alloweth it not, nor commandeth it.

Doct. Why, it is written, Thou shalt not hide thy sins and offences.

Smith. No more do I, when I confess them to Almighty God.

Doct. Why, ye cannot say that ye can hide them from God, and therefore you must understand the words are spoken to be uttered to them that do not know them.

Smith. Ye have made a good answer: then must the priest confess himself to me, as I to him. For I know his faults and secrets no more than he knoweth mine. But if ye confess you to the priest, and not unto God, ye shall have the reward that Judas had: for he confessed himself to the priest, and yet went and hanged himself by and by; and so, as many as do not acknowledge their faults to God, are said to hide them.

Doct. What did they that came to John to be baptized?

Smith. They confessed their sins unto Almighty God.

Doct. And not unto John?

Smith. If it were unto John, (as ye are not able to prove,) yet was it to God, before John and the whole congregation.

Doct. Why, John was alone in the wilderness.

Smith. Why, and yet the scriptures say he had many disciples, and that many Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism. Here the scriptures and you agree not. And if they confessed themselves to John, as ye say, it was to all the congregation, as St. Paul doth to Timothy, and to all that read his epistle, in opening to all the hearers, that he was not worthy to be called an apostle, because he had been a tyrant. But as for ear confession, ye never heard it allowed by the word: for the prophet David maketh his confession unto God, and saith, I will confess my sins unto the Lord. Daniel maketh his confession unto the Lord; Judith, Tobit, Jeremiah, Manasseh, with all the forefathers, did even so. For the Lord hath said, "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee; Knock, ask, seek; with such like; and this is the word of God. Now bring somewhat of the word to help yourself withal. Then they raged, and called me dog, and said I was damned.

Nay, ye are dogs, (said I,) that because holy things are offered, will slay your friends. For I may say with St. Paul, "I have fought with beasts in the likeness of men:" for here I have been baited these two days, of my lord and his great bulls of Bashan, and in his hall beneath have been baited of the rest of his band.

With this came my lord from shaving, and asked me how I liked him?

Smith. Forsooth, ye are even as wise as ye were before ye were shaven.

Bonner. How standeth it, master doctors; have ye done any good?

Doct. No, by my troth, my lord, we can do no good.

Smith. Then it is fulfilled which is written, "How can an evil tree bring forth good fruit?"

Bonner. Nay, naughty fellow, I set these gentlemen to bring thee home to Christ.

Smith. Such gentlemen, such Christs; and as truly as they have that name from Christ, so truly do they teach Christ.

Bonner. Well, wilt thou neither hear them nor me?

Smith. Yes, I am compelled to hear you; but ye cannot compel me to follow you.

Bonner. Well, thou shalt be burnt at a stake in Smithfield, if thou wilt not turn.

Smith. And ye shall burn in hell, if ye repent not. But, my lord, to put you out of doubt, because I am weary, I will strain courtesy with you: I perceive you will not with your doctors come unto me, and I am determined not to come unto you, by God's grace; for I have hardened my face against you as hard as brass.—Then, after many railing sentences, I was sent away. And thus have I left the truth of mine answers in writing, being compelled by my friends to do it: that ye may see how the Lord hath, according to his promise, given me a mouth and wisdom to answer his cause, for which I am condemned, and my cause not heard.

The last Examination of Robert Smith.

The 12th of July I was with my brethren brought into the Consistory, and nine articles read before my lord mayor and the sheriffs, with all the assistants, to which I answered as followeth:

Bonner. By my faith, my lord mayor, I have shewed him as much favour as any man living might do: but I perceive all is lost, both on him and all his company.

At this word, which he coupled with an oath, came I in; and taking him with the manner, said, My lord, it is written, "Ye must not swear."

Bonner. Ah, master controller, are ye come? Lo, my lord mayor, this is master speaker, (pointing to my brother Tankerfield,) and this is master controller, (pointing to me.) And then beginning to read my articles, he persevered till he came at my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and then demanded of my lord mayor, if he heard of the same before. To which he answered, No.

To whom I answered, My lord mayor, will it please you to hear me recite it, as I heard it, and I told it, and then shall you hear the truth; for this tale that my lord hath told is untrue.

Bonner. How say you, good Mr. Mordant, spake he not this as here it is written? were ye not by?—Mord. Yes, my lord, that it is: I heard him say it.

Smith. How heard you me say it, and were not present when I spake it? Should such a man make a lie? It is manifestly proved that the prophet saith, Even as the king saith, so saith the judge, that he may do him a pleasure again. And so was brought out my gaoler for trial thereof, who there openly professed, that neither Mr. Mordant, nor the doctors beforementioned, were present when I spake it. At which Mr. Mordant with blushing cheeks said, he heard them read, and heard them affirm the same; which was also not true. Then proceeded my lord with the rest of mine articles, demanding of me if I said not as was written? To the which I answered, No; and turning to my lord mayor, I said, I require you, my lord mayor, in God's behalf, unto whom pertaineth your sword and justice, that I may here before your presence answer to these objections that are laid against me, and have the probation of the same; and if any thing that I have said, or will say, be proved (as my lord saith) heresy, I shall not only with all my heart forsake the same, and cleave to the truth, but also recant wheresoever ye shall assign me, and all this audience shall be witness to the same.

Mayor. Smith, thou canst not deny but this thou saidst.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I deny that which he hath written, because he hath both added to and diminished from the same: but what I have spoken I will never deny.

Mayor. Why, thou spakest against the blessed sacrament of the altar.

Smith. I denied it to be any sacrament, and I do stand here to make probation of the same: and if my lord here, or any of his doctors, be able to prove either the name or usage of the same, I will recant mine error.

Then spake my brother Tankerfield, and defended the probation of things, which they called heresy: to the which the bishop answered, By my troth, master Speaker, ye shall preach at a stake.—Smith. Well sworn, my lord, ye keep a good watch.—Bonner. Well, master Controller, I am no saint.

Smith. No, my lord, nor yet a good bishop: for a bishop, saith St. Paul, should be faultless, and a dedicate vessel unto God; and are ye not ashamed to sit in judgment, and be a blasphemers, condemning innocents?

Bonner. Well, master Controller, ye are faultless.

Smith. My lord mayor, I require you in God's name, that I may have justice. We be here to-day a great many innocents, that are wrongfully accused of heresy; and I require you, if you will not seem to be partial, let me have no more favour at your hands than the apostle had at the hands of Festus and Agrippa, which being heathen and infidels, gave him leave not only to speak for himself, but also heard the probation of his cause. This require I at your hands, which being a Christian judge, I hope will not deny me that right, which the heathen have suffered; if ye do, then shall all this audience, yea, and the heathen, speak shame of your fact. "For a city, saith our Saviour, that is builded on a hill, cannot be hid: if they therefore have the truth, let it come to light, for all that do well come to the light, and they that do evil hate the light."

Then my lord mayor, hanging down his head, said nothing: but the bishop told me I should preach at a stake; and so the sheriff cried, with the bishop, Away with me.

Thus came I in before them four times, desiring justice, but could have none; and at length my friends requiring with one voice the same, and could not have it, we had sentence; and then being carried out, were brought in again, and had it every man severally given. But before the bishop gave me sentence, he told me, in derision of my brother Tankerfield, a tale between a gentleman and his cook. To which I answered, My lord, ye fill the people's ears with fancies and foolish tales, and make a laughing matter at blood; but if ye were a true bishop, ye would leave these railing sentences, and speak the words of God.

Bonner. Well, I have offered to that naughty fellow, Mr. Speaker, your companion the cook, that my chancellor should here instruct him; but he hath here with great disdain forsaken it. How sayest thou, wilt thou have him instruct thee, and lead thee in the right way?

Smith. My lord, if your chancellor shall do me any good, and take any pains, as ye say, let him take mine articles in his hands that ye have objected against me, and either prove one of them heresy, or any thing that you do to be good; and if he be able so to do, I stand here with all my heart to hear him: if not, I have no need, I praise God, of his sermon; for I come to answer for my life, and not to hear a sermon.

Then began the sentence, In Dei nomine, (in the name of God,) &c. To which I answered, that he began in a wrong name; requiring of him where he learned in scripture to give sentence of death against any man for his conscience sake. To the which he made no answer, but went forward to the end, and immediately cried, Away with him. Then I turned me to the mayor, and said, Is it not enough for you, my lord mayor, and ye that are the sheriffs, that ye have left the straight way of the Lord, but that ye must condemn Christ causeless?

Bonner. Well, master Controller, now ye cannot say but I have offered you fair to have instruction; and now I pray thee call me bloody bishop, and say I seek thy blood.

Smith. Well, my lord, although neither I nor any of this congregation do report the truth of your fact, yet shall these stones cry it out, rather than it shall be hidden.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

Woodroffe. Away with him, take him away.

Smith. Well, good friends, ye have seen and heard the great wrong that we have received this day, and ye are all records that we have desired the probation of our cause by God's book, and it hath not been granted; but we are condemned, and our cause not heard. Nevertheless, my lord mayor, forasmuch as here ye have exercised God's sword causeless, and will not hear the right of the poor, I commit my cause to Almighty God, that shall judge all men according unto right, before whom we shall both stand without authority; and there will I stand in the right, and have true judgment, to your great confusion, except ye repent; which the Lord grant you to do, if it be his will. And then was I with the rest of my brethren carried away to Newgate.

Thus, gentle reader, as near as I can, I have set out the truth of my examination, and the verity of mine unjust condemnation for the truth, requiring God that it may not be laid to the charge of thee, O England; requiring your hearty prayers unto God for his grace and spirit of boldness, with hope even shortly to set to my seal, at Uxbridge, the 8th of August, by God's grace. Pray that it may be his honour, my salvation, and your consolation, I pray you. Give glory to God.

ROBERT SMITH.

Thus hast thou, good reader, not only to note, but also to follow, in this man a singular example of Christian fortitude, which so manfully and valiantly did stand in the defence of his Master's cause. And as thou seest him here boldly stand in examination before the bishop and doctors, so was he no less comfortable also in the prison, among his fellows: which also is to be observed no less in his other prison-fellows; who being there together cast in an outward house within Newgate, had godly conference with themselves, with daily praying and public reading, which they to their great comfort used in that house together, amongst whom this aforesaid Smith was chief doer; whose industry was always solicitous, not only for them of his own company, but also his diligence was careful for other prisoners, whom he ceased not to exhort and dissuade from their old accustomed iniquity; and many he converted unto his religion. Divers letters he wrote there in prison to sundry his friends, partly in metre, and partly in prose; from which the following are selected:

O ye that love the Lord, see that ye hate the thing that is evil.

The God that giveth life and light,
And leadeth into rest;

That breaketh bonds, and bringeth out
The poor that are oppress'd;

And keepeth mercy for the meek,
His treasure and his store;
Increase thy life in perfect love,
Both now and evermore.

That as thou hast begun to ground
In faith and fervent love,
Thou may'st be made a mighty mount,
That never may remove.

That thine ensample may be shew'd
Among all thine increase,
That they may live and learn the like,
And pass their time in peace.

Thy salutations that were sent,
I heartily retain,
And send thee seventy times as much,
To thee and thine again.

And now, because I know the goal
That thou dost most desire,
I send thee here a paper full,
As fired in the fire;

In hope thou wilt accept it well,
Although it be but small;
Because I have no other good,
To make amends withal.

For all thy free and friendly acts
Which thy good-will hath wrought,
I send thee surely for a shift
The thing that cost me nought.

Abstain from all ungodliness,
In dread direct your days;
Possess not sin in any wise,
Beware of wicked ways.

Hold fast your faith unfeignedly,
Build as you have begun;
And arm yourself in perfect faith,
To do as we have done.

Lest that the wicked make a mock
That ye have taken in hand,
In leaving of the perfect Rock,
To build upon the sand.

Beware these filthy Pharisees,
Their building is in blood;
Eat not with them in any wise,
Their leaven is not good.

Their salt is all unsavoury;
And under good intents
They maintain all their knavery,
And murder innocents.

They seek to sit in Christ his seat,
And put him out of place,
And make all means that may be made
His doings to deface.

They keep him down with bills and bats,
That made the blind to see:
They make a god for mice and rats,
And say the same is he.

They shew like sheep, and sweat like wolves,
Their baits be all for blood;
They kill and slay the simple souls,
And rob them of their good.

The dark illusions of the devil
Have dimmed so their eyes,
That they cannot abide the truth
To stir in any wise.

And if ye keep the perfect path,
(As I have hope ye do),

Ye shall be sure to have such shame,
As they may put you to.

For all that lead a godly life,
Shall surely suffer loss ;
And eke the world will seek their shame,
And make them kiss the cross.

Ye shall be killed all, saith Christ,
Your sorrows shall not cease ;
And yet in your afflictions,
I am your perfect peace.

For in the world ye shall have wo,
Because ye are unknown ;
And eke because ye hate the world,
The world will love his own.

Be fervent therefore to the death
Against all their decrees ;
And God shall surely fight for thee
Against thine enemies.

Commit your cause unto the Lord,
Revenge not any evil ;
And thou shalt see the wicked want,
When thou shalt have thy will.

For all afflictions that may fall,
That they can say or do,
They are not surer of the wealth
That they attain unto.

For I have seen the sinners spread
Their branches like a bay ;
And yet ere one could turn his head,
Were withered clean away.

Beware that money make ye not
In arrogance to rise
Against the goodness of the Lord,
Among the worldly wise.

For many mischiefs hath it made,
That may not be exprest ;
And many evils it hath done,
Which may not be redrest.

It maketh kings to kill and
And waste their wits in war ;
In leaving of the wolf at home,
To hunt the fox afar :

And where they should see justice done,
And set their realm in rest,
By money they be made a mean
To see the poor oppress.

It maketh lords obey the laws,
That they do ill and naught ;
It maketh bishops suck the blood
That God hath dearly bought.

The priest doth make a money-mean
To have again his whores ;
To put away his wedded wife,
And children out of doors.

The husband he would have a wife,
With nobles new and old ;
The wife would have the husband hang'd,
That she might have his gold.

It maketh murders many a one,
And beareth much with blood ;
The child would see the parents slain,
To seize upon their good.

For whoso playeth with the pitch,
His fingers are defil'd ;
And he that maketh gold a god,
Shall surely be beguil'd.

Be friendly to the fatherless,
And all that are oppress ;
Assist them always out of hand,
And see them set at rest.

In all your doings and your deeds
Let mercy still remain :
For with the measure that ye mete,
Shall ye be met again.

Be always lowly in your life,
Let love enjoy her own :
The highest trees are seldom sure,
And soonest overthrown.

The bee is but a little beast
In body or in sight :
And yet she bringeth more increase
Than either crow or kite.

Therefore beware in any wise,
Keep well your watch alway ;
Be sure of oil within your lamp,
Let not your light decay.

Exhort your children to be chaste,
Rebuke them for their ill ;
And let them not in any wise
Be wedded to their will.

And let your light and living shine,
That ye be not suspect
To have the same within yourself,
For which they are correct.

Be meek and modest, in a mean
Let all your deeds be done ;
That they which are without the law,
May see how right you run.

Keep well the member in your mouth,
Your tongue see that ye tame :
For out of little sparks of fire
Proceedeth out a flame.

And seeing God hath giv'n a tongue,
And put it under power,
The surest way it is to set
A hatch before the door

For God hath set you in a seat
Of double low degree ;
First unto God, and then to man,
A subject for to be.

I write not, that I see in you
These things to be suspect ;
But only set before your face
How sin should be correct.

For flesh and blood I know ye are,
As other women be :
And if ye dwell in flesh and blood,
There is infirmity.

Receive a warning willingly,
That to thy teeth is told ;
Account the gift of greater price
Than if he gave thee gold.

A wise man, saith Solomon,
A warning will embrace :
A fool will sooner, as he saith,
Be smitten on the face.

Thus farewell, free and faithful friend :
The Lord that is above
Increase in thee a perfect faith,
And lead thee in his love.

And as I pray with perfect love,
And pour out bitter tears,

For you and all that are at large
Abroad among the briars :

Even so I pray thee to prefer
My person and my bands
Unto the everlasting God,
That hath me in his hands.

That as he hath begun in me
His mercies many one,
I may attain to overtake
My brethren that be gone.

That when the death shall do his worst
Where he shall point a place,
I may be able like a man
To look him in the face.

For my Redeemer, I am sure,
Doth live for evermore,
That sitteth high upon the heavens
For whom I hunger sore :

Even as the deer, with deadly wounds
Escaped from the spoil,
Doth haste by all the means he may
To seek unto the soil.

Of whom I hope to have a crown.
That always shall remain ;
And eke enjoy a perfect peace,
For all my wo and pain.

For though the fire do consume
Our treasure and our store ;
Yet shall the goodness of the Lord
Endure for evermore.

Written at the Request of a Lady, in her Book.

If you will walk the way
That Christ hath you assign'd,
Then learn this little verse
Which I have left behind.

Be fervent in the truth,
Although it bear the blame ;
And eke apply your youth
To stick unto the same.

That when old age is come,
And death begins to call,
The truth may be your staff,
To stay you up withal.

And though it bring rebuke,
And cause you kiss the cross ;
Yet is it a reward
To all that suffer loss.

For here we do lay out
The things that be but vain ;
But we are sure to reap
The things that do remain.

For all that ye do lose,
Is but a sinful slime,
And like unto a rose,
That tarrieth but a time.

But if ye carry Christ,
And walk the perfect way,
Ye shall possess the gold
That never shall decay.

And all your Father's goods
Shall be your recompense,
If ye confess the word
With double diligence.

Not only for to hear
His pure and perfect word,

But also to embrace
The fire, and eke the sword.

And if ye keep this path,
And do not run a-crook,
Then shall ye meet the man
That wrote this in your book,

In that eternal joy,
That always shall remain :
Thus farewell, faithful friend,
Till we do meet again.

A Letter sent to his Wife.

The God and Father eternal, which brought again from death our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee, dear wife, now and ever, Amen ; and all thy parents and friends. I praise God for his mercy, I am in the same state that ye left me in, rather better than worse, looking daily for the living God, before whom I hunger full sore to appear, and receive the glory, of which I trust thou art willing to be a partaker. I give God most hearty thanks therefore, desiring thee of all loves to stand in that faith which thou hast received, and let no man take away the seed that Almighty God hath sown in thee, but lay hands on everlasting life, which shall ever abide, when both the earth and all earthly friends shall perish ; desiring them also to receive thankfully our trouble, which is momentary and light, and, as St. Paul saith, not worthy of the things which shall be shewed on us ; that we, patiently carrying our cross, may attain to the place where our Saviour Christ is gone before, to the which I beseech God of his mercy bring us speedily. I have been much troubled about your deliverance, fearing much the persuasions of worldlings, and have found a friend, which will, I trust, find a mean for you, if you be not already provided, desiring you in any case to abide such order as those my friends shall appoint in God. And bear well in mind the words which I spake at our departing, that as God hath found us, and also elected us, worthy to suffer with him ; we may endeavour ourselves to follow uprightly in this our vocation, desiring you to present my hearty commendations to all our friends, and especially to your parents, keeping your matter close in any wise. Give most hearty thanks to my friend, which only for our cause is come to Windsor. Continue in prayer. Do well. Be faultless in all things. Beware of abominations. Keep you clean from sin. Pray for me, as I do for you. I have sent you a piece of gold for a token, and most entirely desire you to send me word if ye lack any thing. The Lord Jesus preserve you and yours. Amen.—From Newgate the 15th of April.

By your husband here and in heaven,

ROBERT SMITH.

The aforesaid Robert Smith, the valiant and constant martyr of Christ, thus replenished, as ye have heard, with the fortitude of God's Spirit, was condemned at London by Bonner, their bishop, the 12th of July, and suffered at Uxbridge the 8th day of August ; who, as he had been a comfortable instrument of God before to all them that were in prison with him, so now also being at the stake, he did no less comfort the people there standing about him, willing them to think well of his cause, and not to doubt but that his body dying in that quarrel, should rise again to life ; and, said he, I doubt not but that God will shew you some token thereof. At length, he being well nigh half burnt, and all black with fire, clustered together as in a lump like a black coal, all men thinking him for dead, suddenly rose upright before the people, lifting up the stumps of his arms, and clapping the same together, declaring a rejoicing heart unto them; and so bending down again, and hanging over the fire, slept in the Lord, and ended his mortal life.

A sententious Letter of Robert Smith, to Anne Smith, his wife.

Seek first to love God, dear wife, with your whole heart, and then shall it be easy to love your neighbour.

Be friendly to all creatures, and especially to your own soul.

Be alway an enemy to the devil and the world, but especially to your own flesh.

In hearing of good things, join the ears of your head and heart together.

Seek unity and quietness with all men, but especially with your conscience: for he will not easily be entreated.

Love all men, but especially your enemies.

Hate the sins that are past, but especially those to come.

Be as ready to further your enemy as he is to hinder you, that ye may be the child of God.

Defile not that which Christ hath cleansed, lest his blood be laid to your charge.

Remember that God hath hedged in your tongue with the teeth and lips, that it might speak under correction.

Be ready at all times to look to your brother's eye, but especially in your own eye: for he that warneth other of that he himself is faulty, doth give his neighbour the clear wine, and keepeth the dregs to himself.

Beware of riches and worldly honour: for without understanding, prayer, and fasting, it is a snare, and also poverty, all which are like to consuming fire, of which if a man take a little, it will warm him; but if he take too much, it will consume him. For it is hard for a man to carry fire in his bosom, and not to be burnt.

Shew mercy unto the saints for Christ's sake, and Christ shall reward you for the saints' sake. Among all other prisoners visit your own soul; for it is enclosed in a perilous prison.

If you will love God, hate evil, and ye shall obtain the reward of well-doing.

Thus fare you well, good Anne. Have me heartily commended to all that love the Lord unfeignedly. I beseech you have me in your prayer while I am living, and I am assured the Lord will accept it. Bring up my children and yours in the fear of God, and then shall I not fail but receive you together in the everlasting kingdom of God, which I go unto.

Your husband, ROBERT SMITH.

The Burning of STEPHEN HARWOOD and THOMAS FUST, for the Testimony of the Gospel.

About this time Stephen Harwood was burnt at Stratford, and Thomas Fust at Ware; both about one time with the aforesaid Robert Smith and George Tankerfield, although in different places; yet they were examined and openly condemned together with them. Their proceess, because it was joined all in one with the proceess of Robert Smith, and others of the same company above mentioned, I thought it superfluous to repeat, except the following speech of Thomas Fust: As he, in his last appearance the 12th of July, was moved by the bishop to revoke his opinion, he answered, "No, my lord; for there is no truth cometh out of your mouth; all is lies. Ye condemn men, and will not hear the truth. Where can ye find any anointing or greasing in God's book? I speak nothing but the truth, and am certain that it is the truth that I speak." This answer only I find noted by the register; although how slenderly these registers have dealt in uttering such matters, that is, in omitting those things which were most worthy to be known, by their doings it is easy to be seen. But, to be short: after their answers made, both he and Harwood were for their faithful perseverance condemned together by the bishop, in his accustomed pity, as heretics, to be burned; and so finished they their martyrdom, the one at Stratford, and the other at Ware, in the month of August, and year abovesaid.

The Martyrdom of WILLIAM HALE, burnt at Barnet.

Of the same company of these ten above recorded, which were sent up to bishop Bonner by Sir Nicholas Hare and other commissioners, in the company of George Tankerfield and Robert Smith, was also William Hale, of Thorp, in the county of Essex, who likewise being examined with the rest, the 12th of July, received with them also the sentence of condemnation, giving this exhortation withal to the lookers on: "Ah, good people, beware of this idolatry, and this Antichrist," pointing to the bishop of London; and so was he delivered to the sheriffs as an heretic to be burned, who sent him to Barnet, where, about the latter end of August, he most valiantly sealed up his faith with the consuming of his body by fire, yielding his soul unto the Lord Jesus, his only and most sure Redeemer.

GEORGE KING, THOMAS LEYES, and JOHN WADE, sickened in Prison, and were buried in the Fields.

Ye heard before of ten persons sent out of Newgate by Mr Hare, and other commissioners, to be examined by Bonner; of whom six were executed in several places, as hath been shewed. Other three, to wit, George King, Thomas Leyes, and John Wade, sickening in Lollard's Tower, were so weak, that they were removed into different houses within the city of London, and there died, and were cast out into the fields, and there buried by night by the faithful brethren, when none in the day durst do it, for fear of the Papists.

The last that remained of this aforesaid company was Joan Laysh, or Lashford, the daughter-in-law to John Warne and Elizabeth Warne, martyrs; but she was reprieved to a longer day, and burnt the following year.

WILLIAM ANDREW.

The like Catholic charity was also shewed upon William Andrew, of Horsley, in the county of Essex, carpenter, who was brought to Newgate the 1st day of April, 1554, by John Motham, constable of Maudon, in Essex. The first and principal promoter of this was the lord Rich, who sent him first to prison. Another great enemy to him was Sir Richard Southwell, knight, as appears by a letter written by him to Bonner; which is as follows:

A Letter sent to Bonner, bishop of London, from Sir Richard Southwell.

"Pleaseth your lordship to understand, that the lord Rich did, about seven or eight weeks past, send up unto the council one William Andrew, of Thorp, within the county of Essex, an arrogant heretic. Their pleasure was to command me to commit him unto Newgate, where he remaineth; and, as I am informed, hath infected a number in the prison with his heresy. Your lordship shall do very well, if it please you to convent him before you, and to take order with him, as his case doth require. I know the council meant to have writ herein unto your lordship, but by occasion of other business the thing hath been omitted. Wherefore, knowing their good pleasure, I did advise the keeper of Newgate to wait upon you with these few lines; and so referring the rest to your virtuous consideration, I remain your good lordship's to command, this 12th of June, 1555.

“RICHARD SOUTHWELL.”

This William Andrew being twice brought before Bonner to examination, there manfully stood in defence of his religion. At length, through severe handling in the prison of Newgate, he lost his life, which else his adversaries would have taken away by fire. And so after the popish manner he was cast out into the field, and by night was privately buried by the hands of good men and faithful brethren.

The Martyrdom of ROBERT SAMUEL, Preacher of the Gospel.

Mr. Foster, justice, of Cobdoek, in the county of Suffolk, and a little from Ipswich, being in continual hatred against the truth and professors of the same, did not cease day or night to study how to bring those in thrall and captivity that were honest and godly inclined to religion; but also whatsoever they were that once came into his claws, they easily escaped not without clog of conscience, or else loss of life, so greedy was he of blood. Among many whom he had troubled, there was one Samuel, in king Edward's days, a very godly and right faithful preacher of God's word, who for his valiant and steady behaviour in his sermons seemeth worthy of high admiration. He was minister at Barfold, in Suffolk, where he taught faithfully and fruitfully that flock which the Lord had committed to his charge, so long as the time would suffer him to do his duty.

At the last, being removed from the ministry and put from his benefice, (as many other good pastors were beside,) when he could not avoid the raging violence of the time, yet would he not give over his care that he had for his flock, but would teach them privily and by stealth, when he could not openly be suffered so to do. At what time order was taken by the queen, to be published by the commissioners, that all priests which had married in king Edward's days, putting their wives from them, should be compelled to return again to their chastity and single life; this decree would not Samuel stand to, for he knew it to be manifestly wicked and abominable; but, determining with himself that God's laws were not to be broken for man's traditions, kept his wife still at Ipswich, and gave his diligence in the mean time to the instructing of others which were about him, as occasion served. At the last Mr. Foster having intelligence hereof, being a great actor in those quarters, he spared neither time nor diligence, but soon sent out his espials abroad, laying hard wait for Samuel, that if he came home to his wife at any time, they might apprehend him, and carry him to prison.

In conclusion: when such as should betray him espied him at home with his wife, they bringing word to the officer, came immediately flocking about his house, and beset it with a great company, and so took him in the night season, because they durst not do it in the day time, for fear of trouble and tumult; although good Samuel did not withstand them at all, but meekly yielded himself into their clutches of his own accord. When they had thus caught him, they put him into Ipswich gaol, where he passed his time meekly among his godly brethren, so long as he was permitted to continue there. Howbeit, not long after being taken from thence, he was carried to Norwich, where the said bishop, Dr. Hopton, like an unmerciful prelate, exercised great cruelty against him, as indeed he and his chancellor were men in that time of persecution as had not their matches for straitness and cruel tormenting the bodies of the saints, among all the rest beside. For although the other were sharp enough in their generation, yet could they be satisfied with imprisonment and death, and would go no farther. Neither did I ever yet hear of any besides these which so far exceeded all bounds of pity and compassion in tormenting their poor brethren, as this bishop did; in such sort, that many of them he perverted, and brought quite from the truth, and some from their wits also.

The bishop, therefore, or else his chancellor, thinking that he might as easily prevail with Samuel as he had done with the other before, kept him in a very strait prison at his first coming, where he was chained bolt-upright to a great post, in such sort, that standing only on tip-toe, he was fain to stay up the whole poise or weight of his body thereby. And to make amends for the cruelty or pain that he suffered, they added a far more grievous torment, keeping him without meat and drink, whereby he was unmercifully vexed through hunger and thirst; saving that he had every day allowed two or three mouthfuls of bread, and three spoonfuls of water, to the end rather that he might be reserved to farther torment, than that they should preserve his life.—O worthy constancy of the martyr! O pitiless hearts of Papists, worthy to be complained of, and to be accused before God and nature! O the wonderful strength of Christ in his members!—Whose stomach, though it had been made of adamant stone, would not have relented at the intolerable vexations, and extreme pains, above nature? How oftentimes would he have drunk his own water! but his body was so dried up with his long emptiness, that he was not able to make one drop!

At the last, when he was brought forth to be burned, (which was but a trifle in comparison of those pains that he had passed,) certain there were that heard him declare what strange things had happened unto him during the time of his imprisonment; to wit, that after he had been famished or pined with hunger two or three days together, he then fell into a sleep, as it were one half in a slumber, at which time one clad all in white seemed to stand before him, which ministered comfort unto him by these words, Samuel, Samuel, be of good cheer, and take courage: for after this day shalt thou never be either hungry or thirsty. Which thing came even to pass accordingly, for speedily after he was burned, and from the time he had the vision till he suffered, he felt neither hunger nor thirst. And this declared he, to the end (as he said) that all men might behold the wonderful works of God. Many more like matters concerning the great comfort he had of Christ in his afflictions he could utter, he said, besides this, but that shamefacedness and modesty would not suffer him to utter it.

No less memorable it is, and worthy also to be noted, concerning the three ladders which he told to divers he saw in his sleep, set up toward heaven: of which there was one somewhat longer than the rest, but yet at length they became one, joining as it were all three together. This was a forewarning revealed unto him, declaring undoubtedly the martyrdom first of himself, and then the death of two honest women, which were brought forth and suffered in the same town anon after.

As this godly martyr was going to the fire, there came a certain maid to him, which took him about the neck and kissed him; who being marked by them that were present, was sought for the next day after to be had to prison and burned, as the very party herself informed me. Howbeit, as God of his goodness would have it, she escaped their fiery hands, keeping herself secret in the town a good while after. But though this maid, called Rose Nottingham, was marvellously preserved by the providence of God, yet there were other two honest women who fell in the rage and fury of that time. The one was a brewer's wife, the other was a shoemaker's wife; but both together now espoused to a new husband, even Christ.

With these two was this maid aforesaid very familiar: who on a time giving counsel to the one of them, that she should convey herself away while she had time and space, seeing she could not away with the queen's unjust proceedings, had this answer: "I know well, saith she, that it is lawful enough to fly away; which remedy you may use if you list. But my case standeth otherwise: I am tied to an husband, and have beside a number of young children at home; and then I know not how my husband, being a carnal man, will take my departure from him. Therefore I am minded, for the love of Christ and his truth, to stand to the extremity of the matter."

And so the next day after Samuel suffered, these two godly wives, the one called Anne Potten, the other called Joan Trunchfield, the wife of Michael Trunchfield, shoemaker, of Ipswich, were apprehended, and had both to prison together; which as they were both by sex and nature somewhat tender, so were they at first less able to endure the straitness of the prison, and especially the brewer's wife was cast into marvellous great agonies and troubles of mind thereby. But Christ, beholding the infirmity of his servant, did not fail to help her when she was in this necessity. So at length they both suffered after Samuel, anno 1556, February 19. And these, no doubt, were those two ladders, which being joined with the third, Samuel saw stretched up into heaven. This blessed Samuel, the servant of Christ, suffered the 31st of August, anno 1555.

The report goeth among some that were there present, and saw him burn, that his body in burning did shine as bright and white as new tried silver, in the eyes of them that stood by, as I am informed by some which were there, and did behold the sight.

A Letter written to the Christian Congregation by Robert Samuel, wherein he declareth the Confession of his Faith.

"Fear not the curse of men, be not afraid of their blasphemies and revilings; for worms and moths shall eat them up like cloth and wool, but my righteousness shall endure for ever, and my saving health from generation to generation." Isa. li.

"Considering with myself these perilous times, perishing days, and the unconstant and miserable state of man, the decay of our faith, the sinister report and false slander of God's most holy word; these urgent causes in conscience do constrain me to confess and acknowledge my faith and meaning in Christ's holy religion, as St. Peter teacheth me, saying, 'Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, and that with meekness and fear, having a good conscience, that when they backbite you as evil-doers, they may be ashamed, forasmuch as they have falsely accused your good conversation in Christ.'

"As touching my doctrine: for that little talent that God hath given me, God I take to record, mine own conscience and mine auditory knoweth, that I neither in doctrine nor manners willingly taught any other thing than I received of the holy patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apostles. For it were not only sin, but also the very part of a cursed miscreant, to deny, belie, or betray, the innocency of that heavenly doctrine, or to be ashamed to confess and stand to the defence of the same; seeing that Christ planted it with his most precious blood, and all good men have more esteemed the true and infallible word of God, than all this transitory world, or their own mortal lives. And I believe this doctrine of the patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apostles, to be sufficient and absolutely perfect to instruct and teach me, and all the holy church, of our duties towards God, the magistrates, and our neighbours.

"First and principally I do assuredly believe, without any doubting, that there is one Deity or Divine Essence and infinite Substance; which is both called, and is indeed, God everlasting, unbodily, unpartable, unmeasurable in power, wisdom, and goodness, the maker and preserver of all things, as well visible as invisible; and yet there be three distinct Persons, all of one Godhead or Divine Being, and all of one power, co-equal, consubstantial, co-eternal, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, &c. As touching God the Father of heaven, I believe as much as holy scripture teacheth me to believe. The Father is the first Person in the Trinity, first cause of our salvation; which hath blessed us with all manner of blessings in heavenly things by Christ; which hath chosen us before the foundations of the world were laid, that we should be holy and without blame before him; who hath predestinated us and ordained us to be his children of adoption, through Christ Jesus; in him, as it is said, we live, we move, and have our being; he nourisheth, feedeth, and giveth meat to every creature.

"And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord. I believe that the Word, that is, the Son of God, the second Person in the Trinity, did take man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin Mary: so that there be in him two natures, a divine nature and an human nature, in the unity of one Person inseparable, conjoined and knit in one Christ, truly God, and truly man, the express and perfect image of the invisible God, wherein the will of God the Father shineth apparently, and wherein man, as it were in a glass, may behold what he ought to do, that he may please God the Father.

"Born of the Virgin Mary, truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried: to the intent to bring us again into favour with God the Father Almighty, and to be a sacrifice and oblation, not only for original sin, but also for all actual sins of the whole generation of mankind. For all the works, merits, deservings, doings, and obedience of man towards God, although they be done by the Spirit of God, in the grace of God, yet being thus done, be of no validity, worthiness, nor merit, before God, except God for his mercy and grace account them worthy for the worthiness and merits of Christ Jesus.

"The same Christ went down to the hells, and truly rose again the third day, and ascended into the heavens, that he might there still reign, and have dominion over all creatures: and from thence shall come, &c.

"I believe in the Holy Ghost, co-equal with God the Father and the Son, and proceeding from them both; by whose virtue, strength, and operation, the true Catholic church, which is the communion and society of saints, is guided in all truth and verity, and kept from all errors and false doctrine, the devil, and all power of sin. Which church is sanctified and hallowed with the precious blood and spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ; which bath also her sign and mark, and she heareth and followeth the voice of her only and true Pastor, Christ, and no strangers. This church also is the house of God, the congregation of the living God, the pillar of truth, the lively body of Christ, a church both in name and in deed.

"I believe the remission of sins, by the only means and merits of Christ's death and passion; which is made unto us of God that only sacrifice and oblation offered once for all and for ever, for all men.

"I believe the resurrection of the body, whereby in the last day all men shall rise again from death, the souls joined again to the bodies; the good to everlasting life, the wicked to everlasting pain and punishment. And nothing may more certainly stablish and confirm our faith, that we shall rise again immortal both in body and soul, than the resurrection of Christ our Saviour, and first-fruits of the dead. Now that Christ our head is risen, we being his body and members, must follow our head. Death, hell, and sin, cannot sunder nor pluck us from him; for as the Son cannot be divided nor sundered from the Father, nor the Holy Ghost from them both, no more may we, being the faithful members of Christ, be separated from Christ. And for a confirmation of our resurrection, Christ would be seen after his resurrection in his most glorious body, his wounds being handled and felt, speaking and teaching, eating and drinking, &c. We look, saith St. Paul, for Jesus Christ our Saviour, which shall transfigure our vile bodies, and conform them to his glorious body by the same power and virtue wherewith he is able to subdue all things; even like as the grain of wheat sown in the ground is first purified and brought as into a thing of nought, yet after that it springeth up freshly with a more goodly colour, form, and beauty, than it had before. The body is sown in corruption, and riseth in incorruption; it is sown in dishonour, and riseth in honour.

"Thus I verily know, and assuredly believe, the resurrection of our bodies, and to have life eternal by Christ, and for Christ's sake, Verily, verily, I say unto you, (saith Christ,) he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into damnation, but is escaped from death to life. It is Christ that died once for our sins, and is risen again, never more to die. It is he that swalloweth up death, and hath cast it under his feet for ever. What now can death do unto us? Verily, nothing else but for a little time separate our precious souls from our wretched bodies, that divine substance from a mass of sin, that eternal life from a body of death, and so send our souls out of this miserable, wretched, and sorrowful life, cumbered with all calamities, unto that most blessed felicity and joys eternal.

"As concerning the holy and reverend sacraments of Christ's church, which be in number two, the sacrament of baptism, and the supper of the Lord; I believe them to be, as St. Paul calleth them, confirmations or seals of God's promises, which have added to them a promise of grace; and therefore they are called visible signs of invisible grace.

"The sacrament of baptism is a mark of Christ's church, a seal and confirmation of our acceptance into the grace and favour of God for Christ's sake. For his innocency, his righteousness, his holiness, his justice, is ours given us of God, and our sins and unrighteousness, by his obedience and abasing of himself to the death of the cross, are atoned for: whereof baptism is the sign, seal, and confirmation.

"Baptism is also a sign of repentance, to testify that we be born to the wave of perils and changes of life, to the intent that we should die continually, as long as we live, from sin; and rise again new men unto righteousness and true holiness, Rom. vi.

"The other sacrament, which is the supper of our Saviour Christ, whereby the church of Christ is known, I believe to be a remembrance of Christ's death and passion, a seal and confirmation of his most precious body given unto death, even to the vile death of the cross, wherewith we are redeemed and delivered from sin, death, hell, and damnation. It is a visible word, because it worketh the same thing in the eyes which the word worketh in the ears. For like as the word is a mean to the ears, whereby the Holy Ghost moveth the heart to believe, Rom. x. so this sacrament is a mean to the eyes, whereby the Holy Ghost moveth the heart to believe: it preacheth peace between God and man, it exhorteth to mutual love and all godly life, and teacheth to contemn the world for the life to come, when as Christ shall appear, which now is in heaven, and no where else as concerning his human body.

"Yet do I believe assuredly, that his very body is present in his most holy supper at the contemplation of our spiritual eyes, and so verily eaten with the mouth of our faith. For as soon as I hear the most comfortable and heavenly words spoken and pronounced by the mouth of the minister, 'This is my body which is given for you;' when I hear, I say, this heavenly harmony of God's infallible promises and truth, I look not upon, neither do I behold, bread and wine; for I take and believe the words simply and plainly, even as Christ spake them. For hearing these words, my senses be wrapt and utterly excluded; for faith wholly taketh place, and not flesh, nor the carnal imaginations of our gross, fleshly, and unreverent eating, after the manner of our bodily food, which profiteth nothing at all, as Christ witnesseth, John vi. but with a sorrowful and wounded conscience, an hungry and thirsty soul, a pure and faithful mind, do fully embrace, behold, and feel, and look upon, that most glorious body of Christ in heaven, at the right hand of God the Father, very God and very Man, which was crucified, and slain, and his blood shed for our sins, there now making intercession, offering and giving his holy body for me, for my body, for my ransom, for my full price and satisfaction, who is my Christ, and all that ever he hath; and by this spiritual and faithful eating of this lively and heavenly bread, I feel the most sweet fruits, benefits, and unspeakable joys of Christ's death and passion fully manifested in my soul. For my mind is quieted from all worldly adversities, tumults, and troubles; my conscience is pacified from sin, death, hell, and damnation; my soul is full, and hath even enough, and will no more: for all things are but loss, vile dung, and dross, vain vanity, for the excellent knowledge sake of Christ Jesus my Lord and Saviour.

"Thus now is Christ's flesh my very meat indeed, and his blood my very drink indeed, and I am become flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones. Now I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; yea, I dwell in him, and he in me. For through faith in Christ, and for Christ's sake, we are one, that is, of one consent, mind, and fellowship, with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, John xvii. Thus am I assuredly and fully persuaded, and on this rock have I builded, by God's grace, my dwelling and resting-place for body and soul, life and death. And thus I commit my cause unto Christ, the righteous and just Judge, who will another day judge these debates and controversies; whom I humbly beseech to cast his tender and merciful eyes upon the afflicted and ruinous churches, and shortly to reduce them into a godly and perpetual concord. Amen.

"Thus do I believe, and this is my faith and my understanding in Christ my Saviour, and his true and holy religion. And this whosoever is ashamed to confess among this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.

"ROBERT SAMUEL."

WILLIAM ALLEN, Martyr.

Now, after the suffering of Robert Samuel, about the beginning of September, was burned William Allen, in Walsingham, labouring man, servant sometime to John Houghton, of Somerton. He, being brought before the bishop, and asked the cause why he was imprisoned? answered, That he was put in prison because he would not follow the cross; saying that he would never go on procession.

Then being willed by the bishop to return again to the Catholic church, he answered, that he would turn to the Catholic church, but not to the Romish church; and said, that if he saw the king and queen, and all other, follow the cross, or kneel down to the cross, he would not. For which, sentence of condemnation was given against him the 12th of August, and he burned at Walsingham about the beginning of September; who declared such constancy at his martyrdom, and had such credit with the justices, by reason of his upright and well-tryed conversation among them, that he was permitted to go untied to his suffering, and there being fastened with a chain, stood quietly without shrinking until he died.

The Martyrdom of ROGER COO, of Melford, in Suffolk, sheerman; first examined before the Bishop of Norwich, and by him condemned, August 12th, 1555.

Roger Coo brought before the bishop, first was asked why he was imprisoned?

Coo. At the justice's commandment.

Bishop. There was some cause why.

Coo. Here is my accuser, let him declare.

And his accuser said, that he would not receive the sacrament. Then said the bishop, that he thought he had transgressed a law.

But Coo answered, that in his case, there was no law to transgress.

The bishop then asked, what he said to the law that then was?

He answered, how he had been in prison a long time, and knew it not.

No, (said his accuser,) nor will not. My lord asked him when he received the sacrament.

When Coo heard him say so, he said, I pray you, my lord, let him sit down and examine me himself. But the bishop would not hear that; but said, Coo, why will ye not receive?

He answered him, that the bishop of Rome had changed God's ordinances, and given the people bread and wine instead of the gospel, and the belief of the same.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. Our Saviour said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed: he that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him;" and the bread and wine doth not so.

Bishop. Well, Coo, thou dost slander our holy fathers. Did not Christ take bread, give thanks, and brake it, and said, "This is my body?"

Coo. Yes; and so he went further with the text, saying, "Which shall be given for you: do this in remembrance of me."

Bishop. You have said the truth.

Then Coo replied further, and said, Christ willed to do this in remembrance of him; and not to say this in remembrance of him; neither did the Holy Ghost so lead the apostles, but taught them to give thanks, and to break bread from house to house, and not to say as the bishop said.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. It is written in the 2d of the Acts.

Then the bishop's chaplain said it was true.

The bishop asked him if he could say his Belief? He answered, Yea; and so said part of the Creed; and then after he said he believed more, for he believed the Ten Commandments: that it was meet for all such as looked to be saved to be obedient unto them.

Bishop. Is not the holy church to be believed also?

Coo. Yes, if it be builded upon the word of God.

The bishop said to Coo, that he had the charge of his soul.

Coo. have you so, my lord? Then if ye go to the devil for your sins, where shall I be?

Bishop. Do you not believe as your father did? Was not he an honest man?

Coo. It is written, that after Christ hath suffered, there shall come a people with the prince that shall destroy both city and sanctuary: I pray you shew me whether this destruction was in my father's time, or now?

The bishop not answering his question, asked him whether he would not obey the king's laws?

Coo. As far as they agree with the word of God, I will obey them.

Bishop. Whether they agree with the word of God or not, we be bound to obey them, if the king were an infidel.

Coo. If Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, had so done, Nebuchadnezzar had not confessed the living God.

Then the bishop told him that these twenty-two years we had been governed with such kings.

Coo. My lord, why were ye then dumb, and did not speak or bark?

Bishop. I durst not, for fear of death. And thus they ended.

But after this done, it was reported that I railed; wherefore I called it to memory, and wrote this my railing, that light should not be taken for darkness, nor sin for holiness, and the devil for God, who ought to be feared and honoured both now and ever. Amen.

This Roger Coo, an aged father, after his sundry troubles and conflicts with his adversaries, at length was committed to the fire at Yexford, in the county of Suffolk, where he most blessedly ended his aged years, anno 1555, in the month of September.

THOMAS COBB, of Haverhill, Butcher, Martyr.

Over and beside this aforesaid Roger Coo, William Allen, James Abbes of Stokeneyland, Robert Samuel, and others more, in the same year, upon the 12th of August, was also with them condemned Thomas Cobb, of Haverhill, butcher, executed in the month of September aforesaid. Who being brought and examined by Michael Dummings, the bloody chancellor of Norwich; first, whether he believed that Christ is really and substantially in the sacrament of the altar? answered, That the body of Christ, born of the blessed Virgin, was in heaven, and otherwise (he said) he would not answer, because he had read it in scripture that Christ did ascend, and did never descend since; and therefore said, that he had not learned in the scripture that Christ should be in the sacrament. Furthermore, being demanded whether he would obey the laws of the realm of England, made for the unity of faith, or no? he answered, That his body should be at the king and queen's commandment, so far as the law of God would suffer, &c. In fine, the said Thomas Cobb being condemned the same 12th day of August, with the other his fellow-martyrs, was burned in the town of Thetford, anno 1555, in the month of September.

FIVE MARTYRS burned at Canterbury.

Now from Norfolk and Suffolk to return again into the diocese of Canterbury, we have to treat of five worthy martyrs, whose blood in the same year and month of September was spilt for the true testimony of Christ, and his gospel's cause. The names of which five martyrs were these: George Catmar of Hith, Robert Streater of Hith, Anthony Burward of Calet, George Brodbridge of Bromfield, James Tutty of Brenehley.

Who upon the 3d day of August were brought before Thornton, the aforesaid bishop of Dover, and his accomplices, and there were both jointly and severally examined upon certain articles touching the sacrament of the altar, auricular confession, and other such like. To which the said Catmar, (being first examined) made answer on this wise: Christ (quoth he) sitteth in heaven on the right hand of God the Father; and therefore I do not believe him to be in the sacrament of the altar, but he is in the worthy receiver spiritually; and the sacrament, as you use it, is an abominable idol.

Next unto him was called forth Robert Streater, who being also asked, whether he did believe the real presence of Christ in the sacraments of the altar? said, That he did not so believe: for you do maintain heresy and idolatry (quoth he) in that ye teach to worship a false god in the sacrament, enclosed in a box. It is you that are the malignant church; for in your church there are twenty things used against the law of God.

The like objection was articulate also against Anthony Burward, who also said that their sacrament was made an idol.

After him was George Brodbridge demanded what he said to those articles? Who answered, That he would not be confessed of a priest, because he could not forgive his own sins; and further said, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the real body of our Saviour Christ, but bread, given in the remembrance of him. Moreover, as for your holy bread, your holy water, and your mass, I do (quoth he) utterly defy them.

And last of all did also James Tutty make and confirm their said former answers.

And therefore they were all five condemned to be burned as heretics; and so were they all in one fire, at Canterbury aforesaid, about the 6th day of September next following.

THOMAS HAYWARD and JOHN GOREWAY, Martyrs.

Although the rage and vehemency of this terrible persecution in queen Mary's days did chiefly light in London, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Kent, as hath already been declared? yet notwithstanding, besides the same we find but few parts of this realm free from this fatal storm, but some good martyrs or other there shed their blood. And, first, to begin with the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, there we find these two to be condemned and also burned, about the middle of the said month of September at the town of Litchfield, whose names were Thomas Hayward and John Goreway.

The Martyrdom of Mr. ROBERT GLOVER, Gentleman.

In the month of September, 1555, Mr. Robert Glover, gentleman, in the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, was martyred. Of whose apprehension and troubles, because I cannot well treat but I must also intermix some mention of his brother John Glover, forsomuch as the privy commission was chiefly sent down for the said John, and not for Robert Glover, (although it pleased Almighty God that John escaped, and Robert was apprehended,) I thought therefore in one story to comprehend them both, in describing some part of their virtuous institution and order of life. And first to begin with John, the eldest brother; who being a gentleman, and heir to his father, dwelling in the town of Mancetor, was endued fair with possessions of worldly goods, but yet much more plentifully enriched with God's heavenly grace and inward virtues; which grace of God so working in him, he with his other brethren, Robert and William, not only received and embraced the light of Christ's holy gospel, but also most zealously professed, and no less diligently in their living and conversation followed, the same.

And as touching this aforesaid John Glover, who through his manifold afflictions seemed to have a deeper taste and contemplation of spiritual things, joined with mortification from all worldly cares, more than the other had; so it pleased God to lay his heavy hand of inward afflictions upon this man, that though he suffered not the pains of the outward fire, as his brother and other martyrs did, yet if we consider what inwardly in spirit and mind this man felt and suffered, and that for so long a time, he may well be counted with his brother Robert for a martyr, being no less desirous with him of the same martyrdom; yea, and in comparison may seem to be chronicle for a double martyr.

For as the said Robert was speedily despatched with the sharp and extreme torments of the fire in a short time; so this no less blessed saint of God, what and how much more grievous pangs, what sorrowful torments in his spirit inwardly he felt and sustained, no speech outwardly is able to express. Being young, I remember I was once or twice with him, who partly by his talk I perceived, and partly by mine own eyes saw, to be so worn and consumed by the space of five years, that neither almost any brooking of meat, quietness of sleep, pleasure of life, yea, and almost no kind of senses, was left in him. And doubtless I have greatly wondered oftentimes at the marvellous works and operations of Christ shewed upon him, who unless he had relieved betimes his poor wretched servant, so far worn, with some opportune consolation now and then betwixt, it could not possibly be that he should have sustained so intolerable pains and torments; and yet the occasion thereof was not of so great moment and weight. But this we see common among holy and blessed men, how the more devout and godly they are, having the fear of God before their eyes, the more suspicion and mistrust they have of themselves; whereby it cometh to pass, that often they are so terrified and perplexed with small matters, as though they were huge mountains; whereas contrary, others there be whom most heinous and very sore crimes indeed do nothing touch or stir at all.

The occasion of this was, that he being first called by the light of the Holy Spirit to the knowledge of the gospel, and having received a wondrous sweet feeling of Christ's heavenly kingdom, his mind after that falling a little to some cogitation of his former affairs belonging to his vocation, began by and by to misdoubt himself upon the occasion of these words written in the 7th to the Hebrews, "For it cannot be that they which were once illuminated, and have tasted the heavenly gift," &c. Upon the consideration of which words, he fully persuaded himself that he had sinned verily against the Holy Ghost; even so much, that if he had been in the deepest pit of hell, he could almost have despaired no more of his salvation. Here readily every good man may judge of himself what terrors, boilings, and convulsions turmoiled in the mean time in his woful breast; although it be hard for any man to judge the grievousness thereof, unless he which hath experience of the like.

In comparing now the torments of all martyrs with his pains, I pray you what pains, punishment, and flames, would not he willingly have suffered to have had some time of refreshing? Who in such intolerable griefs of mind, although he neither had nor could have any joy of his meat, yet was he compelled to eat against his appetite, to the end to defer the time of his damnation so long as he might, thinking with himself no less but that he must needs be thrown into hell, the breath being once out of his body. Albeit Christ he thought did pity his ease, and was sorry for him; yet he could not, as he imagined, help, because of the verity of the word which said, "It cannot be," &c.

And this I rehearse of him, not so much to open his wounds and sorrows, as for that by his example all we with him may glorify the Son of God, who suffereth none to be tempted above his strength, but so tempereth and seasoneth the asperity of evils, that what seemeth to us intolerable, not only he doth alleviate the same that we may bear it, but also turneth it to our further advantage. Which well appeared in this good servant of God, in no man more; who although he suffered many years so sharp temptations and strong buffetings of Satan, yet the Lord, who graciously preserved him all the while, not only at last did rid him out of all discomfort, but also framed him thereby to such mortification of life, as the like hath not been seen; in such sort as he, being like one placed in heaven already, and dead in this world, both in word and meditation, led a life altogether celestial, abhorring in his mind all profane doings; neither was his talk different from the fruits of his life, never speaking any idle, vile, or vain word. The most part of his lands he distributed to the use of his brethren, and committed the rest to the guiding of his servants and officers, whereby the more quietly he might give himself to his godly study, as to a continual Sabbath rest. This was about the latter end of king Henry's reign, and continued a great part of the time of king Edward VI.

After this, in the persecuting days of queen Mary, as soon as the bishop of Coventry heard the fame of this John aforesaid, being so ardent and zealous in the gospel of Christ, soon he wrote his letter to the mayor and officers of Coventry, to apprehend him as soon as might be. But it chanced otherwise, by God's holy providence disposing all things after his own secret pleasure; who seeing his old and trusty servant so many years with so extreme and many torments broken and dried up, would in no wise heap too many sorrows upon one poor man; neither would commit him to the flames of fire, who had been already baked and scorched with the sharp fires of inward affliction, and had sustained so many burning darts and conflicts of Satan for so many years: God, therefore, of his divine providence, thinking it too much that one man should be so much overcharged with so many plagues and torments, did graciously provide that

Robert his brother (being both stronger of body, and also better furnished with helps of learning to answer the adversaries, being a master of arts in Cambridge) should sustain that conflict; and so it came to pass, as ye shall hear.

For as soon as the mayor of Coventry had received the bishop's letters for the apprehending of Mr. John Glover, he sent forthwith a private watch-word to the said John to convey away himself; who with his brother William was not so soon departed out of his house, but that yet in the sight of the sheriff and others the searchers came and rushed in to take him, according to the bishop's commandment.

But when the said John could in no place be found, one of the officers going into an upper chamber, found there Robert, the other brother, lying on his bed, and sick of a long disease, who was by him incontinent brought before the sheriff. Which sheriff notwithstanding favouring Robert and his cause, would indeed fain have dismissed him, and wrought what means he could, saying, He was not the man for whom they were sent. Yet nevertheless, being tempted with the stout words of the officer, contending with him to have him stayed till the bishop's coming, he was constrained to carry him away against his will; and so laid him fast while the bishop came. And thus much by the way of preamble first concerning the worthy remembrance of Mr. John Glover.

Now to consider the story and martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover, the whole narration of the same by his own record and testimony being written to his wife; I shall exhibit his own letter, the contents whereof here follow:

A Letter of Mr. Robert Glover to his Wife, containing the whole Discourse and Description of his Troubles sustained in Prison, and of his sundry Conflicts between the Bishop and him about Religion.

To my entirely beloved wife, Mary Glover.—The peace of conscience which passeth all understanding, the sweet consolation, comfort, strength, and boldness, of the Holy Ghost, be continually increased in your heart, through a fervent, earnest, and steadfast faith in our most dear and only Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

I thank you heartily, most loving wife, for your letters sent unto me in my imprisonment. I read them with tears more than once or twice, with tears, I say, for joy and gladness that God had wrought in you so merciful a work; first, an unfeigned repentance; secondly, an humble and hearty reconciliation; thirdly, a willing submission and obedience to the will of God in all things. Which when I read in your letters, and judged them to proceed from the bottom of your heart, I could not but be thankful to God, rejoicing with tears for you, and these his great mercies poured upon you.

So long as God shall lend you continuance in this miserable world, above all things give yourself continually to prayer, lifting up (as St. Paul saith) clean or pure hands, without anger, wrath, or doubting; forgiving (as he saith also) if you have any thing against any man, as Christ forgiveth us. And because God's word teacheth us not only the true manner of praying, but also what we ought to do, or not to do, in the whole discourse and practice of this life, what pleaseth or displeaseth God, and that, as Christ saith, the word of God that he hath spoken, shall judge in the last day; let your prayer be to this end especially, That God of his great mercy would open and reveal more and more daily to your heart and true sense, knowledge, and understanding of his most holy word, and give you grace in your living to express the fruits thereof.

And forasmuch as it is, as the Holy Ghost calleth it, the word of affliction, that is, it is seldom without hatred, persecution, peril, danger of loss of life and goods, and whatsoever seemeth pleasant in this world, as experience teacheth you in this time; call upon God continually for his assistance, as Christ teacheth, casting your accounts what it is like to cost you, endeavouring yourself through the help of the Holy Ghost, by continuance of prayer, to lay your foundation so sure, that no storm of tempest shall be able to overthrow or cast it down; remembering always (as Christ saith) Lot's wife; that is, to beware of looking back to that thing that displeaseth God. And because nothing displeaseth God so much as idolatry, that is, false worshipping of God otherwise than his word commandeth; look not back, I say, nor turn your face to their idolatrous and blasphemous massing, manifestly against the word, practice, and example of Christ; as it is most manifest to all that have any taste of the true understanding of God's word, that there remaineth nothing in the church of England at this present, profitable or edifying to the church and congregation of the Lord, all things being done in an unknown tongue, contrary to the express commandment of the Holy Ghost.

They object that they be the church, and therefore they must be believed. My answer was, The church of God knoweth and acknowledgeth no other head but Jesus Christ the Son of God; whom ye have refused, and chosen the man of sin, the son of perdition, enemy to Christ, the devil's deputy and lieutenant, the pope.

Christ's church heareth, teacheth, and is ruled, by his word; as he saith, "My sheep hear my voice. If you abide in me, and my word in you, you be my disciples." Their church repelleth God's word, and forceth all men to follow their traditions.

Christ's church dare not add or diminish, alter or change, his blessed testament; but they be not afraid to take away all that Christ instituted, and go a whoring (as the scripture saith) with their own inventions, and to glory and rejoice in the works of their own hands.

The church of Christ is, hath been, and shall be in all ages, under the cross, persecuted, molested, and afflicted; the world ever hating them, because they be not of the world. But these persecute, murder, slay, and kill, such as profess the true doctrine of Christ, be they in learning, living, conversation, and other virtues, never so excellent.

Christ and his church reserved the trial of their doctrine to the word of God, and gave the people leave to judge thereof by the same word, Search the scriptures. But this church taketh away the word from the people, and suffereth neither learned nor unlearned to examine or prove their doctrine by the word of God.

The true church of God laboureth by all means to resist and withstand the lusts, desires, and motions of the world, the flesh, and the devil: these for the most part give themselves to all voluptuousness, and secretly commit such things, which (as St. Paul saith) it is shame to speak of.

By these and such like manifest probations, they do declare themselves to be none of the church of Christ, but rather of the synagogue of Satan. It shall be good for you oftentimes to confer and compare their proceedings and doings with the practice of those whom the word of God doth teach to have been true members of the church of God, and it shall work in you both knowledge, erudition, and boldness, to withstand with suffering their doings. I likened them, therefore, to Nimrod, whom the scripture calleth a mighty hunter, or a stout champion; telling them, that which they could not have by the word they would have by the sword, and be the church whether men will or no; and called them with good conscience (as Christ called their forefathers) the children of the devil; and as their father the devil is a liar and a murderer, so their kingdom and church, as they call it, standeth by lying and murdering.

Have no fellowship with them therefore, my dear wife, nor with their doctrine and traditions, lest you be partaker of their sins; for whom is reserved a heavy damnation, without speedy repentance. Beware of such as shall advertise you something to bear with the world, as they do, for a season. There is no dallying with God's matters; It is a fearful thing, as St. Paul saith, to fall into the hand of God. Remember the prophet Elias, Why halt ye between two opinions? Remember what Christ saith, He that putteth his hands to the plough, and looketh back, is not worthy of me. And seeing God hath hitherto allowed you as a good soldier in the forward, play not the coward, neither draw back to the reward. St. John numbereth among them that shall dwell in the fiery lake, such as be fearful in God's cause. Set before your eyes always the examples of such as have behaved themselves boldly in God's cause, as Stephen, Peter, Paul, Daniel, the three children, the widow's sons; and in your days, Ann Askew, Lawrence Saunders, John Bradford, with many other faithful witnesses of Christ. Be afraid in nothing, saith St. Paul, of the adversaries of Christ's doctrine, the which is to them the sign of perdition, but to you of everlasting salvation. Christ commandeth the same, saying, Fear them not. Let us not follow the example of him which asketh time first to take leave of his friends; if we so do, we shall find few of them that will encourage us to go forward in our business, please it God never so much. We read not that James and John, Andrew and Simon, when they were called, put off the time till they had known their fathers' and friends' pleasure. But the scripture saith, They forsook all, and immediately followed Christ. Christ likened the kingdom of God to a precious pearl, the which whosoever findeth, selleth all that he hath to buy it. Yea, whosoever hath but a little taste or glimmering how precious a treasure the kingdom of heaven is, will gladly forego both life and goods for the obtaining of it. But the most part now-a-days be like to Æsop's cock, which when he had found a precious stone, wished rather to have found a barley-corn: so ignorant be they how precious a jewel the word of God is, that they choose rather the things of this world, which being compared to it, be less in value than a barley-corn.

If I would have given place to worldly reasons, these might have moved me: First, the foregoing of you and my children; the consideration of the state of my children, being yet tender of age and young, apt and inclinable to virtue and learning, and so having the more need of my assistance, being not altogether destitute of gifts to help them withal; possessions above the common sort of men; because I was never called to be a preacher or minister; and (because of my sickness) fear of death in imprisonment before I should come to my answer, and so my death be unprofitable.

But these, and such like, (I thank my heavenly Father, which of his infinite mercy inspired me with his Holy Ghost for his Son's sake, my only Saviour and Redeemer,) prevailed not in me; but when I had by the wonderful permission of God fallen into their hands, at the first sight of the sheriff nature a little abashed; yet, ere I came to the prison, by the working of God, and through his goodness, fear departed. I said to the sheriff at his coming unto me, What matter have you, master sheriff, to charge me withal? He answered, You shall know when you come before the masters. And so taking me with him, I looked to have been brought before the masters, and to have heard what they could have burdened me withal; but contrary to my expectation, I was committed forthwith to the gaol, not being called to my answer, little justice being shewed therein. But the less justice a man findeth at their hands, the more consolation in conscience shall he find from God; for whosoever is of the world, the world will love him.

After I came into prison, and had reposed myself there awhile, I wept for joy and gladness, musing much of the great mercies of God, and, as it were, saying to myself after this sort: O Lord, who am I, on whom thou shouldest bestow this thy great mercy, to be numbered among the saints that suffer for the gospel sake! And so beholding and considering on the one side my imperfection, unableness, sinful misery, and unworthiness, and on the other side the greatness of God's mercy, to be called to so high promotion, I was as it were amazed and overcome for a while with joy and gladness, concluding thus with myself in my heart: O Lord, thou shewest power in weakness, wisdom in foolishness, mercy in sinfulness; who shall hinder thee to choose where and whom thou wilt? As I have zealously loved the confession of thy word, so ever thought I myself to be most unworthy to be partaker of the affliction for this same.

Not long after came unto me Mr. W. Brasbridge, Mr. C. Phineas, and Mr. N. Hopkins, labouring with me to be dismissed upon bonds. To whom my answer was, to my remembrance, after this sort: Forasmuch as the masters have imprisoned me, having nothing to burthen me withal, if I should enter into bonds I should in so doing accuse myself; and seeing they have no matter to lay to my charge, they may as well let me pass without bonds as with bonds.

Secondarily, If I shall enter bonds, covenant, and promise, to appear, I shall do nothing but excuse, colour, and cloke their wickedness, and endanger myself, nevertheless, being bound by my promise to appear. They alleged many worldly persuasions to me to avoid the present peril, and also how to avoid the forfeiture, if I brake promise. I said unto them, I had east up my pennyworth by God's help. They undertook also to make the bond easy.

And when they were somewhat importunate, I said to Mr. Hopkins, that liberty of conscience was a precious thing; and took, as it were, a pause, lifting up my heart to God earnestly for his aid and help, that I might do the thing that might please him. And so when they had let their suit fall, my heart, methought, was wonderfully comforted. Mr. Dudley communed with me in like manner; whom I answered in effect as I did before.

Afterward debating the matter with myself, these considerations came into my head: I have from time to time with good conscience, God I take to record, moved all such as I had conference withal, to be no dalliers in God's matters, but to shew themselves, after so great a light and knowledge, hearty, earnest, constant, and stable, in so manifest a truth, and not to give place one jot contrary to the same. Now, thought I, if I shall withdraw myself, and make any shifts to pull my own neck out of the collar, I shall give great offence to my weak brethren in Christ, and advantage to the enemies to slander God's word. It will be said, He hath been a great encourager of others to be earnest and fervent, to fear no worldly perils or dangers, but he himself will give no such example.

Wherefore I thought it my bounden duty, both to God and man, being, as it were, by the great goodness of God marvellously called and appointed herunto, to set aside all fear, perils, and dangers, all worldly respects and considerations; and like as I had heretofore, according to the measure of my small gift, within the compass of my vocation and calling, from the bottom of my heart unfeignedly moved, exhorted, and persuaded, all that profess God's word, manfully to persist in the defence of the same, not with sword and violence, but with suffering and loss of life, rather than to defile themselves again with the whorish abomination of the Romish Antichrist; so the hour being come, with my fact and example to ratify, confirm, and protest, the same to the hearts of all true believers. And to this end, by the mighty assistance of God's holy Spirit, I resolved myself, with much peace of conscience, willingly to sustain whatsoever the Romish Antichrist should do against me, and the rather, because I understood the bishop's coming to be at hand, and considered that poor men's consciences should be then sharply assaulted. So remained I a prisoner in Coventry by the space of ten or eleven days, being never called to my answer of the masters, contrary to the laws of the realm, they having neither statute, law, proclamation, letter, warrant, nor commandment, for my apprehension. They would have laid all the matter upon the summer; who being examined, denied it before their faces, (as one of my friends told me,) saying that he had no commandment concerning me, but for my elder brother. God lay not their extreme doings against me to their charge at the great day.

The second day after the bishop's coming to Coventry, Mr. Warren came to the Guildhall, and willed the chief gaoler to carry me to the bishop. I laid to Mr. Warren's charge the cruel seeking of my death; and when he would have excused himself, I told him he could not wipe his hands so: he was as guilty of my blood before God, as though he had murdered me with his own hands.

And so he departed from me, saying, I needed not to fear, if I would be of his belief. God open their eyes, who cruelly, maliciously, and spitefully persecute, molest, and afflict, the members of Christ, for their conscience sake, and for the true testimony of Christ's word, and cause them most unjustly to be slain and murdered; without speedy repentance they shall dwell with the devil and his angels in the fierce lake everlastingly, where they shall wish and desire, cry and call, but in vain, (as the rich man did,) to be refreshed of them, whom in this world they contemned, despised, disdained, as slaves, misers, and wretches.

When I came before the bishop, in one Denton's house, he began with this protestation, That he was my bishop for lack of a better, and willed me to submit myself.

I said to him, I am not come to accuse myself; what have you to lay to my charge?

He asked me, whether I was learned? I answered, In a small measure.

Master chaneellor standing by, said, I was a master of arts.

Then my lord laid to my charge my not coming to church.

Here I might have dallied with him, and put him to his proofs, forasmuch as I had not been for a long season in his diocese, neither was any of the citizens able to prove any such matter against me. Notwithstanding, I answered him through God's merciful help, that I neither had nor would come at their church as long as their mass was used there, to save (if I had them) five hundred lives. I willed him to shew me one jot or tittle in the scriptures for the proof and defence of the mass.

He answered, he came to teach, and not to be taught. I was content, I told him, to learn of him, so far as he was able to teach me by the word of God.

Bishop. Who shall judge the word?

Glover. Christ was content that the people should judge his doctrine by searching the scriptures, and so was Paul; methinketh ye should claim no further privilege nor pre-eminence than they had.

Thus spake Robert Glover, offering him further, that he was content the primitive church, next to the apostles' time, should judge betwixt the bishop and him. But he refused also to be judged by that. Then he said, he was his bishop, and therefore he must believe him.

Glover. If you say black is white, my lord, must I also say as you say, and believe the same, because you say it is so?

Master chancellor here noted me to be arrogant, because I would not give place to my bishop.

Glover. If you will be believed because you be a bishop, why find you fault with the people that believed Mr. Latimer, Mr. Ridley, Mr. Hooper, and the residue of them that were bishops?

Bishop. Because they were heretics.

Glover. And may not you err as well as they? I looked for learning at my lord's hand to persuade me, and he oppressed me only with his authority. He said I dissented from the church; and asked me where my church was before king Edward's time?

I desired him to shew me where their church was in Elias's time, and what outward shew it had in Christ's time.

Bishop. Elias's complaint was only of the ten tribes that fell from David's house, whom he called heretics.

Glover. You be not able to shew any prophets that the other two tribes had at that same time.

My lord making no answer to that, Mr. Rogers, one of the masters of the city, cometh in the mean season, taking upon him as though he would answer to the text. But my lord forthwith commanded me to be committed to some tower, if they had any besides the common gaol, saying, he would at the end of his visitation of his diocese weed out such wolves. Mr. Rogers willed him to content himself for that night, till they had taken further order for me. Even where it pleaseth you, said I to my lord, I am content; and so I was returned at that time to the common gaol again from whence I came.

On the Friday morning, being the next day after, I had warning by one of the prisoners to prepare myself to ride with my fellow-prisoners the same day to Litchfield, there to be disposed of at the bishop's pleasure. Which tidings at the first something discouraged me, fearing lest I should, by the means of my great sickness, through extreme handling, (which I looked for,) have died in the prison before I should come to my answer. But I rebuked immediately with God's word this infidelity in myself, and by the same corrected mine own mistrust and fancy after this manner: What make I of God? Is not his power as great in Litchfield as in Coventry? Doth not his promise extend as well to Litchfield as to Coventry? Was he not with Habakkuk, Daniel, Meshach, and Jeremiah, in their most dangerous imprisonments? He knoweth what things we have need of. He hath numbered all the hairs of our head. The sparrow falleth not on the ground without our heavenly Father's will; much more will he care for us, if we be not faithless, whom he hath made worthy to be witnesses of his truth. So long as we put our trust in him, we shall never be destitute of his help, neither in prison, neither in sickness nor in health, neither in life nor in death, neither before kings, nor before bishops; nor the devil himself, much less one of his ministers, shall be able to prevail against us. With such like meditations I waxed cheerful, of good comfort; so that hearing one say that they could not provide horses enough for us, I said, Let them carry us in a dung-cart for lack of horses, if they list; I am well content for my part.

Notwithstanding, at the request of my friends, I wrote to Mr. Mayor and his brethren, briefly requiring them that I might make answer here to such things as should be laid to my charge; the contents of which letter were these:

A Letter of Mr. Robert Glover to the Mayor of Coventry and his Brethren.

I beseech you to understand, that it is not unknown, as well to the keeper of the gaol as to the inhabitants about me where I dwell, that I am a man subject to very great sickness, and have been by the space of seven years and more, so that it is not like that I shall be removed without peril and danger of life. And because I was here committed to ward by your appointment, I would gladly here answer to such things as should be laid to my charge. If I may obtain this of you, I have cause thankfully to acknowledge your indifferency; if otherwise, I pray God it be not laid to your charge at the great day, where every man shall have just judgment without respect of person.

Your prisoner in the Lord, always mindful of you in my poor prayer,

ROBERT GLOVER.

But I received no answers of my letters to nor fro; I conjectured, that when the bishop and the chancellor had seen them, it moved them the rather to have me away, being more desirous, as I suppose, to have had me despatched privily in prison than to come openly to my answer. The manner of treating and using me at my first coming to prison did partly declare the same.

Certain sergeants and constables of Coventry being appointed to convey us to Litchfield, to be delivered there to one Jephcot, the chancellor's man, sent from Coventry with us for the same purpose, we were commanded to horseback about eleven or twelve of the clock on Friday, being market-day, that we might be the more gazed and wondered at; and to kindle the people's hearts more against us, they did proclaim a letter concerning a proclamation made for calling in and disannulling of all such books as truly expound and interpret the scriptures. We came to Litchfield about four of the clock at even, and had leave to repose ourselves till our supper time. We inned at the sign of the Swan, where we were entertained friendly and gently.

After supper, Jephcot repaired to us, whom we entreated that upon sureties we might rest ourselves that night, being unprovided of any thing to help ourselves withal in the prison at that present. He was content at the first, but afterwards (whether it was by persuasion, or rather, as it seemed to me, he did but of policy put off the time till he had gathered a multitude to stare and wonder upon us, and also that we should provide nothing to cheer ourselves withal,) he revoked his promise, and so by consent we were had to the prison, the multitude wondering at us. I willed Jephcot before to execute his office with mercy, telling him that they should have judgment without mercy that shewed no mercy. And this mercy I found at his hand.

He put me into a prison that same night, where I continued till I was condemned, in a place next to the dungeon, narrow of room, strong of building, and very cold, with small light, and there allowed he me a bundle of straw instead of my bed, without chair, form, or any other thing else to rest myself withal. God of his mercy gave me great patience through prayer that night, so that if it had been his pleasure I could have been contented to have ended my life. But Jephcot, and one Persey, the bishop's man, (which afterwards was my continual keeper for the most part,) came to me in the morning ; to whom I said, This is a great extremity, God send us patience : and no more.

Then they were content that I should have a bed of mine own procurement. But I was allowed no help, neither night nor day, nor company of any man, notwithstanding my great sickness ; nor yet paper, pen, nor ink, or books, saving my New Testament in Latin, and a prayer-book which I privily stole in.

Within two days after, master Chancellor and one Temsey, a prebendary there, came to me into my prison. Master Chancellor exhorted me to conform myself to my lord and to the church. He wished to my soul no more hurt than to his own ; belike because I had laid to his charge at Coventry the seeking of my blood unjustly and wrongfully.

Now thus the second time I answered Mr. Chancellor to his exhortation, That I refused not to be ruled by that church that was content to be ordered and governed by the word of God. He asked me how I knew the word of God, but by the church ?

Glover. You say, the church sheweth which is the word of God ; therefore the church is above the word of God. This is no good reason in learning, said I ; for it is like unto this : John shewed the people who was Christ ; ergo John was above Christ. Or else, I have a man that knoweth not the king, and I tell him who was the king : am I therefore above the king ?

Mr. Chancellor said, he came not to reason with me ; and so departed. So remained I without any further conference of any man by the space of eight days, till the bishop's coming. In the which time I gave myself continually to prayer and meditation of the merciful promises of God, made unto all, without exception of persons, that call upon the name of his dear Son Jesus Christ. I found in myself daily amendment of health of body, increase of peace in conscience, and many consolations from God, by the help of his holy Spirit, and sometimes as it were a taste and glimmering of the life to come ; all for his only Son Jesus Christ's sake. To him be all praise for ever and ever.

The enemy ceased not many times sundry ways to assault me, often objecting to my conscience mine own unworthiness through the greatness of the benefit to be counted among the number of them that should suffer for Christ, for his gospel's sake. Against him I replied with the word of God, on this sort : What were all those whom God had chosen from the beginning, to be his witnesses, and to carry his name before the world ? Were they not men, as Paul and Barnabas said, as well subject to wickedness, sin, and imperfections, as other men be ? Even such were Noah, Abraham, David, and all the rest ; as Paul saith, Who gave first unto him ? And also speaking to every man, What hast thou that thou receivedst not ? Likewise John, All have received of his fulness. They were no bringers of any goodness to God, but altogether receivers. They chose not God first, but he chose them. They loved not God first, but he loved them first ; yea, he both loved and chose them when they were his enemies, full of sin and corruption, and void of all goodness. He is and will be still the same God, as rich in mercy, as mighty, as able, as ready, as willing, to forgive sins without respect of person, to the world's end, of all them that call upon him. God is near, he is at hand, he is with all, in all, and refuseth none, excepteth none that faithfully in true repentance call upon him, in what hour, what place, or what time, soever it be. It is no arrogancy nor presumption in any man to burden God, as it were, with his promise, and is a duty to claim and challenge his aid, help, and assistance, in all our perils, dangers, and distress ; calling upon him, not in the confidence of our own godliness, but in the trust of his promises made in Christ, in whom, and by whom, and for whose sake, whosoever boldly approacheth to the mercy-seat of the Father, is sure to receive whatsoever is expedient or necessary either for body or soul, in more ample wise, and large manner, than he can well wish or dare desire. His word cannot lie, Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee, and thou shalt praise me.

I answered the enemy also on this manner : I am a sinner, and therefore unworthy to be a witness of his truth. What then ? must I deny his word, because I am not worthy to profess it ? What bring I to pass in so doing, but add sin to sin ? What is greater sin than to deny the truth of Christ's gospel ? as Christ himself beareth witness, "He that is ashamed of me or of my words, of him I will also be ashamed before my Father and all his angels. I might also by like reason forbear to do any of God's commandments.

When I am provoked to pray, the enemy may say to me, I am not worthy to pray, therefore I shall not pray : and so in like manner of all the commandments, I shall not forbear swearing, stealing, murdering, because I am not worthy to do any commandment of God. These be the delusions of the devil, and Satan's suggestions, which must be overcome by continuance of prayer, and with the word of God applied, according to the measure of every man's gift, against all assaults of the devil.

At the bishop's first coming to Litchfield, after mine imprisonment, I was called into a by-chamber next to my prison, to my lord. Before whom when I came, and saw none but his officers, chaplains, and servants, except it were an old priest, I was partly amazed, and lifted up my heart to God for his merciful aid and assistance.

My lord asked me how I liked my imprisonment ? I gave him no answer touching that question. He proceeded to persuade me to be a member of his church, which had continued so many years. As for our church, as he called it, it was not known, he said, but lately in king Edward's time.

I profess myself to be a member of that church (said I) that is builded upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the head corner-stone ; and so alleged the place of St. Paul to the Ephesians. And this church hath been from the beginning, said I, though it bear no glorious show before the world, being ever for the most part under the cross and affliction, contemned, despised, and persecuted. My lord, on the other side, contended that they were the church.

Glover. So cried all the clergy against the prophets of Jerusalem, saying, Templum Domini, Templum Domini : The church, the church of the Lord, are we. But always when I was about to speak any thing, my lord cried, Hold thy peace ; I command thee by the virtue of obedience to hold thy peace ; calling me a proud arrogant heretic.

I willed my lord to lay to my charge some particulars, and then to convince me with some scriptures and good learning.

Then my lord began to move certain questions. I refused to answer him in corners, requiring that I might make my answers openly. He said I should answer him there. I stood with him upon that point, until he said I should go to prison again, and there have neither meat nor drink till I had answered him.

Then I lifted up my heart to God, that I might stand and agree with the doctrine of his most holy word.

The first question was this, How many sacraments Christ instituted to be used in the church ?

The sacrament of baptism, (said I,) and the sacrament that he instituted at his last supper.

No more? said he.

Glover. To all those that declare a true and unfeigned repentance, a sure hope, trust, and confidence, in the death of Christ, to such, ministers I grant have authority to pronounce, by the power of God's word, the remission of sins.

Here, interrupting me, he would needs bear me in hand that I called this a sacrament. I would not much contend with him in that point, because that matter was of no great weight or importance; although he in so doing did me wrong, for I called it not a sacrament.

He asked me further, whether I allowed their confession? I answered, No.

Then he would know my mind what I thought of the presence of Christ's body in the sacrament.

I answered, that their mass was neither sacrifice nor sacrament, because (said I) you have taken away the true institution, which when you restore again, I will tell you my judgment, concerning Christ's body in the sacrament.

And thus much did this worthy martyr of God leave behind him by his own hand in writing concerning the manner of his using and treating in prison, and also of his conflicts had with the bishop and his chancellor. More examinations he had, no doubt, with the bishop in the public consistory, when he was brought forth to be condemned, which also he would have left unto us, if either length of life, or leisure of time, or haste of execution, had permitted him to finish that he intended; but by reason of the writ of his burning being come down from London, lack of time neither did serve him so to do, neither could I get the records of his last examinations.

Only this which I could learn by relation of one Austen Bernher, a minister, and a familiar friend of his, concerning the going to his death: I can report, that the said blessed servant of the Lord, Mr. Robert Glover, after he was condemned by the bishop, and was now at a point to be delivered out of this world, it so happened, that two or three days before, his heart being lumpish, and desolate of all spiritual consolation, felt in himself no aptness nor willingness, but rather a dulness and heaviness of spirit, full of much discomfort to bear the bitter cross of martyrdom ready to be laid upon him. Whereupon fearing in himself lest the Lord had utterly withdrawn his wonted favour from him, he made his moan to this Austen, his friend above remembered, signifying unto him how earnestly he had prayed day and night unto the Lord, and yet could receive no motion nor sense of any comfort from him.

Unto whom the said Austen answering again, willed and desired him patiently to wait the Lord's pleasure, and howsoever his present feeling was, yet seeing his cause was just and true, he exhorted him constantly to stick to the same, and to play the man, nothing misdoubting but the Lord in his good time would visit him, and satisfy his desire with plenty of consolation; whereof, he said, he was right certain and sure, and therefore desired him, whensoever any such feeling of God's heavenly mercies should begin to touch his heart, that then he should shew some signification thereof, whereby he might witness with him the same; and so departed from him.

The next day, when the time came of his martyrdom, as he was going to the place, and was now come to the sight of the stake, although all the night before praying for strength and courage he could feel none, suddenly he was so mightily replenished with God's holy comfort and heavenly joys that he cried out, clapping his hands, to Austen, and saying in these words, "Austen, he is come! he is come!" &c. and that with such joy and alacrity, as one seeming rather to be risen from some deadly danger to liberty of life, than as one passing out of the world by any pains of death. Such was the change of the marvellous working of the Lord's hand upon that good man.

CORNELIUS BUNGEY, fellow Martyr with Mr. R. Glover.

In the same fire with him was burned also Cornelius Bungey, a capper, of Coventry, and condemned by the said Radulph, bishop of Coventry and Litchfield. As concerning the articles which were to him objected, the effect thereof was this:

First, it was artienlated against him, that these three years last, in the city of Coventry and Litchfield, and other places about, he did hold, maintain, argue, and teach, that the priest hath no power here to absolve any sinner from his sins.

Secondly, That by baptism sins be not washed away, because, he said, that the washing of the flesh purgeth the flesh outwardly, and not the soul.

Thirdly, That there be in the church only two sacraments, that is, baptism and the Lord's supper.

Fourthly, That in the sacrament of the popish altar was not the real body and blood of Christ, but the substance of bread and wine there remaining still, because St. Paul calleth it bread and wine, &c.

Fifthly, That he within the compass of the said years and time, did hold, maintain, and defend, that the pope is not the head of the visible church here on earth, &c.

Sixthly, That he was of the diocese and jurisdiction of the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, &c.

Seventhly, That the premises are true, manifest, and notorious, and that upon the same there hath been and is a public voice and fame, as well in the places above rehearsed, as in other quarters also about, &c.

His Answer.

Unto which articles he answered again: To the first he granted, and to every part thereof, meaning after the popish manner of absolution.

To the second he granted first, afterwards revoked the same.

To the third also he granted, adding withal, that in scripture there be no more contained.

To the fourth, touching the sacrament, he granted, and to every part thereof.

To the fifth, concerning the pope, likewise.

Also to the sixth he granted, and likewise to the seventh.

Upon these articles and his answers to the same, the said Radulph, the bishop, read the sentence, and so committed him also, after condemnation of Mr. Robert Glover, to the secular power.

Thus this aforesaid Cornelius, falsely condemned by the bishop before-mentioned, suffered at the same stake with the Christian martyr, Mr. Robert Glover, at Coventry, about the 20th day of September.

Here followeth the Story of JOHN and WILLIAM GLOVER.

Now that we have discoursed of Mr. Robert Glover, something also should be touched of his other two brethren, John and William Glover. Who, although they were not called to finish their course by like kind of martyrdom in the fire as the other did, yet because for their constant profession of God's gospel, unto the latter end, they were exempted after their death, and east out of the same church, as the other was, I thought them not unworthy therefore in the story to be joined together, which in one cause and the same profession were not sundered one from the other.

And first concerning Mr. John Glover, the eldest brother, what inward storms and agonies he sustained by the ghostly enemy, partly ye heard before described; and now what his bodily enemies wrought against him, remains to be declared: whose rage and malice, although God restrained that they could little prevail against him so long as his life endured, yet after his decease, having power upon him, what they did ye shall now understand.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover, although John Glover, seeing his brother to be apprehended for him, had small joy of his life, for the great sorrow of his heart where-with he was sore oppressed, and would gladly have put himself in his brother's stead, if friends had not otherwise persuaded him, shewing that in so doing he might entangle himself, but should do his brother no good: he thus in great care and vexation endured, yet notwithstanding rubbed out as well as he could, till at length about the latter end of queen Mary there was a new search made for the said John Glover.

Whereupon the sheriffs, with their under officers and servants, being sent to seek him, came into the house where he and his wife were. It chanced as he was in the chamber by himself, the officers bursting into the house, and searching other rooms, came to the chamber door where this John Glover was, who being within, and holding the latch softly with his hand, perceived and heard the officers busy about the door, amongst whom one of the said officers having the string in his hand, was ready to draw and pluck at the same.

In the mean time another coming by (whose voice he heard and knew) bade them come away, saying, they had been there before.—Whereupon they departing thence, went to search other corners of the house, where they found Agnes Glover, his wife; who being had to Litchfield, and there examined before the bishop, at length, after much ado, was constrained to give place to their tyranny. John Glover in the mean time, partly for care of his wife, partly through cold taken in the woods where he did lie, took an ague; whereupon not long after he left his life, which the cruel Papists so long had sought for.

Thus by the mighty protection of the Almighty, how John Glover was delivered and defended from the hands of the persecuting enemies during all the time of his life, ye have heard. Now what befell after his death, both to him and William his brother, is not unworthy to be remembered. Who after that he was dead, and buried in the church-yard without priest or clerk, Dr. Draeot, then chancellor, six weeks after sent for the parson of the town, and demanded how it chanced that he was there buried? The parson answered, That he was then sick, and knew not of it.

Then the chancellor commanded the parson to go home, and to cause the body of the said John Glover to be taken up, and to be east over the wall into the highway. The parson again answered, that he had been six weeks in the earth, and so smelled that none would be able to abide the savour of him. Well, quoth Dr. Draeot, then take this bill, and pronounce him in the pulpit a damned soul, and a twelve-month after take up his bones, for then the flesh will be consumed, and east them over the wall, that carts and horses may tread upon them, and then I will come and hallow again that place in the church-yard where he was buried.

Not much unlike usage was practised also by these Catholic children of the mother church upon the body of William, the third brother: whom after it had pleased Almighty God about the same season to call out of this vale of misery, the good disposed people of the town of Weme, in Shropshire, where he died, brought the body unto the parish church, intending there to have it buried. But one Bernard, being then curate of the said church, to stop the burial thereof, rode to the bishop, named Ralph Baine, to certify him of the matter, and to have his advice there. In the mean time, the body lying there a whole day, in the night time one Richard Morice, a tailor, would have interred him. But then came John Thorlyne, of Weme, with others, and would not suffer the body to be buried; expressing to us the contrary examples of good Tobit: for as he was religious in burying the dead, so this man putteth religion in not burying the dead. So that after he had lain there two days and one night, cometh the aforesaid Bernard, the curate, with the bishop's letter, the contents of which letter being copied out word for word, here followeth:

A Copy of the Bishop's Letter, written to the Parish of Weme.

"Understanding that one Glover, an heretic, is dead in the parish of Weme, which Glover hath for all the time of my being in this country been known for a rebel against our holy faith and religion, a contemner of the holy sacraments and ceremonies used in the holy church, and hath separated himself from the holy communion of all good Christian men, and never required to be reconciled to our mother holy church, nor in his last days did call for his ghostly father, but died without all rites belonging to a Christian man: I thought it good not only to command the curate of Weme that he should not be buried in Christian man's burial, but also will and command all the parish of Weme, that no man procure, help, nor speak, to have him buried in holy ground; but I do charge and command the churchwardens of Weme in special, and all the parish of the same, that they assist the said curate in defending and letting, and procuring that he be not buried either in the church, or within the wanybles of the church-yard. And likewise I charge those that brought the body to the place, to carry it away again, and that at their charge, as they will answer at their peril, At Ecclesch, this 6th of September, anno 1558.

"By your ordinary,

"RADULPH, Coventry and Litchfield."

By the virtue of this aforesaid letter, so it fell out, that they which brought the corpse thither, were fain at their own charges to carry it back again. But for so much as the body was corrupted, and smelt so strongly that no man might come near it, they were forced to draw it with horses into a broom-field, and there was he buried.

The like example of charitable affection in these Catholic churchmen is also to be seen and noted in the burying of one EDWARD BURTON, esquire, who in the diocese of Chester, departing out of this world the very day before queen Elizabeth was crowned, required of his friends, as they would answer for it, that his body should be buried in the parish church, (which was St. Chad's in Shrewsbury,) so that no mass-monger should be present thereat.—Which thing being declared to the curate of that parish, named Sir John Marshall, and the body being withal brought to the burial, upon the same day when the queen was crowned, the curate being therewith offended, said plainly, that he should not be buried in the church there. Whereunto one of his friends, named George Torperly, answering again, said, that God would judge him in the last day, &c. Then answered the priest, Judge God or devil, the body shall not come there. And so they buried him in his own garden; where he is, no doubt, as near the kingdom of heaven as if he had been buried in the midst of the chureh.

Moreover, in the said county of Salop, I find that one OLIVER RICHARDINE, of the parish of Whitechurch, was burned in Hartford-west, Sir John Ygone being sheriff the same time, which seemeth to be about the latter year of king Henry VIII. Whose name, because it was not mentioned before, I thought here to give some little notice of him, having now in hand to speak of the persecution within the diocese of Coventry and Litchfield.

The Martyrdom of WILLIAM WOLSEY, and ROBERT PYGOT, Painter.

After the suffering of Mr. Robert Glover, and Cornelius Bungey, at Coventry, followeth next the condemnation of other two blessed martyrs, which were judged and condemned at Ely, by John Fuller, the bishop's chancellor of Ely, Dr. Shaxton, his suffragan, R. Steward, dean of Ely, Jno. Christopherson, dean of Norwich, anno 1555, October 9th; the names of which martyrs were William Wolsey, and Robert Pygot, dwelling both in the town of Wisbeach, which William Wolsey being a constable, dwelling in the town of Well, was there brought to death by the means and procurement of one Richard Everard, gentleman, a justice appointed for those days, who cruelly handled the said William Wolsey, and bound him to the good appearing, causing him to put in sureties upon his good behaviour, until the next general sessions holden within the isle of Ely; and so the said Wolsey being despatched of his office, and brought in trouble, removed his house and dwelling-place, coming to dwell in the town of Wisbeach. Then being called again at the next session, he was still constrained to put in new sureties, which at length he refused to do, and so was commanded to the gaol at the assize holden at Ely in Lent.

In the Easter-week following, there repaired to confer with him Dr. Fuller, the chancellor, with Christopherson, and one Dr. Yongg, who laid earnestly to his charge, that he was out of the Catholic faith, willing him to meddle no further with the scriptures than it did become such a layman as he was to do. The said William Wolsey standing still a great while, suffering them to say their pleasure, at the last answering in this wise: Good Mr. Doctor, what did our Saviour Christ mean, when he spake these words written in the 23d chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, "Wo be unto you, scribes and Pharisees, ye hypocrites, for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven before men: ye yourselves go not in, neither suffer ye them that come to enter in?"

Yea, saith Dr. Fuller, you must understand, that Christ spake to the scribes and pharisees.

Nay, master Doctor, saith Wolsey, Christ spake even to you, and your fellows here present, and to all other such like as you be.

Away, master Doctor, said Christopherson, for you can do no good with this man. Yet saith Dr. Fuller, I will leave thee a book to read, I promise thee, of a learned man's doing, that is to say, of Dr. Watson's doing, (who was then bishop of Lineoln.)

Wolsey, receiving the same book, did diligently read it over, which in many places did manifestly appear contrary to the known truth of God's word. At length, a fortnight or three weeks following, the said Dr. Fuller resorting again to the prison-house to confer with the said Wolsey, did ask him how he did like the said book, thinking that he had won him by the reading of the same; who answered him, and said, Sir, I like the book no otherwise than I thought before I should find it. Whereupon the chancellor taking his book, departed home.

At night, when Dr. Fuller came to his chamber to look on it, he did find in many places, contrary to his mind, the book erased with a pen by the said Wolsey. The which he seeing, and being vexed therewith, said, Oh this is an obstinate heretic, and hath quite marred my book.

Then the assizes holden at Wisbeach drawing nigh, Dr. Fuller cometh again to Wolsey, and speaketh unto him in this manner: Thou dost much trouble my conscience: wherefore I pray thee depart and rule thy tongue, so that I hear no more complaint of thee, and come to the church when thou wilt; and if thou be complained upon, so far as I may I promise thee I will not hear of it.

Master Doctor, quoth Wolsey, I was brought hither by a law, and by a law I will be delivered.

Then being brought to the sessions before-named, Wolsey was laid in the castle at Wisbeach, thinking to him and all his friends that he should have suffered there at that present time; but it proved otherwise.

Then Robert Pygot, the painter, being at liberty, was there presented by some evil disposed persons (sworn men, as they called them) for not coming to the church.

The said Pygot being called in the sessions, would not absent himself, but there did plainly appear before Sir Clement Hygham, being judge; who said unto him, Ah, are you the holy father the painter? How chance ye came not to the church?

Sir, quoth the painter, I am not out of the church, I trust in God.

No, Sir, said the judge: this is no church, this is a hall.

Yea, sir, said Pygot, I know very well it is a hall; but he that is in the true faith of Jesus Christ, is never absent, but present in the church of God.

Ah, sirrah, said the judge, you are too high learned for me to talk withal; wherefore I will send you to them that be better learned than I: straightways commanding him to the gaol where Wolsey lay. So the sessions being broken up and ended, the said Wolsey and Pygot were carried again to Ely into prison, where they both did remain till the day of their death.

In the mean time certain of their neighbours of Wisbeach aforesaid, being at Ely, came to see how they did. There came thither also a chaplain of bishop Godrikes, a Frenchman born, one Peter Volentius, who said unto the said Wolsey and Pygot, "My brethren, according to mine office, I am come to talk with you; for I have been almoner here these twenty years and above. Wherefore I must desire you, my brethren, to take it in good part that I am come to talk with you; I promise you not to pull you from your faith. But I both require and desire, in the name of Jesus Christ, that you stand to the truth of the gospel and word; and I beseech the Almighty God, for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, to preserve both you and me in the same unto the end. For I know not myself, my brethren, how soon I shall be at the same point that you now are." Thus with many other like words he made an end, causing all that were there present to water their cheeks, contrary to the hope they all had in him; God be praised therefore.

Then within short time after, Pygot and Wolsey were called to judgment about the 9th day of October, before Dr. Fuller, then chancellor, with old Dr. Shaxton, Christopherson, and others in commission, who laid earnestly to their charge for their belief in divers articles, but especially of the sacrament of the altar. Wherunto their answer was, That the sacrament of the altar was an idol, and that the natural body and blood of Christ were not present really in the said sacrament; and to this opinion they said they would stick, believing perfectly the same to be no heresy that they had affirmed, but the very truth, wherunto they would stand. Then said the doctors, that they were out of the Catholic faith.

Then Dr. Shaxton said unto them, Good brethren, remember yourselves, and become new men; for I myself was in this fond opinion that you are now in, but I am now become a new man.

Ah, said Wolsey, are you become a new man! Wo be to thee, thou wicked new man, for God shall justly judge thee.

Dr. Fuller then spake, saying, This Wolsey is an obstinate fellow, and one that I could never do good upon; but as for the painter, he is a man quiet and indifferent, as far as I perceive, and is soon reformed, and may very well be delivered, for any evil opinion I find in him.

Then Christopherson called for pen and ink, and wrote those words following: "I, Robert Pygot, do believe, that after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, there remaineth no more bread and wine, but the very body and blood of Christ really and substantially, the self-same that was born of the Virgin Mary." And reading it to the painter, he said thus, Dost thou believe all this according as it is written?

Pygot. No, Sir; that is your faith, and not mine.

Christop. Lo, master Dr. Fuller, you would have let this fellow go! he is as much an heretic as the other.

And so immediately judgment was given upon them to die. Which done, after the sentence read, they were sent again to the prison, where they did lie till the day of their death. At which day one Peacock, bachelor of divinity, being appointed to preach, took his text out of the first epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, chap. v. of one that had lived inordinately by abusing his father's wife; likening the said Pygot and Wolsey to the same man, oftentimes saying, that such members must be cut off from the congregation; most maliciously reporting the said Wolsey to be clean out of the faith, and in many places quite denying the scripture.

So his sermon being ended, the forenamed Pygot and Wolsey being brought to the place of execution, and so bound to the stake with a chain, thither cometh one Sir Richard Collinson, a priest, at that time destitute of any bidding place or stay of benefice; who said unto Wolsey, "Brother Wolsey, the preacher hath openly reported in his sermon this day that you are quite out of the Catholic faith, and deny baptism, and that you do err in the holy scripture; wherefore I beseech you, for the certifying of my conscience, with others here present, that you declare in what place of the scripture you do err or find fault."

Wolsey. I take the eternal and everlasting God to witness, that I do err in no part or point in God's book, the holy Bible, but hold and believe in the same to be most firm and sound doctrine in all points, most worthy for my salvation, and for all other Christians to the end of the world: whatsoever mine adversaries report of me, God forgive them therefore.

With that cometh one to the fire with a great sheet knit full of books to burn, like as they had been New Testaments. O, said Wolsey, give me one of them; and Pygot desired another, both of them clapping them close to their breasts, saying the 106th Psalm, desiring all the people to say Amen; and so received the fire most thankfully.

Concerning the story of William Wolsey, I received more-over from the university of Cambridge, by a credible person, and my faithful friend William Fulke, this relation, which I thought in this place not unmeet to be notified unto the reader in order and form as followeth:

There were burned at Ely two godly martyrs, the one called Wolsey, the other Pygot.

In these two appeared a diverse disposition of spirit: Pygot was mild, humble, and modest, promising that he would be conformable to his persecutors, if they could persuade him by the scripture. The other, Wolsey, was stout, strong, and vehement, as one having πληροφориαν of the Spirit, and detested all their doings, as of whom he was sure to receive nothing but cruelty and tyranny. He was wonderfully jealous over his companion, fearing lest his gentle nature would have been overcome by the flattering enticements of the world; and therefore the same day that they were burned, when they would have talked with him alone, he pulled him away from them almost by force. He was so desirous to glorify God with his suffering, that being wonderfully sore tormented in the prison with the toothache, he feared nothing more than that he should depart before the day of execution (which he called his glad day) were come.

This Wolsey being in prison at Ely, was visited by Thos. Hodilo, beer-brewer, in Ely; to him he delivered certain money to be distributed, as he appointed, part to his wife, and part to his kinsfolks and friends, and especially six shillings and eightpence to be delivered to one Richard Denton, smith, dwelling at Wells, in Cambridgeshire, within the jurisdiction of the Isle of Ely, with his commendation, that he marvelled that he tarried so long behind him, seeing that he was the first that delivered him the book of scripture into his hand, and told him that it was the truth; desiring him to make haste after as fast as he could.

This Thomas Hodilo, both to avoid the danger of the time, and to have a witness of his doings herein, delivered the said sum of money to one Mr. Lawrence, preacher in Essex, (when they resorted often to his house,) to be distributed as Wolsey had appointed; which thing he performed, riding from place to place. And when this six shillings and eightpence was delivered to Richard Denton, with the commendation aforesaid, his answer was this, "I confess it is true; but, alas! I cannot burn." This was almost one whole year after Wolsey was burned. But he that could not burn in the cause of Christ, was afterwards burned against his will, when Christ had given peace to his church: for in the year of our Lord 1561, on Tuesday, being the 18th of April, his house was set on fire, and while he went in to save his goods, he lost his life, with two others that were in the same house!—How true are the words of Christ, "He who will save his life, shall lose it."

Dr. NICHOLAS RIDLEY, and Mr. HUGH LATIMER, both Bishops, Preachers, and Martyrs of Christ, with their Doings, Conferences, and Sufferings, described.

The same year, month, and day, which the aforesaid two martyrs, W. Wolsey and T. Pygot, suffered at Ely, October 16, 1555, followed also at Oxford the slaughter of two other special and singular captains and principal pillars of Christ's church, Mr. Ridley, bishop of London, and Mr. Hugh Latimer, bishop some time of Worcester; of whose famous doings and memorable learning, and incomparable ornaments and gifts of grace, we shall not stand exactly at this time in setting forth a full description of the same, but only speak briefly touching the order of their lives.

Among many other worthy and sundry histories and notable acts of such as of late days have been turmoiled, murdered, and martyred, for the true gospel of Christ in queen Mary's reign, the tragical story and life of Dr. Ridley I thought good to commend to chronicle, and leave to perpetual memory; beseeching thee, gentle reader, with care and study well to peruse, diligently to consider, and deeply to print the same in the breast, seeing him to be a man beautified with such excellent qualities, so ghostly inspired and godly learned, and now written doubtless in the book of life, with the blessed saints of the Almighty, crowned and throned amongst the glorious company of martyrs. First, descending of a stock right worshipful, he was born in Northumberland, who being a child, learned his grammar with great dexterity in Newcastle, and was removed from thence to the university of Cambridge, where he in short time became so famous, that for his singular aptness he was called to higher functions and offices of the university, by degree attaining thereunto, and was called to be head of Pembroke-hall, and there made doctor of divinity. After this, departing from thence, he travelled to Paris, and at his return was made chaplain to king Henry VIII. and promoted afterward by him to the bishopric of Rochester; and so from thence translated to the see and bishopric of London, in king Edward's days.

In which calling and offices he so travelled and occupied himself by preaching and teaching the true and wholesome doctrine of Christ, that never good child was more singularly loved of his dear parents, than he of his flock and diocese. Every holiday and Sunday he preached in some one place or other, except he were otherwise hindered by weighty affairs and business; to whose sermons the people resorted, swarming about him like bees, and coveting the sweet flowers and wholesome juice of the fruitful doctrine, which he did not only preach, but shewed the same by his life, as a glittering lantern to the eyes and senses of the blind, in such pure order and chastity of life, that even his very enemies could not reprove him in any one jot.

Besides this, he was passingly well learned, his memory was great, and he of such reading withal, that of right he deserved to be comparable to the best of this our age, as can testify as well divers his notable works, pithy sermons, and sundry his disputations in both the universities; and also his very adversaries, all which will say no less themselves.

Besides all this, wise he was of counsel, deep of wit, and very politic in all his doings. How merciful and careful he was to reduce the obstinate Papists from their erroneous opinions, and by gentleness to win them to the truth, his gentle ordering and courteous handling of Dr. Heath, late archbishop of York, being prisoner with him in king Edward's time in his house one year, sufficiently declareth. In fine, he was such a prelate, and in all points so good, godly, and spiritual a man, that England may justly rue the loss of so worthy a treasure.

Now will I speak something more particularly of his person and conditions. He was a man right comely and well proportioned in all points, both in complexion and lineaments of the body. He took all things in good part, bearing no malice or rancour from his heart, but straightways forgetting all injuries and offences done against him. He was very kind to his kinsfolk, and yet not bearing with them any thing otherwise than right would require, giving them always for a general rule, yea, to his own brother and sister, that they doing evil should seek or look for nothing at his hand, but should be as strangers and aliens unto him, and they to be his brother and sister which did honestly, and lived a godly life.

He using all kinds of ways to mortify himself, was given to much prayer and contemplation; for duly every morning, as soon as his apparel was on him, he went forth to his bed-chamber, and there upon his knees prayed the space of half an hour; which being done, immediately he went to his study, (if there came no other business to interrupt him,) where he continued till ten of the clock, and then came to the common prayer, daily used in his house. The prayers being done, he went to dinner; where he used little talk, except otherwise occasion by some had been ministered, and then was it sober, discreet, and wise, and sometimes merry, as cause required.

The dinner done, which was not very long, he used to sit an hour or thereabouts amusing himself with his friends. That done, he returned to his study, and there would continue, except suitors or business abroad were occasion of the contrary, until five o'clock at night, and then would come to common prayer, as in the forenoon; which being finished, he went to supper, behaving himself there as at his dinner before. After supper, recreating himself the space of an hour, he would then return again to his study, continue there till eleven o'clock at night, which was his common hour to go to bed, then saying his prayers upon his knees as in the morning when he rose. Being at his manor of Fulham, as divers times he used to be, he read daily a lecture to his family at the common prayer, beginning at the Acts of the Apostles, and so going through all the epistles of St. Paul, giving to every man that could read it, a New Testament, hiring them besides with money to learn by heart certain principal chapters, but especially the 13th chap. of the Acts, reading also unto his household oftentimes the 101st Psalm, being marvellous careful over his family, that they might be a spectacle of all virtue and honesty to others. To be short, as he was godly and virtuous himself, so nothing but virtue and godliness reigned in his house, feeding them with the food of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Now remaineth a word or two to be declared of his gentle nature and kind pity in the usage of an old woman, called Mrs. Bonner, mother of Dr. Bonner, some time bishop of London, which I thought good to touch, as well for the rare elemency of Dr. Ridley, as the unworthy inhumanity and ungrateful disposition again of Dr. Bonner. Bishop Ridley being at his manor of Fulham, always sent for this said Mrs. Bonner, dwelling in a house adjoining to his house, to dinner and supper, with one Mrs. Mongey, Bonner's sister, saying, Go for my mother Bonner; who coming, was ever placed in the chair at the table's end, being so gently treated, welcomed, and taken, as though he had been born of her own body, being never displaced of her seat, although the king's council had been present, saying, when any of them were there, (as divers times they were,) By your lordship's favour, this place of right and custom is for my mother Bonner.

But how well he was recompensed for this his singular gentleness afterwards at the hands of the said Dr. Bonner, almost the least child that goeth by the ground can declare. For who afterwards was more an enemy to Ridley than Bonner and his? Who more went about seeking his destruction than he, recompensing this his gentleness with extreme cruelty? As well appeared by the strait handling of Ridley's own sister and George Shippide, her husband, from time to time: whereas the gentleness of the other did suffer Bonner's mother, sister, and other of his kindred, not only quietly to enjoy all that which they had of Bonner, but also entertained them in his house, shewing much courtesy and friendship daily unto them. Whereas on the other side, bishop Bonner being restored again, would not suffer the brother and sister of bishop Ridley, and other his friends, not only not to enjoy that which they had by the said their brother bishop Ridley, but also curiously, without all order of law or honesty, by extort power, wrested from them all the livings they had.

And yet being not therewith satisfied, he sought all the means he could to work the death of the aforesaid Shippide, saying, that he would make twelve goldfathers to go upon him; which had been brought to pass indeed, at the time he was prisoner at Oxford, had not God otherwise wrought his deliverance by means of Dr. Heath, then the bishop of Worcester.

Now concerning God's vocation, how Dr. Ridley was first called to the savouring and favouring of Christ and his gospel, partly by his disputation before, and other his treatises, it may appear, that the first occasion of his conversion was by the reading of Bertram's book of the sacrament, whom also the conference with bishop Crammer, and with Peter Martyr, did not a little confirm in that behalf. Who now by the grace of God being thoroughly won and brought to the true way, as he was before blind and zealous in his old ignorance, so was he constant and faithful in the right knowledge which the Lord had opened unto him, (as well appeared by his preachings and doings during all the time of king Edward,) and so long did much good. But after that it so pleased the heavenly will of the Lord our God, to bereave us of our stay, and call from us king Edward, that precious prince, as the whole state of the church of England was left desolate and open to the enemy's hand: so this bishop Ridley, after the coming in of queen Mary, was the first on whom they laid hands, and committed to prison, as before hath sufficiently been expressed; first in the Tower, and then after translated from thence, with the archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Latimer, to Oxford, was with them enclosed in the common gaol and prison of Boeardo, while at length, being dissevered from them, he was committed to custody in the house of one Irish, where he remained till the last day of his death and martyrdom, which was from the year of our Lord 1554 till the year 1555, and 16th day of October. But of his examinations and martyrdom, we shall have occasion to speak more particularly after we have given some account of Mr. Latimer.

The Life and Acts of Mr Hugh Latimer, the famous Preacher and worthy Martyr of Jesus Christ.

After the life of bishop Ridley, followeth likewise the life and doings of the worthy champion, and old practised soldier of Christ, Mr. Hugh Latimer. He was the son of one Hugh Latimer, of Thirkesson, in the county of Leicester, a husbandman of right good estimation; with whom also he was brought up until he was of the age of four years, or thereabout. At which time his parents (having him as then left for their only son, with six other daughters) seeing his ready, prompt, and sharp wit, purposed to train him up in erudition and knowledge of good literature; wherein he so profited in his youth at the common schools of his own country, that at the age of 14 years he was sent to the university of Cambridge. Where, after some continuance of exercises in other things, he gave himself to the study of such school divinity as the ignorance of that age did suffer.

Zealous he was then in the popish religion, and therewith so scrupulous, as himself confessed, that being a priest, and using to say mass, he was so servile an observer of the Romish decrees, that he thought he had never sufficiently mingled his massing wine with water; and, moreover, that he should never be damned if he were once a professed friar, with divers such superstitious fancies.

Notwithstanding, such was the goodness and merciful purpose of God, he was at length himself caught in the blessed net of God's word. For Mr. Thomas Bilney (whose story is before described) being at that time a searcher-out of Satan's subtleties, and a secret overthrower of Antichrist's kingdom, seeing Mr. Latimer to have a zeal in his ways, although without knowledge, was stricken with a brotherly pity towards him, and bethought by what means he might best win this zealous ignorant brother to the true knowledge of Christ. Wherefore, after a short time, he came to Mr. Latimer's study, and desired him to hear him make his confession; which thing he willingly granted. By hearing whereof he was, through the good Spirit of God, so touched, that hereupon he forsook his former studying of the school doctors, and other such fopperies, and became an earnest student of true divinity, as he himself, as well in his conference with Mr. Ridley, as also in his first sermon made upon the Paternoster, doth confess. So that whereas before he was an enemy, and almost a persecutor, of Christ, he was now a zealous seeker after him, changing his old manner of cavilling and railing into a diligent kind of conferring both with Mr. Bilney and others.

After this his winning to Christ, he was not satisfied with his own conversion only, but, like a true disciple of the blessed Samaritan, pitied the misery of others, and therefore became both a public preacher, and also a private instructor to the rest of his brethren within the university, by the space of three years, spending his time partly in the Latin tongue among the learned, and partly among the simple people in his natural and vulgar language. Howbeit, as Satan never sleepeth when he seeth his kingdom to begin to decay, so likewise now, seeing that this worthy member of Christ would be a shrewd shaker thereof, he raised up his impious imps to molest and trouble him.

Amongst these there was an Augustine friar, who took occasion, upon certain sermons that Mr. Latimer made about Christmas, 1529, as well in the church of St. Edward, as also in St. Augustine's, within the university of Cambridge, to inveigh against him, for that Mr. Latimer in his said sermons (alluding to the common usage of the season) gave the people certain cards out of the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew, whereupon they might, not only then, but always else, occupy their time. For the triumph in the ears he limited the heart, as the principal thing that they should serve God withal, whereby he quite overthrew all hypocritical and external ceremonies, not tending to the necessary furtherance of God's holy word and sacraments. For the better attaining hereof he wished the scriptures to be in English, whereby the common people might the better learn their duties, as well to God as their neighbours.

The handling of this matter was so apt for the time, and so pleasantly applied of him, that not only it declared a singular towardness of wit in the preacher, but also wrought in the hearers much fruit, to the overthrow of popish superstition, and setting up of the perfect religion.

This was upon the Sunday before Christmas-day; on which day coming to the church, and causing the bell to be tolled to a sermon, he entered into the pulpit, taking for his text the words of the gospel aforesaid, read in the church that day, Tu quis est? Who art thou? In delivering the which cards, he made the heart to be triumph, exhorting and inviting all men thereby to serve the Lord with inward heart and true affection, and not with outward ceremonies; adding moreover to the praise of that triumph, that though it were never so small, yet it would take up the best court card beside in the bunch, yea, though it were the king of elubs, &c. meaning thereby how the Lord would be worshipped and served in simplicity of heart and verity, wherein consisteth true Christian religion, and not in the outward deeds of the letter only, or in the glistening show of man's traditions, or pardons, pilgrimages, ceremonies, vows, devotions, voluntary works, and works of supererogation, foundations, oblations, the pope's supremacy, &c. so that all these either were needless, where the other is present, or else were of small estimation in comparison of the other.

As this sermon is curious in itself, and strongly marked the gross ignorance of those times in which popery, that grand darkener of the human mind, ruled, it is thought necessary to present it in its native form to the reader, begging him at the same time to remember, that necessity and the barbarity of the times could alone sanction such a mode of illustrating the word of God.

The tenor and effect of certain Sermons made by Mr. Latimer in Cambridge about the year of our Lord 1529.

“Tu quis est?” which words are as much as to say in English, Who art thou? These be the words of the Pharisees, which were sent by the Jews unto St. John Baptist in the wilderness, to have knowledge of him who he was; which words they spake unto him of an evil intent, thinking that he would have taken on him to be Christ, and so they would have had him done with their good wills, because they knew that he was more given to their laws than Christ indeed should be, as they perceived by their old prophecies; and also because they marvelled much of his great doctrine, preaching, and baptizing, they were in doubt whether he was Christ or not: wherefore they said unto him, Who art thou? Then answered St. John, and confessed that he was not Christ. Now here is to be noted the great and prudent answer of St. John Baptist unto the Pharisees, that when they required of him who he was, he would not directly answer of himself what he was himself, but he said he was not Christ; by the which saying he thought to put the Jews and Pharisees out of their false opinion and belief towards him, in that they would have had him to exercise the office of Christ, and so declared further unto them of Christ, saying, ‘He is in the midst of you, and amongst you, whom you know not, whose latchet of his shoe I am not worthy to unloose or undo.’ By this you may perceive that St. John spake much in the laud and praise of Christ his Master, professing himself to be in no wise like unto him. So likewise it shall be necessary unto all men and women of this world, not to ascribe unto themselves any goodness of themselves, but all unto our Lord God, as shall appear hereafter, when this question aforesaid, Who art thou? shall be moved unto them; not as the Pharisees did unto St. John, of an evil purpose, but of a good and simple mind.

“Now then, according to the preacher's mind, let every man and woman, of a good and simple mind, contrary to the Pharisees' intent, ask this question, Who art thou? This question must be moved to themselves, what they be of themselves, on this fashion: What art thou of thy only and natural generation between father and mother, when thou camest into the world? What substance, what virtue, what goodness, art thou of by thyself? Which questions if thou rehearse oftentimes unto thyself, thou shalt well perceive and understand how thou shalt make answer unto it; which must be made on this wise: I am of myself, and by myself, coming from my natural father and mother, the child of the ire and indignation of God, the true inheritor of hell, a lump of sin, and working nothing of myself, but all towards hell, except I have better help of another than I have of myself. Now we may see in what state we enter into this world, that we be of ourselves the true and just inheritors of hell, the children of the ire and indignation of Christ, working all towards hell, whereby we deserve of ourselves perpetual damnation, by the right judgment of God, and the true claim of ourselves: which unthrifty state that we be born unto is come unto us for our own deserts, as proveth well this example following.

“Let it be admitted for the probation of this, that it might please the king's grace now being, to accept unto his favour a mean man, of simple degree and birth, not born to any possession, whom the king's grace favoureth, not because this person hath of himself deserved any such favour, but that the king casteth his favour unto him of his own mere motion and fancy: and because the king's grace will more declare his favour unto him, he giveth unto this said man a thousand pounds in lands, to him and his heirs, on this condition, that he shall take upon him to be the chief captain and defender of his town of Calais, and to be true and faithful to him in the custody of the same, against the Frenchmen especially, above all other enemies.

“This man taketh on him this charge, promising his fidelity thereunto. It chanceth in process of time, that by the singular acquaintance and frequent familiarity of this captain with the Frenchmen, these Frenchmen give unto the said captain of Calais a great sum of money, so that he will be but content and agreeable that they may enter into the said town of Calais by force of arms, and so thereby possess the same unto the crown of France: upon this agreement the French do invade the said town of Calais, only by the negligence of this captain.

“Now the king's grace hearing of this invasion, cometh with a great puissance to defend this his said town, and so by good policy of war overcometh the said Frenchmen, and entereth again into his town of Calais. Then he being desirous to know how these enemies of his came thither, he maketh profound search and inquiry by whom this treason was conspired. By this search it was known and found his own captain to be the very author and the beginner of the betraying of it. The king, seeing the great infidelity of this person, dischargeth this man of his office, and taketh from him and his heirs this thousand pounds possessions. Think you not that the king doth use justice unto him, and all his posterity and heirs? Yes, truly: the said captain cannot deny himself but that he had true justice, considering how unfaithfully he behaved himself to his prince, contrary to his own fidelity and promise. So likewise it was of our first father, Adam: he had given unto him the spirit and science of knowledge, to work all goodness therewith; this said spirit was not given alone unto him, but unto all his heirs and posterity. He had also delivered him the town of Calais, that is to say, paradise in earth, the most strong and fair town in the world, to be in his enstody. He nevertheless, by the instigation of these Frenchmen, i. e. the temptations of the fiend, did obey unto their desire; and so he brake his promise and fidelity, the commandment of the everlasting King his Master, in eating of the fruit by him inhibited.

“Now then, the king seeing this great treason in his captain, deposed him of the thousand pounds of possessions, that is to say, from everlasting life in glory, and all his heirs and posterity: for likewise as he had the spirit of science and knowledge for him and his heirs, so in like manner when he lost the same, his heirs also lost it by him and in him. So now, this example proveth, that by our father Adam we had once in him the very inheritance of everlasting joy; and by him, and in him again, we lost the same.

“The heirs of the captain of Calais could not by any manner of claim ask of the king the right and title of their father, in the thousand pounds possessions, by reason the king might answer and say unto them, that although their father deserved not of himself to enjoy so great possessions, yet he deserved by himself to lose them, and greater, committing so high treason as he did against his prince's commandments; whereby he had no wrong to lose his title, but was unworthy to have the same, and had therein true justice; let not you think, which be his heirs, that if he had justice to lose his possessions, you have wrong to lose the same. In the same manner it may be answered unto all men and women now being, that if our father Adam had true justice to be excluded from his possession of everlasting glory in paradise, let us not think the contrary, that be his heirs, but that we have no wrong in losing also the same; yea, we have true justice and right. Then in what miserable estate we be, that of the right and just title of our own deserts have lost the everlasting joy, and claim of ourselves to be true inheritors of hell! For he that committeth deadly sin willingly, bindeth himself to be an inheritor of everlasting pain: and so did our forefather Adam willingly eat of the forbidden fruit.—Wherefore he was east out of the everlasting joy in paradise into this corrupt world, amongst all vile-ness, whereby of himself he was not worthy to do any thing laudable or pleasant to God, evermore bound to corrupt affections and beastly appetites, transformed into the uncleanest and most variable nature that was made under heaven; of whose seed and disposition all the world is lineally descended, insomuch, that this evil nature is so diffused and shed from one into another, that at this day there is no man nor woman living that can of themselves wash away this abominable vile-ness: and so we must needs grant of ourselves to be in like displeasure unto God, as our father Adam was; by reason hereof, as I said, we be of ourselves the very children of the indignation and vengeance of God, the true inheritors of hell, and working all towards hell: which is the answer to this question made to every man and woman by themselves, Who art thou?

“And now the world standing in this damnable state, cometh in the occasion of the incarnation of Christ. The Father in heaven perceiving the frail nature of man, that he by himself and of himself could do nothing for himself, by his prudent wisdom sent down the second Person in Trinity, his Son Jesus Christ, to declare unto man his pleasure and commandment: and so at the Father's will Christ took on him human nature, being willing to deliver man out of this miserable way, and was content to suffer cruel passion in shedding his blood for all mankind, and so left behind for our safeguard laws and ordinances, to keep us always in the right path unto everlasting life, as the evangelists, the sacraments, the commandments, and so forth; which if we do keep and observe according to our profession, we shall answer better unto this question, Who art thou? than we did before. For before thou didst enter into the sacrament of baptism, thou wert but a natural man, a natural woman, as I might say, a man, a woman; but after thou takest on thee Christ's religion, thou hast a longer name; for then thou art a Christian man, a Christian woman. Now then seeing thou art a Christian man, what shall be the answer of this question, Who art thou?

“The answer of this question is, when I ask it unto myself, I must say that I am a Christian man, a Christian woman, the child of everlasting joy, through the merits of the bitter passion of Christ. This is a joyful answer. Here we may see how much we be bound unto God, that hath revived us from death to life, and hath saved us that were damned: which great benefit we cannot well consider, unless we do remember what we were of ourselves before we meddled with him or his laws: and the more we know our feeble nature, and set less by it, the more we shall conceive and know in our hearts what God hath done for us: and the more we know what God hath done for us, the less we shall set by ourselves, and the more we shall love and please God; so that in no condition we shall either know ourselves or God, except we do utterly confess ourselves to be mere vile-ness and corruption. Well, now it is come unto this point, that we be Christian men, Christian women; I pray you what doth Christ require of a Christian man, or of a Christian woman? Christ requireth nothing else of a Christian man or woman, but that they will observe his rule. For likewise as he is a good Augustine friar that keepeth well St. Augustine's rule, so he is a good Christian man that keepeth well Christ's rule.

“Now then, what is Christ's rule? Christ's rule consisteth in many things, as in the commandments, and the works of merey, and so forth. And because I cannot declare Christ's rule unto you at one time, as it ought to be done, I will apply myself according to your custom at this time of Christmas; I will, as I said, declare unto you Christ's rule, but that shall be in Christ's cards. And where you are wont to celebrate Christmas in playing at cards, I intend by God's grace to deal unto you Christ's cards, wherein you shall perceive Christ's rule. The game that we will play at shall be called the Triumph; which if it be well played at, he that dealeth shall win; the players shall likewise win, and the standers and lookers upon shall do the same; insomuch, that there is no man that is willing to play at this triumph with these cards, but they shall be all winners and no losers.

“Let therefore every Christian man and woman play at these cards, that they may have and obtain the triumph; you must mark also that the triumph must apply to fetch home unto him all the other cards, whatsoever suit they be of. Now then take ye this first card, which must appear and be shewed unto you as followeth. You have heard what was spoken to men of the old law, ‘Thou shalt not kill;’ whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of judgment. But I say unto you of the new law, saith Christ, that whosoever is angry with his neighbour, shall be in danger of judgment, and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour, Raca, that is to say, brainless, or any other like word of rebuking, shall be in danger of a council; and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour, ‘Fool,’ shall be in danger of hell-fire. This card was made and spoken by Christ, as appeareth in the 5th chapter of St. Matthew.

“Now it must be noted, that whosoever shall play with this card, must first, before they play with it, know the strength and virtue of the same: wherefore you must well note and mark terms how they be spoken, and to what purpose. Let us therefore read it once or twice, that we may be the better acquainted with it.

“Now behold and see, this card is divided into four parts: the first part is one of the commandments that was given unto Moses in the old law, before the coming of Christ, which commandment we of the new law be bound to observe and keep, and it is one of our commandments. The other three parts spoken by Christ, be nothing else but expositions unto the first part of this commandment: for in very effect of all these four parts be but one commandment, that is to say, 'Thou shalt not kill.' Yet, nevertheless, the three last parts do shew unto thee how many ways thou mayest kill thy neighbour contrary to this commandment: yet for all Christ's exposition, in the three last parts of this card, the terms be not open enough to thee that dost read and hear them spoken. No doubt the Jews understood Christ well enough when he spake to them these three last sentences, for he spake unto them in their own natural terms and tongue: wherefore seeing that these terms were natural terms of the Jews, it shall be necessary to expound them, and compare them unto some like terms of our natural speech, that we in like manner may understand Christ as well as the Jews did. We will begin first with the first part of this card, and then after with the other three parts: You must therefore understand that the Jews, and the Pharisees of the old law, to whom this first part (this commandment, 'Thou shalt not kill') was spoken, thought it sufficient and enough for their discharge not to kill with any manner of material weapon, as sword, dagger, or with any such weapon, and they thought it no great fault whatsoever they said or did by their neighbour, so that they did not harm or meddle with their corporal bodies; which was a false opinion in them, as prove well the three last other sentences following the first part of this card.

"Now as touching the three other sentences, you must note and take heed what difference is between these three manner of offences: To be angry with your neighbour, To call your neighbour brainless, or any such word of disdain, Or to call your neighbour fool; whether these three manner of offences be of themselves more grievous one than the other, it is to be opened unto you. Truly, as they be of themselves divers offences, so they kill diversely one more than the other, as you shall perceive by the first of these three, and so forth: A man which conceiveth against his neighbour or brother, ire or wrath in his mind by some manner of occasion given unto him, although he be angry in his mind against his said neighbour, he will peradventure express his ire by no manner of sign, either in word or deed; yet nevertheless he offendeth against God, and breaketh this commandment, in killing his own soul, and is therefore in danger of judgment.

"Now to the second part of these three: That man that is moved with ire against his neighbour, and in his ire calleth his neighbour brainless, or some other like word of displeasure, as a man might say in a fury, 'I shall handle thee well enough,' which words and countenance do more represent and declare ire to be in this man than in him that was but angry, and spake no manner of word, nor shewed any countenance to declare his ire; wherefore as he that so declareth his ire either by word or countenance offendeth more against God, so he both killeth his own soul, and doth that in him is, to kill his neighbour's soul in moving him into ire, wherein he is faulty himself; and so this man is in danger of a council.

"Now to the third offence, and last of these three: That man that calleth his neighbour Fool, doth more declare his angry mind toward him than he that calleth his neighbour brainless, or any such words moving ire: but for to call a man fool, that word representeth more envy in a man than brainless doth. Wherefore he doth most offend, because he doth most earnestly with such words express his ire, and so he is in danger of hell-fire. Wherefore you may understand how these three parts of this card be three offences, and that one is more grievous to God than the other, and that one killeth more the soul of man than the other.

"Now peradventure there be some that will marvel that Christ did not declare this commandment by some greater faults of ire, than by these which seem but small faults, as to be angry, and speak nothing of it; to declare it, and to call a man brainless; and to call his neighbour fool; truly these be the smallest and the least faults that belong to ire, or to killing in ire. Therefore beware how you offend in any kind of ire: seeing that the smallest be damnable to offend in, see that you offend not in the greatest. For Christ thought, if he might bring you from the smallest manner of faults, and give you warning to avoid the least, he reckoned you would not offend in the greatest and worst, as to call your neighbour thief, whoreson, whore, drab, and so forth, into more blasphemous names, which offences must needs have punishment in hell, considering how that Christ hath appointed these three small faults to have three degrees of punishment, as appeareth by these three terms, judgment, council, hell-fire. These three terms do signify nothing else but three divers punishments in hell, according to the offences: judgment is less in degree than council, therefore it signifieth a lesser pain in hell, and it is ordained for him that is angry in his mind with his neighbour, and doth express his malice neither by word nor countenance: council is a less degree in hell than hell-fire, and is a greater degree in hell than judgment: and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour brainless, or any such word, that declareth his ire and malice: wherefore it is more pain than judgment. Hell-fire is more pain in hell than council or judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour fool, by reason that in calling his neighbour fool, he declareth more his malice, in that it is an earnest word of ire. Wherefore hell-fire is appointed for it, that is the most pain, of the three punishments.

"Now you have heard, that to these divers offences of ire and killing, be appointed punishments according to their degrees: for look, as the offence is, so shall the pain be; if the offence be great, the pain shall be according; if it be less, there shall be less pain for it. I would not now that you should think, because that here are but three degrees of punishment spoken of, that there be no more in hell: no doubt Christ spake of no more here but of these three degrees of punishment, thinking they were sufficient enough for example, whereby we might understand, that there be as divers and many pains as there be offences: and so by these three offences, and these three punishments, all other offences and punishments may be compared with each other: yet I would satisfy your minds further in these three terms, of judgment, council, and hell-fire. Where you might say, what was the cause that Christ declared more the pains of hell by these terms, than by any other terms? I told you afore that he knew well to whom he spake them; these terms were natural and known well amongst the Jews and the Pharisees; wherefore Christ taught them with their own terms, to the intent they might understand the better his doctrine: and these terms may be likened unto three terms which we have common and usual amongst us, that is to say, the sessions of inquirance, the sessions of deliverance, and the execution day. Sessions of inquirance is like unto judgment: for when sessions of inquiry is, then the judges cause twelve men to give verdict of the felon's crime, whereby he shall be judged to be indicted. Sessions of deliverance is much like council: for at sessions of deliverance, the judges go among themselves to counsel, to determine sentence against the felon. Execution day is to be compared unto hell-fire : for the Jews had amongst themselves a place of execution, named hell-fire ; and surely when a man goeth to his death, it is the greatest pain in this world. Wherefore you may see that there are degrees in these our terms, as there be in those terms.

"These evil-disposed affections and sensualities in us are always contrary to the rule of our salvation. What shall we do now or imagine to thrust down these Turks, and to subdue them ? It is a great ignominy and shame for a Christian man to be bond subject unto a Turk : nay, it shall not be so, we will first cast a trump in their way, and play with them at cards who shall have the better ; let us play therefore on this fashion with this card : Whensoever it shall happen these foul passions and Turks to rise in our stomachs against our brother or neighbour, either for unkind words, injuries, or wrongs, which they have done unto us, contrary unto our mind, straightways let us call unto our remembrance, and speak this question unto ourselves, Who art thou ? The answer is, I am a Christian man. Then further we must say to ourselves, What requireth Christ of a Christian man ? Now turn up your trump, your heart, (hearts is trump, as I said before,) and east your trump, your heart, on this card, and upon this card you shall learn what Christ requireth of a Christian man, not to be angry, be moved to ire against his neighbour, in mind, countenance, nor other ways, by word or deed. Then take up this card with your heart, and lay them together ; that done, you have won the game of the Turk, whereby you have defaced and overcome by true and lawful play : but alas for pity ! the Rhodes are now won and overcome by these false Turks, the strong castle Faith is decayed, so that I fear it is almost impossible to win it again.

"The great occasion of the loss of this island of Rhodes, is by reason that Christian men do so daily kill their own nation, that the very true number of Christianity is decayed : which murder and killing one another, is increased specially two ways, to the utter undoing of Christendom, that is to say, by example and silence. By example, as thus : when the father, the mother, the lord, the lady, the master, the dame, be themselves overcome with these Turks, they be continual swearers, adulterers,, disposers to malice, never in patience, and so forth in all other vices ; think you not when the father, the mother, the master, the dame, be disposed unto vice or impatience, but that their children and servants shall incline and be disposed to the same ? No doubt, as the child shall take disposition natural of his father and mother, so shall his servants apply unto the vices of their masters and dames ; if the heads be false in their faculties and crafts, it is no marvel if the children, servants, and apprentices, do joy therein. This is a great and shameful manner of killing Christian men, that the fathers, the mothers, the masters, and the dames, shall not only kill themselves, but all their's, and all that belongeth unto them, and so this way is a great number of Christian lineage murdered and spoiled. The second manner of killing, is silence. By silence also is a great number of Christian men slain ; which is on this fashion : although that the father and mother, master and dame, of themselves be well disposed to live according to the law of God, yet they may kill their children and servants in suffering them to do evil before their own faces, and do not use due correction according unto their offences ; the master seeth his servant or apprentice take more of his neighbour than the king's laws, or the order of his faculty, doth admit him, or he suffereth him to take more of his neighbour than he himself would be content to pay if he were in like condition : thus doing I say, such men kill willingly their children and servants, and shall go to hell for so doing ; but also their fathers and mothers, masters and dames, shall bear them company for so suffering. Wherefore I exhort all true Christian men and women to give good example unto your children and servants, and suffer not them by silence to offend : every man must be in his own house, according to St. Augustine's mind, a bishop, not only giving good ensample, but teach according to it, rebuke and punish vice, not suffering your children and servants to forget the laws of God : you ought to see them have their belief, to know the commandments of God, to keep their holidays, not to lose their time in idleness ; if they do so, you shall all suffer pain for it, if God be true of his saying, as there is no doubt thereof : and so you may perceive that there be many one that break this card, 'Thou shalt not kill,' and playeth therewith oftentimes at the blind trump, whereby they be no winners, but great losers ; but who be those now-a-days that can clear themselves of these manifest murders used to their children and servants ? I think not the contrary, but many have these two ways slain their own children unto their damnation, were not the great mercy of God ready to help them when they repent thereof.

"Wherefore considering that we be so prone and ready to continue in sin, let us cast down ourselves with Mary Magdalen, and the more we bow down with her toward Christ's feet, the more we shall be afraid to rise again in sin ; and the more we know and submit ourselves, the more we shall be forgiven ; and the less we know and submit ourselves, the less we shall be forgiven, as appeareth by this example following.

"Christ when he was in the world amongst the Jews, there was a great Pharisee whose name was Simon ; this Pharisee desired Christ on a time to dine with him, thinking in himself that he was able and worthy to give Christ a dinner : Christ refused not his dinner, but came unto him. In time of their dinner it chanced there came into the house a great and common sinner, named Mary Magdalen. As soon as she perceived Christ, she cast herself down, and called unto her remembrance what she was of herself, and how greatly she had offended God, whereby she conceived in Christ great love, and so came near unto him, and washed his feet with bitter tears, and shed on his head precious ointment, thinking that by him she should be delivered from her sins ; this great and proud Pharisee seeing Christ did accept her oblation in the best part, had great indignation against this woman, and said to himself, If this man, Christ, were an holy prophet, as he is taken for, he would not suffer this sinner to come so nigh him. Christ understanding the naughty mind of this Pharisee, said to him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee : Say what you please, quoth the Pharisee. Then said Christ, I pray thee tell me this : if there be a man to whom is owing twenty pounds by one, and forty by another, this man to whom this money is owing perceiveth these two men be not able to pay him, he forgiveth them both : which of these two debtors ought to love this man most ? The Pharisee said, That man ought to love him best that had most forgiven him. Likewise, said Christ, it is by this woman. She hath loved me most, therefore most is forgiven her : she hath known her sins most, whereby she hath most loved me ; and thou hast least loved me, because thou hast least known thy sins, therefore because thou hast least known thy offences, thou art least forgiven. So this proud Pharisee had an answer to allay his pride : and think you not, but that there be amongst us a great number of these proud Pharisees, which think themselves worthy to bid Christ to dinner, which will perk and presume to sit by Christ in the church, and have disdain of this poor woman Magdalen, their poor neighbour, with an high disdainous and solemn countenance, and being always desirous to climb highest in the church, reckoning themselves more worthy to sit there than another. I fear my poor Magdalen under the board, and in the belfrey, hath more forgiven of Christ than they have: for it is like that these Pharisees do less know themselves and their offensees, whereby they less love God, and so they be less forgiven.

"I would to God we would follow this example, and be like unto Magdalen. I doubt not but we be all Magdalens in falling into sin and in offending: but we be not again Magdalens in knowing ourselves, and in rising from sin. If we be the true Magdalens, we should be as willing to forsake our sin, and rise from our sin, as we were willing to commit sin, and to continue in it; and we then should know ourselves best, and make more perfect answer than ever we did unto this question, Who art thou? To the which we might answer, that we be true Christian men and women; and then I say you should understand and know how you ought to play at this card, 'Thou shalt not kill,' without any interruption of your deadly enemies the Turks, and so triumph at the last, by winning everlasting life in glory. Amen."

It would require a long discourse to declare what a stir there was in Cambridge upon this preaching of Mr Latimer. Belike Satan began to feel himself and his kingdom to be touched too near, and therefore thought it time to look about him, and to make out his men of arms.

First came out the prior of the black friars, called Buckneham, (otherwise surnamed Domine Labia,) who thinking to make a great hand against Mr. Latimer, about the same time of Christmas when Mr. Latimer brought forth his cards, to deface belike the doings of the other, brought out his Christmas dice, casting there to his audience *cinq*ue and quater, meaning by the *cinq*ue five places in the new Testament, and the four doctors by the quater: by which his *cinq*ue quater, he would prove that it was not expedient the scripture to be in English, lest the ignorant and vulgar sort, through the occasion thereof, might happily be brought in danger to leave their vocation, or else to run into some inconvenience. As for example: The ploughman, when he heareth this in the gospel, "No man that layeth his hand on the plough, and looketh back, is meet for the kingdom of God," might peradventure, hearing this, cease from his plough. Likewise the baker, when he heareth that a little leaven corrupteth a whole lump of dough, may perceive leave our bread unleavened, and so our bodies shall be unseasoned. Also, the simple man, when he heareth in the gospel, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee," may make himself blind, and so fill the world full of beggars. These, with other more this clerkly friar brought out, to the number of five, to prove his purpose.

Mr. Latimer, hearing this friarly sermon of Dr. Buckneham, cometh again in the afternoon, or shortly after, to the church, to answer the friar, where resorted to him a great multitude, as well of the university as of the town, both doctors and other graduates, with great expectation to hear what he could say, among whom also (directly in the face of Latimer underneath the pulpit) sat Buckneham, the aforesaid friar, prior of the black friars, with his black friar's cowl about his shoulders.

Then Mr. Latimer first repeating the friarly reasons of Dr. Buckneham, whereby he would prove it a dangerous thing for the vulgar people to have the scripture in the vulgar tongue, so refuted the friar, so answered to his objections, so dallied with his bald reason of the ploughman looking back, and of the baker leaving his bread unleavened, that the vanity of the friar might to all men appear, well proving and declaring to the people, how there was no such fear nor danger for the scriptures to be in English, as the friar pretended; at least requiring this, that the scripture might be so long in the English tongue, till Englishmen were so mad, that either the ploughman durst not look back, or the baker should leave his bread unleavened. And proceeding, moreover, in his sermon, he began to discourse of the mystical speeches and figurative phrases of the scripture, which phrases he said were not so diffuse and difficult as they were common in the scripture, and in the Hebrew tongue are commonly used and known; and not only in the Hebrew tongue, but also every speech, saith he, hath its like metaphors and figurative significations, so common and vulgar to all men, that the very painters do paint them on walls and on houses.

As for example, (saith he, looking toward the friar that sat over against him,) when they paint a fox preaching out of a friar's cowl, none is so mad to take this to be a fox that preacheth, but know well enough the meaning of the matter, which is, to paint out unto us what hypocrisy, crafts, and subtle dissimulation, lieth hid many times in these friars' cowls, willing us thereby to beware of them.

In fine, friar Buckneham with this sermon was so dashed, that never after he durst peep out of the pulpit against Mr. Latimer.

Then came at last Dr. West, bishop of Ely, who preaching against Mr. Latimer at Barwell abbey, forbade him within the churches of that university to preach any more. Notwithstanding, so the Lord provided, that Dr. Barnes, prior of the Augustine friars, did license Mr. Latimer to preach in his church of the Augustines, and he himself preached at the church by, called St. Edward's church, which was the first sermon of the gospel which Dr. Barnes preached, being upon Christmas, even upon a Sunday. Whereupon certain articles were gathered out of his sermon, and were commenced against him by Mr. Tirel, fellow of the King's Hall, and so by the vice-chancellor presented to the cardinal, as in his story before hath been declared.

This Mr. Latimer, as you have heard, being baited by the friars, doctors, and masters of that university, about the year 1529, notwithstanding the malice of these malignant adversaries, continued yet in Cambridge preaching the space of three years together, with favour and applause of the godly, also with such admiration of his enemies that heard him, that the bishop himself coming in, and hearing his gift, wished himself to have the like, and was compelled to commend him upon the same.

So Mr. Latimer, with Mr. Bilney, after this continued yet in Cambridge a certain space, where he with Mr. Bilney used much to confer together, insomuch that the place where they most used to walk in the fields was called long after the Heretics' Hill.

The society of these two, as it was much noted of many in that university, so it was full of many good examples to all such as would follow their doings, both in visiting the prisoners, in relieving the needy, in feeding the hungry, whereof somewhat is before mentioned in the history of Mr. Bilney, in a place of his sermons. Mr. Latimer maketh mention of a certain history which happened about this time in Cambridge between them two, and a certain woman then prisoner in the castle or tower of Cambridge, which I thought here not unworthy to be remembered. The story is this: It so chanced, that after Mr. Latimer had been so acquainted with the aforesaid Mr. Bilney, he went with him to visit the prisoners in the tower of Cambridge, and being there, among other prisoners there was a woman which was accused that she had killed her own child, which act she plainly and steadfastly denied: whereby it gave them occasion to search for the matter, and at length they found that her husband loved her not, and therefore sought all means he could to make her away. The matter was thus:

A child of her's had been sick a whole year, and at length died in harvest time, as it were in a consumption: which when it was gone, she went to have her neighbours to help her to the burial; but all were in harvest abroad; whereby she was enforced with heaviness of heart alone to prepare the child to the burial. Her husband coming home, and not loving her, accused her of murdering the child. This was the cause of her trouble; and Mr. Latimer, by earnest inquisition, of conscience thought the woman not guilty. Then immediately after was he called to preach before king Henry the Eighth at Windsor, where, after his sermon, the king's majesty sent for him, and talked with him familiarly; at which time Mr. Latimer, finding opportunity, kneeled down, opened this whole matter to the king, and begged her pardon; which the king most graciously granted, and gave it him at his return homeward. In the mean time the woman was delivered of a child in the prison, whose godfather was Mr. Latimer, Mrs. Cheek, godmother. But all the while he would not tell her of the pardon, but laboured to have her confess the truth of the matter. At length the time came when she should look to suffer, and Mr. Latimer came as he was wont to instruct her; unto whom she made great lamentation and moan to be purified before her suffering, for she thought to be damned if she suffered without purification.

Then Mr. Bilney being with Mr. Latimer, both told her that that law was made to the Jews, and not to us, and that women be as well in the favour of God before they be purified as after; and rather it was appointed for a civil and politic law, for natural honesty sake, than that they should any thing the more be purified from sin thereby, &c.

So thus they travelled with this woman, till they had brought her to a good state, and then at length shewed her the king's pardon, and let her go.

But as it is commonly seen in the natural course of things, that as the fire beginneth more to kindle, so the more smoke ariseth withal: in much like sort it happened with Mr. Latimer, whose towardness the more it began to spring, his virtues to be seen, and his doings to be known, the more his adversaries began to spurn and kick against him.

After Mr. Latimer had thus travelled in preaching and teaching in the university of Cambridge about the space of three years, at length he was called up to the cardinal, for heresy, by the procurement of certain of the said university, where he was content to subscribe and agree to such articles as then they propounded unto him.

After that, he returned to the university again, where shortly after by the means of Dr. Buts, the king's physician, a singular good man, and a special favourer of good proceedings, he was in the number of them which laboured in the cause of the king's supremacy. Then went he to the court, where he remained a certain time in the said Dr. Buts' chamber, preaching then in London very often. At last being weary of the court, having a benefice offered by the king at the suit of lord Cromwell and Dr. Buts, was glad thereof, seeking by that means to rid out of the court, where-with in no case he could agree; and so having a grant of the benefice, contrary to the mind of Dr. Buts, he would needs depart and be resident at the same.

This benefice was in Wiltshire, under the diocese of Sarum, the name of which town was called West-Kingston, where this good preacher did exercise himself with much diligence of teaching to instruct his flock, and not only to them his diligence extended, but also to all the country about. In fine, his diligence was so great, his preaching so mighty, the manner of his teaching so zealous, that there in like sort he could not escape without enemies; so true it is that St. Paul foretelleth us, "Whosoever will live godly in Christ shall suffer persecution." It so chanced, that whereas he preaching upon the blessed Virgin, Christ's mother, (whom he called our Lady,) had thereupon declared his mind, referring and reducing all honour only to Christ our only Saviour; certain Popish priests, being therewith offended, wrought much trouble against him, drawing out articles and impositions which they untruly, unjustly, falsely, and uncharitably, imputed unto him: First, that he should preach against our Lady, for that he reproved in a sermon the superstitious rudeness of certain blind priests, who maintained that the blessed Virgin never had any sin, nor was saved by Christ the only Saviour of the whole world.

Item, That he should say, that saints were not to be worshipped.

Item, That Ave Maria was a salutation only, and no prayer.

Item, That there was no material fire in hell.

Item, That there was no purgatory, in saying, that he had rather be in purgatory than in Lollards' Tower.

The chief impugnors and molesters of him, besides these country priests, were Dr. Powel, of Salisbury, Dr. Wilson, some time of Cambridge, Mr. Hubberdin, and Dr. Sherwood. Of whom some preached against him, some also did write against him; insomuch that by their procurement he was cited up and called to appear before W. Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, and John Stokesley, bishop of London, anno 1531, January 29.

Against this citation, although Mr. Latimer did appeal to his own ordinary, requiring by him to be ordered, yet notwithstanding he was had up to London, before Warham, the archbishop of Canterbury, and bishop of London, where he was greatly molested, and detained a long space from his cure at home. There he being called thrice every week before the said bishops, to make answer for his preaching, had certain articles or propositions drawn out and laid to him, whereunto they required him to subscribe. At length, he not only perceiving their practical proceedings, but also much grieved with their troublesome unquietness, which neither would preach themselves nor yet suffer him to preach and do his duty, wrote to the aforesaid archbishop, partly excusing his infirmity, whereby he could not appear at their commandment, partly expostulating with them for so troubling and detaining him from his duty doing, and that for no just cause, but only for preaching the truth against certain abuses crept into religion, very needful to be reprov'd.

In this aforesaid epistle he made mention of certain articles or propositions, whereunto he was required by the bishops to subscribe. Of those articles the following is a copy.

Articles devised by the Bishops for Mr. Latimer to subscribe.

I believe that there is a purgatory to purge the souls of the dead after this life.

That the souls in purgatory are holpen with the masses, prayers, and alms, of the living.

That the saints do pray as mediators now for us in heaven.

That they are to be honoured of us in heaven.

That it is profitable for Christians to call upon the saints, that they may pray as mediators for us unto God.

That pilgrimages and oblations done to the sepulchres and relies of saints are meritorious.

That they which have vowed perpetual chastity, may not marry nor break their vow, without a dispensation of the pope.

That the keys of binding and loosing delivered to Peter, do still remain with the bishop of Rome, his successors, although they live wickedly; and are by no means or at any time committed to laymen.

That men may merit and deserve at God's hand, by fasting, prayer, and other good works of piety.

That they which are forbidden of the bishop to preach, as suspect persons, ought to cease until they have purged themselves before the said bishop, or their superiors, and be restored again.

That the fast which is used in Lent, and other fasts prescribed by the canons, and by custom received of the Christians, (except necessity otherwise require) are to be observed and kept.

That God, in every one of the seven sacraments giveth grace to a man rightly receiving the same.

That consecrations, sanctifyings, and blessings, by use and custom received in the church, are laudable and profitable.

That it is laudable and profitable that the venerable images of the crucifix and other saints, should be had in the churches as a remembrance, and to the honour and worship of Jesus Christ and his saints.

That it is laudable and profitable to deck and to clothe those images, and to set up burning lights before them to the honour of the saints.

To these articles, whether he did subscribe or no, it is uncertain. But if he so did, no great marvel, the iniquity of the time being such, that either he must needs so do, or else abide the bishop's blessing, that is, cruel sentence of death; which he at that time (as himself confessed preaching at Stamford) was loth to sustain for such matters as these were, unless it were for articles necessary of his belief; by which his words I conjecture rather that he did subscribe at length, although it was long before he could be brought so to do. Yet this by the way is to be noted, concerning the crafty and deceitful handling of these bishops in his examinations, what subtle devices they used the same time to entrap him in their snares. The truth of the story he sheweth forth himself in a certain sermon preached at Stamford, anno 1550, Oct. 9th. His words be these: I was once, saith he, in examination before five or six bishops, where I had much turmoiling; every week thrice I came to examinations, and many snares and traps were laid to get something. Now God knoweth I was ignorant of the law, but that God gave me answer and wisdom what I should speak; it was God indeed, for else I had never escaped them. At last I was brought forth to be examined into a chamber hanged with arras, where I was wont to be examined: but now at this time the chamber was somewhat altered. For whereas before there was wont ever to be a fire in the chimney, now the fire was taken away, and an arras hanged over the chimney, and the table stood near the chimney's end.

There was amongst the bishops that examined me, one with whom I had been very familiar, and took him for my great friend, an aged man, and sat next the table's end.

Then amongst all other questions, he put forth one, a very subtle and crafty one, and such an one indeed as I could not think so great danger in. And when I should make answer, I pray you, Mr. Latimer, said one, speak out, I am very thick of hearing, and here be many that sit far off. I mar-velled at this, that I was bidden speak out, and began to misdeem, and gave an ear to the chimney; and, sir, there I heard a pen going in the chimney behind the cloth! They had appointed one there to write all mine answers: for they made sure that I should not start from them; there was no starting from them. God was my good Lord, and gave me answer; I could never else have escaped it. The question to him there and then objected was this, Whether he thought in his conscience that he had been suspected of heresy? This was a captious question; there was no holding of peace would serve: for that was to grant himself faulty. To answer it, was every way full of danger. But God, which always giveth in need what to answer, helped him, or else (as he confessed himself) he had never escaped their bloody hands. Albeit, what was his answer, he doth not there express. And thus hitherto you have heard declared the manifold troubles of this godly preacher, in the time not only of his being in the university, but especially at his benefice.

In these so hard and dangerous straits, and such snares of the bishops, hard it had been for him, and impossible to have escaped and continued so long, had not the almighty helping hand of the Highest, as he stirred him up, so preserved him through the favour and power of his prince, who with much favour embraced him, and with his mere power sometimes rescued and delivered him out of the crooked claws of his enemies. Moreover, at length, also through the procurement partly of Dr. Buts, partly of good Cromwell, he advanced him to the dignity and degree of a bishop, making him the bishop of Worcester; which so continued a few years, instructing his diocese according to the duty of a diligent and vigilant pastor, with wholesome doctrine, and example of perfect conversation duly agreeing to the same. It were a long matter to stand particularly upon such things as might here be brought to the commendation of his pains; as, study, readiness, and continual carefulness, in teaching, preaching, exhorting, visiting, correcting, and reforming, either as his ability could serve or else the time would bear. But the days then were so dangerous and variable, that he could not in all things do what he would; yet what he might do, that he performed to the uttermost of his strength, so that although he could not utterly extinguish all the sparkling relics of old superstition, yet he so wrought, that though they could not be taken away, yet they should be used with as little hurt, and with as much profit, as might be. As for example, when it could not be avoided but holy water and holy bread must needs be received, yet so he prepared and instructed them of his diocese, that in receiving thereof superstition should be excluded, teaching and charging the ministers of his diocese, in delivering the holy water and the holy bread, to say these words following:

Words spoken to the People in giving them Holy Water.

Remember your promise in baptizing,
Christ his merey and blood-shedding,
By whose most holy sprinkling
Of all your sins you have free pardoning.

What to say in giving Holy Bread.

Of Christ's body this is a token,
Which on the cross for our sins was broken;
Wherefore of your sins you must be forsakers,
If of Christ's death ye will be partakers.

By this it may be considered what the diligent care of this bishop was in doing the duty of a faithful pastor among his flock. And, moreover, it is to be thought that he would have brought more things else to pass, if the time then had answered to his desire; for he was not ignorant how the institution of holy water and holy bread, not only had no ground in scripture, but also how full of profane exorcisms and conjurations they were, contrary to the rule and learning of the gospel. Thus this good man behaved himself in his diocese.—But, as before, both in the university and at his benefice he was tossed and turmoiled by wicked and evil-disposed persons; so in his bishopric also he was not all clear and void of some that sought his trouble. As among many other evil-willers, one especially there was, and that no small person, which accused him then to the king for his sermons. The story, because he himself sheweth in a sermon of his before king Edward, I thought therefore to use his own words, which be these:

In the king's days that is dead, a great many of us were called together before him, to say our minds in certain matters. In the end, one kneeleth down, and accuseth me of sedition; and that I had preached seditious doctrine. A heavy salutation, and a hard point of such a man's doing, as, if I should name, ye would not think. The king turned to me, and said, What say you to that, sir?

Then I kneeled down, and turned me first to my acuser, and required him, Sir, what form of preaching would you appoint me, in preaching before a king? would you have me preach nothing as concerning a king in the king's sermon? have you any commission to appoint me what I shall preach? Besides this, I asked him divers other questions; and he would make no answer to any of them all, he had nothing to say.

Then I turned me to the king, and submitted myself to his grace, and said, I never thought myself worthy, nor did I ever sue to be a preacher before your grace, but I was called to it, and would be willing, if you mislike me, to give place to my betters; for I grant there be a great many more worthy of the room than I am. And if it be your grace's pleasure so to allow them for preachers, I could be content to bear their books after them. But if your grace allow me for a preacher, I would desire your grace to give me leave to discharge my conscience; give me leave to frame my doctrine according to my audience. I had been a very dolt to have preached so at the borders of your realm, as I preach before your grace.

And I thank Almighty God (which hath always been my remedy) that my sayings were well accepted of the king; for, like a gracious lord, he turned into another communication. It is even as the scripture saith, The Lord directed the king's heart. Certain of my friends came to me with tears in their eyes, and told me they looked I should have been in the Tower the same night.

It would be tedious to relate all the doings, travels, and writings, of this Christian bishop, neither yet have we expressed all that came to our hands; but this I thought sufficient for this present. Thus he continued in his laborious function of a bishop the space of certain years, till the coming in of the Six Articles. Then being distressed through the straitness of the time, so that either he must lose the quiet of a good conscience or else forsake his bishopric, he did of his own free accord resign his pastorship. At which time Shaxton, the bishop of Salisbury, resigned likewise with him his bishopric. And so these two remained a great space unbishoped, keeping silence till the time of king Edward, of blessed memory. At what time he first put off his rochet in his chamber among his friends, suddenly he gave a skip on the floor for joy, feeling his shoulder so light, and being discharged (as he said) of such a heavy burden. Howbeit, neither was he so lightened, but that troubles and labours followed him wheresoever he went; for a little while after he had renounced his bishopric, first he was almost slain and sore bruised with the fall of a tree. Then coming up to London for remedy, he was molested and troubled of the bishops, whereby he was again in no little danger, and at length was cast into the Tower, where he continually remained prisoner till the time that blessed king Edward entered his crown, by means whereof the golden mouth of this preacher, long shut up before, was now opened again; and so he beginning afresh to set forth his plough again, continued all the time of the said king labouring in the Lord's harvest most faithfully, discharging his talent as well in divers other places of this realm, as in Stamford, and before the duchess of Suffolk, as also at London in the convocation-house, and especially before the king at the court; in the same place of the inward garden, which was before applied to lascivious and courtly pastimes, there he dispensed the fruitful word of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ, preaching there before the king and his whole court, to the edification of many.

In this his painful travel he occupied himself all king Edward's days, preaching for the most part every Sunday twice, to the no small shame of all other loitering and unpreaching prelates, which occupy great rooms, and do little good; and that so much more to their shame, because he, being a sore bruised man by the fall of a tree, (mentioned a little before,) and above 67 years of age, took so little ease, nor spared himself, to do the people good.

Now to speak here of his indefatigable travel and diligence in his own private studies, who, notwithstanding both his years and other pains in preaching, every morning orderly, winter and summer, about two of the clock in the morning, was at his book most diligently. How careful his heart was of the preservation of the church and the good success of the gospel, his letters can testify, wherewith he admonished such as then were in authority of their duty, and assisted them with his godly counsel.

As the diligence of this man of God never ceased all the time of king Edward to profit the church both publicly and privately, so it is worthy to be observed, that God not only gave unto him his Spirit plentifully and comfortably to preach his word unto his church, but also by the same Spirit he did so evidently foreshew and prophesy of all those kinds of plagues afore which afterwards ensued, that if England ever had a prophet he might seem to be one. And as touching himself, he ever affirmed that the preaching of the gospel would cost him his life; to the which he no less cheerfully prepared himself, than certainly was persuaded that Winchester was kept in the Tower for the same purpose, as the event did too truly prove. For after the death of the said blessed king Edward, not long after queen Mary was proclaimed, a pursuivant was sent down (by means no doubt of Winchester) into the country to call him up, of whose coming although Mr. Latimer lacked no forewarning, being premonished about six hours before by one John Careless, yet so far was he from attempting to escape, that he prepared himself towards his journey before the said pursuivant came to his house.

At which thing when the pursuivant marvelled, seeing him so prepared towards his journey, he said unto him, "My friend, you be a welcome messenger to me: and be it known unto you, and to all the world, that I go as willingly to London at this present, being called by my prince to render a reckoning of my doctrine, as ever I was at any place in the world. I doubt not but that God, as he hath made me worthy to preach his word before two excellent princes, so will he enable me to witness the same unto the third, either to her comfort or discomfirt eternally," &c. At the which time the pursuivant, when he had delivered his letters, departed, affirming that he had commandment not to tarry for him. By whose sudden departure it was manifest that they would not have him appear, but rather to have fled out of the realm. They knew that his constancy should deface them in their Popery, and confirm the godly in the truth.

Thus Mr. Latimer being sent for, and coming up to London, through Smithfield, (where merrily he said, that Smithfield had long groaned for him,) was brought before the council, where he patiently bearing all the moeks and taunts given him by the scornful Papists, was cast again into the Tower, where he, being assisted with the heavenly grace of Christ, sustained most patiently imprisonment a long time, notwithstanding the cruel and unmerciful handling of the lordly Papists, who thought then their kingdom would never fall; yet he shewed himself not only patient but also cheerful, in and above all that which they could or would work against him; yea, such a valiant spirit the Lord gave him, that he was able not only to despise the terribleness of prisons and torments, but also to deride and laugh to scorn the doings of his enemies; as it is not unknown to the ears of many, what he answered to the lieutenant being then in the Tower. For when the lieutenant's man upon a time came to him, the aged father, kept without fire in the frosty winter, and well nigh starved for cold, merrily bade the man tell his master, That if he did not look the better to him, perchance he would deceive him.

The lieutenant hearing this, bethought himself of these words, and fearing lest that indeed he thought to make some escape, began to look more straitly to his prisoner; and so coming to him, beginneth to charge him with his words, reciting the same unto him which his man had told him before, how that if he were not better looked unto, perchance he would deceive him, &c. Yea, Mr. Lieutenant, so I said, quoth he; for you look I think that I should burn: but except you let me have some fire, I am like to deceive your expectation, for I am like here to starve for cold.

Many such like answers and reasons, merry, but savoury, coming not from a vain mind, but from a constant and quiet reason, proceeded from that man; declaring a firm and stable heart, little passing for all this great blustering of their terrible threats, but rather deriding the same.

Although Mr. Latimer, by reason of the feebleness of his age, wrote little in this latter time of his imprisonment, yet in prayer he was fervently occupied, wherein oftentimes so long he continued kneeling, that he was not able to rise without help. And amongst other things, these were three principal matters he prayed for:

First, That as God had appointed him to be a preacher of his word, so also he would give him grace to stand to his doctrine until his death, that he might give his heart's blood for the same.

Secondly, That God of his mercy would restore his gospel to England once again: and the words "once again—once again," he did so repeat in the ears of the Lord God, as though he had seen God before him, and spoken to him face to face.

The third matter was, to pray for the preservation of the queen's majesty, whom in his prayer he was wont to name, and even with tears desired God to make her a comfort to this comfortless realm of England. These were the matters he prayed for so earnestly. Neither were these things of him desired in vain, as the good success thereof after following did declare; for the Lord most graciously did grant all those his requests.

First, concerning his constancy, even in the most extremity the Lord graciously assisted him: for when he stood at the stake without Bocardo-gate at Oxford, and the tormentors about to set fire to him, and to the learned and godly bishop Mr. Ridley, he lifted up his eyes towards heaven with an amiable and comfortable countenance, saying these words, God is faithful, which doth not suffer us to be tempted above our strength; and so afterwards by and by shed his blood in the cause of Christ, which blood ran out of his heart in such abundance, that all those that were present being godly did marvel to see the most part of the blood in his body to be gathered to his heart, and with such violence to gush out, his body being opened by the force of the fire; by the which thing God most graciously granted his request, which was, That he might shed his heart's blood in the defence of the gospel.

How mercifully the Lord heard his second request, in restoring his gospel once again unto this realm, the succeeding days can bear record. And what then shall England say now for her defence, which being so mercifully visited and refreshed with the word of God, so slenderly and unthankfully considereth either her own misery past, or the great benefit of God now present? The Lord be merciful unto us, Amen.

Again, concerning his third request, it seemeth likewise most effectually granted, to the great praise of God, the furtherance of his gospel, and to the unspeakable comfort of this realm. For whether at the request of his prayer, or other of God's holy saints, or whether God was moved with the cry of his whole church, the truth is, that when all was in a desperate case, and so desperate that the enemies mightily flourished and triumphed, God's word was banished, Spaniards received, no place left for Christ's servants to cover their heads, suddenly the Lord called to remembrance his mercy, and, forgetting our former iniquity, made an end of all these miseries, and wrought a marvellous change of things; at the change whereof the said queen Elizabeth was appointed and anointed, for whom this gray-headed father so earnestly prayed in his imprisonment; through whose true, natural, and imperial crown, the brightness of God's word was set up again to confound the dark and false-vizored kingdom of Antichrist, the true temple of God re-edified, and the captivity of sorrowful Christians released, which so long was wished for in the prayers of so many good men, especially of this faithful and true servant of the Lord, Mr. Latimer.

On the 30th of September, 1555, these two eminent prelates, Ridley and Latimer, were cited to appear before the divinity school, at Oxford; and they both appeared on the day appointed.

Dr. Ridley was first examined, and severely reprimanded by the bishop of Lincoln, because when he heard the Cardinal's grace and the pope's holiness mentioned in the commission, he kept on his cap. The words of the bishop were to this effect: "Mr. Ridley, if you will not be uncovered, in respect to the pope, and the cardinal his legate, by whose authority we sit in commission, your cap shall be taken off."

The bishop of Lincoln then made a formal harangue, in which he entreated Ridley to return to the holy mother church, insisting on the antiquity and authority of the see of Rome, and of the pope, as the immediate successor of St. Peter.

Dr. Ridley in return strenuously opposed the arguments of the bishop, and boldly vindicated the doctrines of the Reformation.

After much debate, the five following articles were proposed to him, and his immediate and explicit answers required.

First, That he had frequently affirmed, and openly maintained and defended, that the true natural body of Christ, after consecration of the priest, is not really present in the sacrament of the altar.

2. That he had often publicly affirmed and defended, that in the sacrament of the altar remaineth still the substance of bread and wine.

3. That he had often openly affirmed, and obstinately maintained, that in the mass there is no propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

4. That the aforesaid assertions have been solemnly condemned by the scholastical censure of this school, as heretical, and contrary to the Catholic faith, by the prolocutor of the convocation house, and sundry learned men of both universities.

5. That all and singular the premises are true and notoriously known, by all near at hand, and in distant places.

To the first of these articles Mr. Ridley replied, that he believed Christ's body to be in the sacrament, really, by his grace and spirit effectually, but not so as to include a lively and moveable body under the forms of bread and wine.

To the second he answered in the affirmative.

Part of the fourth he acknowledged, and part he denied.

To the fifth he answered, that the premises were so far true, as his replies had set forth. Whether men spake evil of them he knew not, because he came not so much abroad to hear what every man reported.

He was then ordered to appear the following day in St. Mary's church in Oxford, to give his final answer; after which he was committed to the custody of the mayor.

When Latimer was brought into court, the bishop of Lincoln warmly exhorted him to return to the unity of the church, from which he had revolted.

The same articles which were proposed to Dr. Ridley were read to Mr. Latimer, and he was required to give a full and satisfactory answer to each of them.

His replies not being satisfactory to the court, he was dismissed; but ordered to appear in St. Mary's church, at the same time with Dr. Ridley.

On the day appointed, the commissioners met, when Dr. Ridley being first brought before them, the bishop of Lincoln stood up, and began to repeat the proceedings of the former meeting, assuring him that he had full liberty to make what alteration he pleased in his answers to the articles proposed to him, and to deliver the same to the court in writing.

After some debate, Dr. Ridley took out a paper, and began to read; but the bishop interrupted him, and ordered the beadle to take the writing from him. The doctor desired permission to read on, declaring the contents were only his answers to the articles proposed. But the bishop and others having privately reviewed it, would not permit it to be read in open court.

When the articles were again administered, he referred the notary to his writing, who set them down according to the same.

The bishop of Gloucester affecting much concern for Dr. Ridley, persuaded him not to indulge an obstinate temper, but recant his erroneous opinions, and return to the unity of the holy Catholic church.

Mr. Ridley coolly replied, he was not vain of his own understanding, but was fully persuaded that the religion he professed was founded on God's most holy and infallible word; and, therefore, he could not abandon or deny the same, consistent with his regard for the honour of God, and the salvation of his soul. He desired to declare his reasons wherefore he could not, with a safe conscience, admit of the popish supremacy; but his request was denied.

The bishop finding him inflexible in the faith, according to the doctrine of the Reformation, thus addressed him; "Dr. Ridley, it is with the utmost concern that I observe your stubbornness and obstinacy, in persisting in damnable errors and heresies; but unless you recant, I must proceed to the other part of my commission, though very much against my will and desire."

Mr. Ridley not making any reply, sentence of condemnation was read; after which he was carried back to confinement.

When Mr. Latimer was brought before the court, the bishop of Lincoln informed him that though they had already taken his answers to certain articles alleged against him, yet they had given him time to consider of the same, and would permit him to make what alterations he should deem fit, hoping by that means to reclaim him from his errors, and bring him over to the faith of the holy Catholic church.

The articles were again read to him; but he deviated not in a single point from the answers he had already given.

Being again warned to recant, and revoke his errors, he refused, declaring that he would never deny God's truth, which he was ready to seal with his blood.

Sentence of condemnation was then pronounced against him, and he was committed to the custody of the mayor.

A few days after this, they were both solemnly degraded by the bishop of Gloucester, and the vice-chancellor of Oxford; after which they were delivered over to the secular power.

The 16th of October, 1555, was the day appointed for their execution, and the place Town-ditch, behind Baliol-college. Mr. Latimer went to the stake in an humble, plain laydress, and Dr. Ridley in his ecclesiastical habit, which he wore when a bishop. They embraced each other on the melancholy occasion, and Dr. Ridley encouraged his fellow-labourer and fellow-sufferer in the cause of Christ, to be of good cheer, assuring him that God would either assuage the fury of the flames, or enable them to endure them.

They then kneeled down, and with great earnestness prayed to the Almighty God, to enable them to sustain the fiery trial that awaited them.

When they arose from prayer, one of the popish priests, in an occasional sermon, upbraided them with heresy and departure from the church of Christ. Dr. Ridley was desirous of vindicating himself from the aspersion of the priest, but was denied that liberty, and commanded to prepare immediately for the fire, unless he would recant and abjure his heretical opinions; without hesitation, therefore, he took off his clothes, distributed them among the populace, and together with Latimer, was chained to the stake.

Latimer soon expired, crying, O Father of heaven, receive my soul! But Ridley, by reason of the fire burning low, and not flaming about his body, endured the most exquisite torture, leaping in the fire, and begging for Christ's sake that the flames might surround him; till, at length, some of the spectators having taken off part of the faggots, the fire had vent, and the bag of gunpowder that was fastened to his neck exploded; after which he was not seen to move, but fell down at the feet of his fellow-sufferer.

Thus did these two pious divines and stedfast believers, testifying with their blood the truth of the everlasting gospel, upon which depends all the sinner's hopes of salvation; to suffer for which was the joy, the glory, of many eminent Christians, who having followed their dear Lord and Master through much tribulation in this vale of tears, will be glorified for ever with him in the kingdom of his Father and our Father, of his God and our God.

Mr. Latimer, at the time of his death, was in the eightieth year of his age.

The Burning of JOHN WEBBE, Gentleman, GEORGE ROPER, and GREGORY PARKE, at Canterbury.

Next after the martyrdom of the two most worthy champions and standard-bearers of Christ's army, Dr. Nicholas Ridley and Mr. Hugh Latimer, followed three other stout and bold soldiers, John Webbe, gentleman, George Roper, and Gregory Parke.

This John Webbe was brought before the bishop of Dover and Nicholas Harpsfield, or some other deputed in their room, the 16th day of September, and there had propounded unto him such ordinary articles as were commonly ministered by Bonner to those of his jurisdiction: and being willed for that present to depart, and to deliberate with himself upon the matter against the next time of his appearance, he made answer that he would no otherwise say, by God's grace, than he had already said, which was this: As touching the sacrament of Christ's body, I do believe (said he) it to be left unto his church, with thanksgiving, in commemoration of his death and passion, until his coming again. It is left in remembrance of his body, and not by the words of consecration to be made his body, really, substantially, and the same body that was born of the Virgin Mary: I utterly deny that.

After this, the 3d day of October, the said John Webbe, George Roper, and Gregory Parke, were brought all three together before the said judges; who there and then agreeing, and steadfastly allowing the answer made before by Mr. Webbe, were by the bloody prelates adjudged heretics, and therefore about the end of October, or in the latter end of November, they together were taken and brought out of prison to the place of martyrdom.

Roper was a young man, of a fresh colour, courage, and complexion; the other two were somewhat more elderly; all going in white linen, with their gowns on. Roper at his coming to the stake putting off his gown, gave a great leap. So soon as the flame was about him, the said Roper put out both his arms from his body like a cross, and so stood steadfast, continuing in that manner, not plucking his arms in till the fire had consumed them, and burnt them off.

And thus these aforesaid martyrs of Christ being brought, as I said, to the stake, and there compassed about with a chain, were burnt and consumed all three together in one fire at Canterbury, abiding most patiently their torments, and counting themselves happy and blessed of the Lord, that they were made worthy to suffer for Christ's gospel sake.

WILLIAM WISEMAN.

The 13th of December, in the Lollards' Tower, died William Wiseman, a cloth-worker, of London, where he was in prison for the gospel and word of God. How he died, it is not fully certain: some thought that either through famine or ill handling of some murdering Papists he was made away. By reason whereof the coroner, named John Gibbes, gentleman, with an inquest of twelve men, were fain to sit upon him, who although to the outward appearance were said to find nothing in him else but only God's visitation, yet what other privy causes there might be of his death, the Lord knoweth.

After the said William was departed, as is said, in the Tower, the holy Catholic churchmen cast him out into the fields, commanding that no man should bury him, according as their devout manner is to do with all such as die in like sort, whom they account as profane, and worthy of no burial, but to be cast to dogs and birds, ελωρια κυνέσσι, as the pope saith. And yet all this their merciless commandment notwithstanding, some good Tobits there were, which buried him in the evening, as commonly they did all the rest thrown out in like sort, whom they were wont privily by night to cover, and many times the archers in the fields standing by, and singing together psalms at their burial.

JAMES GORE.

In the same month, about the 7th day of December, died also James Gore in the prison at Colehester, laid there in bonds for the truth of God's word.

The Process and History of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, examined, condemned, and martyred, for the maintenance and defence of the Gospel, against the Antichristian See of Rome

Next followeth the martyrdom of Mr John Philpot, of whom partly ye heard before in the beginning of queen Mary's time, in prosecuting the disputation of the convocation-house. He was of a worshipful house, a knight's son, born in Hampshire, brought up in the new college in Oxford, where he studied the civil law the space of six or seven years, besides the study of other liberal arts, especially of the tongues, wherein he profited much, namely, in the knowledge of the Hebrew tongue, &c. In wit he was pregnant and happy, of a singular courage, in spirit fervent, in religion zealous, and also well practised and exercised in the same, of nature and condition plain and open, far from all flattery, farther from all hypocrisy and deceitful dissimulation. What his learning was, his own examinations penned of his own hand can declare.

From Oxford, desirous to see other countries as occasion served thereunto, he went over to Italy, and places thereabouts, where he coming upon a time from Venice to Padua, was in danger through a certain Franciscan friar accompanying him in his journey, who coming to Padua, sought to accuse him of heresy. At length, returning into England his country again, as the time ministered more boldness to him in the days of king Edward, he had divers conflicts with Gardiner, the bishop, in the city of Winchester.

After that, having an advowson by the said bishop, he was made there archdeacon of Winchester, under Dr. Poinet, who then succeeded Gardiner in that bishopric. Thus, during the time of king Edward, he continued to no small profit of those parts thereabout. When that blessed king was taken away, and Mary his sister came in place, whose study was wholly bent to alter the state of religion in the woful realm of England, first she caused a convocation of the prelates and learned men to be congregate to the accomplishment of her desire.

In which convocation Mr. Philpot being present, according to his room and degree, with a few others, sustained the cause of the gospel manfully against the adversaries; for which cause, notwithstanding the liberty of the house promised before, he was called to account before bishop Gardiner, the chancellor, then being his ordinary, by whom he was first examined.

The first examination of Mr. John Philpot, before the Queen's Commissioners, Mr. Cholmley, Mr. Roper, and Dr. Story, and one of the Scribes of the Arches, at Newgate Sessions Hall, October 2, 1555, as related by himself.

Dr. Story, before I was called into an inner parlour where they sat, came out into the hall where I was, to view me among other that there were, and passing by me, said, Ha, Mr. Philpot! and in returning immediately again, stayed against me, beholding me, and saying that I was well fed indeed.

Phil. If I be fat and in good liking, Mr. Doetor, it is no marvel, since I have been stalled up in prison these twelve months and a half, in a close corner. I am come to know your pleasure wherefore you have sent for me.

Story. We hear that thou art a suspected person, and of heretical opinions, and therefore we have sent for thee.

Phil. I have been in prison thus long, only upon the occasion of disputation made in the convocation-house, and upon suspieion of setting forth the report thereof.

Story. If thou wilt revoke the same, and become an honest man, thou shalt be set at liberty, and do right well; or else thou shalt be committed to the bishop of London. How sayest thou, wilt thou revoke it, or no?

Phil. I have already answered in this behalf to mine ordinary.

Story. If thou answerest thus when thou comest before us anon, thou shalt hear more of our minds; and with that he went into the parlour, and I within a litle while after was called in.

The Scribe. Sir, what is your name?

Phil. My name is John Philpot.

Story. This man was archdeacon of Winchester, of Dr. Poinet's presentment.

Phil. I was archdeacon indeed, but none of his presentment, but by virtue of a former advowson, given by my lord chaneellor that now is.

Story. Ye may be sure that my lord chaneellor would not make any such as he is archdeacon.

Roper. Come hither to me, Mr. Philpot. We hear say that you are out of the eatholie church, and have been a disturber of the same; out of the which whoso is, he cannot be the child of salvation. Wherefore, if you will come into the same, you shall be received, and find favour.

Phil. I am come before your worshipful masterhips at your appointment, understanding that you are magistrates authorized by the queen's majesty, whom I own, and will do my due obedience to the uttermost. Wherefore I desire to know what cause I have offended in, wherefore I am now called before you. And if I cannot be charged with any particular matter done contrary to the laws of this realm, I desire your masterhips that I may have the benefit of a subjeet, and be delivered out of my long wrongful confinement, where I have lien this twelvemonth and a half, without any calling to answer before now, and my living taken from me, contrary to law.

Roper. Though we have no particular matter to charge you withal, yet we may by our commission, and by the law, drive you to answer to the suspieion of a slander going on you; and besides this, we have statutes to charge you herein withal.

Phil. If I have offended any statute, echarge me therewithal; and if I have incurred the penalty thereof, punish me accordingly. And because you are magistrates and executors of the queen's majesty's laws, by force whereof you do now sit, I desire that if I be found no notorious transgressor of any of them, I may not be burdened with more than I have done.

Cholmley. If the justice do suspect a felon, he may examine him on suspieion thereof, and commit him to prison, though there be no fault done.

Story. I perceive whereabout this man goeth. He is plain in Cardmaker's case, for he made the self-same allegations. But they will not serve thee; for thou art an heretic, and holdest against the blessed mass: how sayest thou to that?

Phil. I am no heretic.

Story. I will prove thee an heretic. Whosoever hath holden against the blessed mass, is an heretic: but thou hast holden against the same, therefore thou art an heretic.

Phil. That which I spake, and which you are able to charge me withal, was in the convocation; where, by the queen's majesty's will and her whole counail, liberty was given to every man of the house to utter his conscience, and to say his mind freely of such questions in religion, as there were propounded by the prolocutor; for the which now I thought not to be molested and imprisoned as I have been, neither now to be compelled of you to answer to the same.

Story. Thou shalt go to the Lollard's Tower, and be there handled like an heretic as thou art, and answer to the same that thou there didst speak, and be judged by the bishop of London.

Phil. I have already been convented of this matter before my lord chancellor, mine ordinary; who this long time hath kept me in prison: therefore if his lordship will take my life away, as he hath done my liberty and living, he may: the which I think he cannot do of his conscience, and therefore hath let me lie thus long in prison: wherefore I am content to abide the end of him herein that is mine ordinary, and do refuse the auditory of the bishop of London, because he is an uncompetent judge for me, and not mine ordinary.

Story. But, sir, thou spakest words in the convocation-house, which is of the bishop of London's dioecese, and therefore thou shalt be carried to the Lollard's Tower, to be judged by him for the words thou spakest in his dioecese against the blessed mass.

Phil. Sir, you know by the law, that I may have exceptionem fori: and it is against all equity that I should be twice vexed for one cause, and that by such as by the law have nothing to do with me.

Roper. You cannot deny but that you spake against the mass in the convocation-house.

Story. Dost thou deny that which thou spakest there or no?

Phil. I cannot deny that I have spoken there, and if by the law you may put me to death therefore, I am here ready to suffer whatsoever I shall be judged unto.

The Scribe. This man is fed of vain-glory.

Cholm. Play the wise gentleman, and be comformable, and be not stubborn in your opinions, neither east yourself away: I would be glad to do you good.

Phil. I desire you, sir, with the rest here, that I be not charged further at your hands than the law eargeth me for that I have done, since there was no law directly against that wherewith I am now charged. And you, master doctor, (of old acquaintance in Oxford,) I trust will shew me some friendship, and not extremity.

Story. I tell thee, if thou wouldest be a good Catholic man, I would be thy friend, and spend my gown to do thee good; but I will be no friend to a heretic, as thou art, but will spend both my gown and my coat, but I will burn thee. How sayest thou to the sacrament of the altar?

Phil. Sir, I am not come now to dispute with your mastership, and the time now serveth not thereto, but to answer to that I may be lawfully charged withal.

Story. Well, since thou wilt not revoke that thou hast done, thou shalt be had unto the Lollards' Tower.

Phil. Sir, since you will needs shew me this extremity, and charge me with my conscience, I do desire to see your commission, whether you have this authority so to do; and after the view thereof I shall, according to my duty, make you further answer, if you may by the virtue thereof burden me with my conscience.

Roper. Let him see the commission: is it here?

Story. Shall we let every vile person see our commission?

Cholm. Let him go from whence he came, and on Thursday he shall see our commission.

Story. No, let him lie in the mean while in the Lollards' Tower; for I will sweep the King's Bench, and all other prisons also, of these heretics; they shall not have that resort as they have had, to scatter their heresies.

Phil. You have power to transfer my body from place to place at your pleasure; but you have no power over my soul. And I pass not whither you commit me, for I cannot be worse treated than I am, kept all day in a close chamber; wherefore it is no marvel that my flesh is puffed up, wherewithal master doctor is offended.

Story. Marshal, take him home with you again, and see that you bring him again on Thursday, and then we shall rid your fingers of him, and afterward of your other heretics.

Phil. God hath appointed a day shortly to come, in the which he will judge us with righteousness, howsoever you judge of us now.

Roper. Be content to be ruled by master doctor, and shew yourself a Catholic man.

Phil. Sir, if I should speak otherwise than my conscience is, I should but dissemble with you: and why be you so earnest to have me shew myself a dissembler both to God and you, which I cannot do?

Roper. We do not require you to dissemble with us to be a Catholic man.

Phil. If I do stand in any thing against that, wherein any man is able to convict me with one jot of the scripture, I shall be content to be counted no Catholic man, or an heretic, as you please.

Story. Have we scripture! scripture! And with that he rose up, saying, Who shall be judge, I pray you? This man is like his fellow Woodman, which the other day would have nothing else but scripture.

The Second Examination of Mr. Philpot before the Queen's Commissioners, the 24th of October, 1555, at Newgate Sessions Hall.

At my coming, a man of Aldgate (of mine acquaintance) said unto me, God have mercy on you, for you are already condemned in this world; for Dr. Story said, that my lord Chancellor had commanded to do you away. After a little consultation had between them, Mr. Cholmley called me unto him, saying:

Ch. Mr. Philpot, shew yourself a wise man, and be not stubborn in your own opinion; but be conformable to the queen's proceedings, and live, and you shall be well assured of great favour and reputation.

Phil. I shall do as it becometh a Christian man to do.

Story. This man is the rankest heretic that hath been in all my lord Chancellor's diocese, and hath done more hurt than any man else there; and therefore his pleasure is, that he should have the law to proceed against him; and I have spoken with my lord herein, and he willeth him to be committed to the bishop of London, and there to recant or else burn. He howled and wept in the convocation-house, and made such ado as never man did, as all the heretics do when they lack learning to answer. He shall go after his fellows. How sayest thou, wilt thou recant?

Phil. I know nothing I have done that I ought to recant.

Story. Well then, I pray you, let us commit him to the Lollards' Tower, there to remain until he be further examined before the bishop of London; for he is too fine fed in the King's-Bench, and he hath too much favour there. For his keeper said at the door yesterday, that he was the finest fellow, and one of the best learned, in England. And with this he rose up, and went his way.

Cook. This man has most stoutly maintained heresies since the queen's coming in, above any that I have heard of; therefore it is most meet he should be adjudged by the bishop of London, for the heresies he hath maintained.

Phil. I have maintained no heresies.

Cook. No, have you not? Did you not openly speak against the sacrament of the altar in the convocation-house? Call you that no heresy? Wilt thou recant that, or not?

Phil. It was the queen's majesty's pleasure that we should reason thereof, not by my seeking, but by other men's procuring, in the hearing of the council.

Cook. Did the queen give you leave to be an heretic? You may be sure her grace will not so do. Well, we will not dispute the matter with you: my lord of London shall proceed by inquisition upon thee, and if thou wilt not recant, thou shalt be burned.

Phil. My lord of London is not mine ordinary in this behalf, and I have already answered unto mine ordinary in this matter: and therefore, as I have said before, you shall do me great wrong to vex me twice for one matter, since I have sustained this long imprisonment, besides the loss of my living.

Roper. You are a very unmeet man to be an archdeacon.

Phil. There was never poor archdeacon so handled at your hands as I am, and that without any just cause ye be able to lay unto me.

Cook. Thou art no archdeacon.

Phil. I am archdeacon still, although another be in possession of my living: for I was never deprived by any law.

Cook. No, sir, that needeth not: for a notorious heretic should have no ordinary proceeding about his deprivation; but the bishop may upon knowledge thereof proceed to deprivation.

Phil. Master doctor, you know that the common law is otherwise; and besides this, the statutes of this realm be otherwise, which give this benefit to every person, though he be an heretic, to enjoy his living until he be put to death for the same.

Cholmley. Why, will you not agree that the queen's majesty may cause you to be examined of your faith?

Phil. Ask you master doctor Cook, and he will tell you that the temporal magistrates have nothing to do with matters of faith, for determination thereof. And St. Ambrose saith, Divina imperatorie majestati non sunt subjecta: That the things of God are not subject to the power and authority of princes.

Cook. No? may not the temporal power commit you to be examined of your faith to the bishop?

Phil. Yea, sir, I deny not that; but you will not grant that the same may examine any of their own authority.

Cook. Let him be had away.

Phil. Your mastership promised me the last time I was before you, I should see your commission, by what authority you do call me, and whether I by the same be bound to answer to so much as you demand.

Roper. Let him see the commission.—Then the scribe exhibited it to Mr. Roper, and was about to open the same.

Cook. No, what will ye do? he shall not see it.

Phil. Then do you me wrong, to call me and vex me, not snewing your authority in this behalf.

Cook. If we do you wrong, complain on us; and in the mean while thou shalt lie in the Lollards' Tower.

Phil. Sir, I am a poor gentleman; therefore I trust of your gentleness you will not commit me to so vile and strait a place, being found no heinous trespasser.

Cook. Thon art no gentleman.

Phil. Yes, that I am.

Cook. An heretic is no gentleman; for he is a gentleman that hath gentle conditions.

Phil. The offence cannot take away the state of a gentleman as long as he liveth, although he were a traitor: but I mean not to boast of my gentlemanship, but will put it under my foot, since you do no more esteem it.

Story. What, will you suffer this heretic to prate with you all this day?

Cook. He saith he is a gentleman.

Story. A gentleman, quoth he! he is a vile heretic knave: for an heretic is no gentleman. Let the keeper of the Lollards' Tower come in, and have him away.

The Keeper. Here, sir.

Story. Take this man with you to the Lollards' Tower, or else to the bishop's coal-house.

Phil. Sir, If I were a dog you could not appoint me a worse and more vile place; but I must be content with whatsoever injury you do offer me. God give you a more merciful heart; you are very cruel upon one that hath never offended you. I pray you, Mr. Cholmley, shew me some friendship, that I be not carried to so vile a place. And he called me aside, and said, Cholm. I am not skilful of their doings, neither of their laws; I cannot tell what they mean. I would I could do you good.

Phil. I am content to go whither you will have me. There was never man more cruelly handled than I am at your hands, that without just cause known should thus be treated.

Story. Shall we suffer this heretic thus to reprove us? have him hence.

Phil. God forgive you, and give you more merciful hearts, and shew you more mercy in the time of need: "Do quickly that you have in hand."

Story. Do you not hear how he maketh us Judases?

Phil. That is after your own understanding.

After this, I with four others more were brought to the keeper's house in Paternoster-row, where we supped, and after supper I was called up to a chamber by the archdeacon of London's servant, and that in his master's name, who offered me a bed for that night. To whom I gave thanks, saying, that it should be a grief to me to lie well one night, and the next worse: wherefore I will begin (said I) as I am like to continue, to take such part as my fellows do. And with that we were brought through Paternoster-row to my lord of London's coal-house; unto the which is joined a little blind house, with a great pair of stocks, appointed both for hand and foot. But, thanks be to God, we have not played of those organs yet, although some before us have tried them; and there we found a minister of Essex, a married priest, a man of godly zeal, with one other poor man.

And this minister, at my coming, desired to speak with me, and did greatly lament his own infirmity, for that through extremity of imprisonment he was constrained by writing to yield to the bishop of London; whereupon he was once set at liberty, and afterward felt such a hell in his conscience, that he could scarce refrain from destroying himself, and never could be quiet until he had gone unto the bishop's register, desiring to see his bill again; the which as soon as he had received, he tore it in pieces, and after that he was as joyful as any man might be. Of the which when my lord of London had understanding, he sent for him, and fell upon him like a lion, and like a manly bishop buffeted him well, so that he made his face black and blue, and plucked away a great piece of his beard. But now, thanks be to God, he is as joyful under the cross as any of us. I write this, because I would all men to take heed how they do contrary to their conscience; which is, to fall into the pains of hell.

The manner of my calling first before the Bishop of London, the second night of my imprisonment in his Coal-house.

The bishop sent unto me Mr. Johnson, his register, with a mess of meat, and a good pot of drink, and bread, saying, That my lord had no knowledge before of my being here, for which he was sorry: therefore he had sent me and my fellows that meat, not knowing whether I would receive the same.

I thanked God for my lord's charity, that it pleased him to remember poor prisoners, desiring Almighty God to increase the same in him and in all others; and therefore I would not refuse his beneficence: and therewith took the same unto my brethren, praising God for his providence towards his afflicted flock, that he stirred our adversaries up to help the same in their necessity.

Johnson. My lord would know the cause of your sending hither, for he knoweth nothing thereof, and wondereth he should be troubled with prisoners of another diocese.

I declared unto him the whole cause. After the which he said, My lord's will was, that I should have any friendship I would desire; and so departed. Within a while after, one of my lord's gentlemen cometh for me; and I was brought into his presence, where he sat at a table alone, with three or four of his chaplains waiting upon him, and his register.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, you are welcome; give me your hand.

With that, because he so gently put forth his hand, I, to render courtesy for courtesy, kissed my hand, and gave him the same.

Bonner. I am right sorry for your trouble, and I promise you, before it was within these two hours, I knew not of your being here. I pray you tell me what was the cause of your sending hither, for I promise you I know nothing as yet, neither would I you should think that I was the cause thereof, and I marvel that other men will trouble me with their matters: but I must be obedient to my betters, and I fear men speak otherwise of me than I deserve.

I shewed him the sum of the matter, that it was for the disputation in the convocation-house, for the which I was against all right molested.

Bonner. I marvel that you should be troubled therefore, if there was none other cause but this. But peradventure you have maintained the same since, and some of your friends of late have asked whether you do stand to the same, and you have said, Yea; and for this you might be committed to prison.

Phil. If it shall please your lordship, I am burdened none otherwise than I have told you by the commissioners, who sent me hither, because I would not recant the same.

Bonner. A man may speak in the parliament house, though it be a place of free speech, so as he may be imprisoned for it, as in case he speak words of high treason against the king or queen; and so it might be that you spake other-wise than it became you of the church of Christ.

Phil. I spake nothing which was out of the articles which were called in question, and agreed upon to be disputed by the whole house, and the queen's permission and the council.

Bonner. Why, may we dispute of our faith?

Phil. Yea, that we may.

Bonner. Nay, I trow not, by the law.

Phil. Indeed, by the civil law I know it is not lawful, but by God's law we may reason thereof: for St. Peter saith, "Be ye ready to render account unto all men of that hope which is in you, that demand of you the same."

Bonner. Indeed, St. Peter saith so. Why, then, I ask you what your judgment is of the sacrament of the altar?

Phil. My lord, St. Ambrose saith, that the disputation of faith ought to be in the congregation, in the hearing of the people, and that I am not bound to render account thereof to every man privately, unless it be to edify. But now I cannot shew you my mind, but I must run upon the pikes in danger of my life. Wherefore, as the said doctor said unto Valentinian the emperor, so say I to your lordship, Tolle legem, et fiat certamen: Take away the law, and I shall reason with you. And yet if I come in open judgment, where I am bound by the law to answer, I trust I shall utter my conscience as freely as any that hath come before you.

Bonner. I perceive you are learned, I would have such as you be about me. But you must come and be of the church, for there is but one church.

Phil. God forbid I should be out of the church, I am sure I am within the same: for I know, as I am taught by the scripture, that there is but one Catholic church, Una columba, una sponsa, una dilecta: One dove, one spouse, one beloved congregation; out of the which there is no salvation.

Bonner. How chanceth it then that you go out of the same, and walk not with us?

Phil. My lord, I am sure I am within the bounds of the church whereupon she is builded, which is the word of God.

Bonner. What age are ye of?

Phil. I am four and forty.

Bonner. You are not now of the same faith your godfathers and godmothers promised for you, in the which you are baptized.

Phil. Yes, I thank God I am: for I was baptized into the faith of Christ, which I now hold.

Bonner. How can that be? there is but one faith.

Phil. I am assured of that by St. Paul, saying, That there is but one God, one faith, and one baptism; of the which I am.

Bonner. You were twenty years ago of another faith than you be now.

Phil. Indeed, my lord, to tell you plain, I was then nul-lius fidei, (of no faith,) a neuter, a wicked liver, neither hot nor cold.

Bonner. Why, do you not think that we have now the true faith?

Phil. I desire your lordship to hold me excused from answering at this time. I am sure that God's word thoroughly, with the primitive church, and all the ancient writers, do agree with this faith I am of.

Bonner. Well, I promise you I mean you no more hurt than to mine own person: I marvel that you are so merry in prison as you be, singing and rejoicing, as the prophet saith, Exultantes in rebus pessimis: Rejoicing in your naughtiness. Methinketh you do not well herein; and should rather lament and be sorry.

Phil. My lord, the mirth that we make is but in singing certain psalms, according as we are commanded by St. Paul, willing us to be "merry in the Lord, singing together in hymns and psalms:" and I trust your lordship cannot be displeased with that.

Bonner. We may say unto you as Christ said in the gospel, Tibiis cecinimus vobis, et non planxistis: "We have piped unto you, and ye have not mourned."

Here my lord stumbled, and could not bring forth the text, and required his chaplains to help, and to put him in remembrance of the text better. But they were mum: and I recited out the text unto him, which made nothing to his purpose, unless he would have us to mourn, because they, if they laugh, sing still sorrowful things unto us, threatening faggots and fire. We are, my lord, in a dark and comfortless place, and therefore it behoveth us to be merry, lest, as Solomon saith, sorrowfulness eat up our heart. Therefore I trust your lordship will not be angry for our singing of psalms, since St. Paul saith, "If any man be of an upright mind, let him sing." And we, therefore, to testify that we are of an upright mind to God, (though we be in misery,) do sing.

Bonner. I will trouble you no further as now. If I can do you any good, I will be glad to do it for you. God be with you, good Mr. Philpot, and give you a good night. Have him to the cellar, and let him drink a cup of wine.

Thus I departed, and by my lord's register I was brought to his cellar door, where I drank a good cup of wine; and my lord's chaplain, Mr. Cousin, followed me, taking acquaintance, saying, that I was welcome, and wished that I would not be singular.

Phil. I am well taught the contrary by Solomon, saying, Va soli; "Wo be to him that is alone."—After that I was carried to my lord's coal-house again, where I with my six fellows do rouse together in straw, as cheerfully, we thank God, as others do in their beds of down.

The fourth Examination of Mr. Philpot, in the Archdeacon's House, before the Bishops of London, Bath, Worcester, and Gloucester.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, it hath pleased my lords to take pains here to-day, to dine with my poor archdeacon, and in the dinner-time it chanced us to have communication of you, and you were pitied here of many that knew you in the new college in Oxford; and I also do pity your case, because you seem unto me, by the talk I had with you the other night, to be learned. And therefore now I have sent for you to come before them, that it might not be said hereafter, that I had so many learned bishops at my house, and yet would not vouchsafe them to talk with you, and at my request (I thank them) they are content so to do. Now therefore utter your mind freely, and you shall with all favour be satisfied. I am sorry to see you lie in so evil a case as you do, and would fain you should do better, as you may if you list.

Bath. My lords here have not sent for you to fawn upon you, but for charity's sake, to exhort you to come into the right Catholic way of the church.

Worc. Before he beginneth to speak, it is best that he call to God for grace, and to pray that it might please God to open his heart, that he may conceive the truth.

With that I fell down upon my knees before them, and made my prayer on this manner;

"Almighty God, which art the giver of all wisdom and understanding, I beseech thee of thine infinite goodness and mercy in Jesus Christ, to give me, most vile sinner in thy sight, the spirit of wisdom to speak and make answer in thy cause, that it may be to the contentation of the hearers, before whom I stand, and also to my better understanding, if I be deceived in any thing."

Bonner. Nay, my lord of Worcester, you did not well to exhort him to make any prayer: for this is a thing they have a singular pride in, that they can often make their vain prayers, in the which they glory much. For in this point they are much like to certain arrant heretics of whom Pliny maketh mention, that did daily sing antelucanos hymnos, praise unto God before dawn of the day.

Phil. My lord, God make me, and all you here present, such heretics as those were that sung those morning hymns: for they were right Christians, with whom the tyrants of the world were offended for their well doing.

Bath. Proceed to that he hath to say. He hath prayed I cannot tell for what.

Bonner. Say on, Mr. Philpot; my lords will gladly hear you.

Phil. I have, my lords, been this twelvemonth and a half in prison, without any just cause that I know, and my living taken from me without any lawful order, and now I am brought, contrary to right, from mine own territory and ordinary, into another man's jurisdiction, I know not why. Wherefore, if your lordships can accuse me with any evil done, I stand here before you to purge me of the same. And if no such thing may be justly laid to my charge, I desire to be released of this wrongful trouble.

Bonner. There is none here goeth about to trouble you, but to do you good if we can: for I promise you, ye were sent hither to me without my knowledge. Therefore speak your conscience without any fear.

Phil. My lord, I have learned to answer in matters of religion, in ecclesia legitime vocatus, in the congregation, being thereto lawfully called: but now I am not lawfully called, neither is here a just congregation where I ought to answer.

Bonner. Indeed, this man told me the last time I spake with him, that he was a lawyer, and would not utter his conscience in matters of faith, unless it were in the hearing of the people, where he might speak to vain-glory.

Phil. My lord, I said not I was a lawyer, neither do I arrogate to myself that name, although I was once a novice in the same, where I learned something for mine own defence, when I am called in judgment to answer to any cause, and whereby I have been taught not to put myself further in danger than I need; and so far am I a lawyer, and no further.

Bath. If you will not answer to my lord's request, you seem to be a wilful man in your opinion.

Phil. My lord of London is not mine ordinary, before whom I am bound to answer in this behalf, as Mr. Dr. Cole, who is a lawyer, can well tell you by the law; and I have not offended my lord of London wherefore he should call me.

Bonner. Yes, I have to lay to your charge, that you have offended in my diocese by speaking against the blessed sacrament of the altar: and therefore I may call you, and proceed against you to punish you by the law.

Phil. I have not offended in your diocese: for that which I spake of the sacrament was in Paul's church in the convocation-house, which (as I understand) is a peculiar jurisdiction belonging to the dean of Paul's, and therefore is counted of your lordship's diocese, but not in your diocese.

Bonner. Is not Paul's church in my diocese? Well, I wot it costeth me a good deal of money by the year, the leading thereof.

Phil. That may be, and yet be exempted from your lordship's jurisdiction: and albeit I had so offended in your diocese, yet I ought by the law to be sent to mine ordinary, if I require it, and not to be punished by you that are not mine ordinary. And already (as I have told you) I have been convented of mine ordinary for this cause, which you go about to inquire of me.

Bonner. How say you, Mr. Dr. Cole, may not I proceed against him by the law, for that he hath done in my diocese?

Cole. Methinketh Mr. Philpot needeth not to stand so much with your lordship in that point as he doth, sithence you seek not to hinder him, but to further him; therefore I think it best that he go to the matter that is laid against him of the convocation, and make no longer delay.

Phil. I would willingly shew my mind of the matter, but I am sure it will be laid against me to my prejudice when I come to judgment.

Cole. Why, then, you may speak by protestation.

Phil. But what shall my protestation avail in a cause of heresy, as you call it, if I speak otherwise than you will have me, since that which I spake in the convocation-house, being a place privileged, cannot now help me?

Bonner. But, master Dr. Cole, may not I proceed against him for that offence he hath done in my diocese?

Cole. You may call him before you, my lord, if he be found in your diocese.

Phil. But I have by force been brought out of mine own diocese to my lord's, and required to be judged of mine own ordinary: and therefore I know master doctor will not say of his knowledge, that your lordship ought to proceed against me. And here master doctor would say nothing.

Worc. Do you not think to find before my lord here as good equity in your cause, as before your own ordinary?

Phil. I cannot blame my lord of London's equity, with whom (I thank his lordship) I have found more gentleness since I came, than of mine own ordinary (I speak it for no flattery) this twelvemonth and this half before, who never would call me to answer, as his lordship hath done now twice. Sed nemo prohibetur uti jure suo, But no man is forbid to use his own right due unto him: so, I ought not to be forestalled of my right, and therefore I challenge the same for divers other considerations.

Bonner. Now you cannot say, hereafter, but that you have been gently communed withal of my lords here; and yet you will be wilful and obstinate in your error, and in your opinions, and will not shew any cause why you will not come into the unity of the church with us.

Phil. My lords, in that I do not declare my mind according to your expectation, it is, as I have said, because I cannot speak without present danger of my life. But rather than you should report me, by this, either obstinate or self-willed, without any just ground whereupon I stand, I will open unto you somewhat of my mind, or rather the whole, desiring your lordships, which seem to be pillars of the church of England, to satisfy me in the same; and I will refer all other causes in the which I dissent from you, unto one or two articles, or rather to one, which includeth them both; in the which if I can by the scriptures be satisfied at your mouths, I shall as willingly agree to you as any other in all points.

Bonner. These heretics come always with their ifs, as this man doth now, saying, if he can be satisfied by the scriptures: so that he will always have this exception, 'I am not satisfied,' although the matter be never so plainly proved against him. But will you promise to be satisfied, if my lords take some pains about you?

Phil. I say, my lord, I will be satisfied by the scriptures in that wherein I stand. And I protest here before God and his eternal Son Jesus Christ my Saviour, and the Holy Ghost, and his angels, and you here present that be judges of that I speak, that I do not stand in any opinion of wilfulness or singularity, but only upon my conscience, certainly informed by God's word, from the which I dare not go for fear of damnation; and this is the cause of mine earnestness on this behalf.

Bonner. I will trouble my lords no longer, seeing that you will not declare your mind.

Phil. I am about so to do, if it please your lordship to hear me speak.

Bath. Give him leave, my lord, to speak that he hath to say.

Phil. My lords, it is not unknown to you that the chief cause why you do count me, and such as I am, for heretics, is because we be not at unity with your church. You say, you are of the true church: and we say we are of the true church. You say, that whosoever is out of your church is damned: and we think verily, on the other side, that if we depart from the true church, whereon we are grafted in God's word, we should stand in the state of damnation. Wherefore if your lordship can bring any better authority for your church than we can do for our's, and prove by the scriptures that the church of Rome now (of which you are) is the true catholic church, as in all your sermons, writings, and arguments, you do uphold, and that all Christian persons ought to be ruled by the same, under pain of damnation, as you say, and that the same church, as you pretend, hath authority to interpret the scriptures as it seemeth her good, and that all men are bound to follow such interpretations only: I shall be as conformable to the same church as you may desire me; the which otherwise I dare not. Therefore I require you for God's sake to satisfy me in this.

Cole. If you stand upon this point only, you may soon be satisfied if you list.

Phil. It is the thing that I require, and to this I have said I will stand, and refer all other controversies wherein I stand now against you, and will put my hand thereto, if you mistrust my word.

Bonner. I pray you, Mr. Philpot, what faith were you of twenty years ago? This man will have every year a new faith.

Phil. My lord, to tell you plain, I think I was of no faith; for I was then a wicked liver, and knew not God then as I ought to do, God forgive me.

Bonner. No faith? that is not so: I am sure you were of some faith.

Phil. My lord, I have declared to you on my conscience what I then was, and judge of myself: and what is that to the purpose of the thing I desire to be satisfied of you?

Bonner. Master Dr. Cole, I pray you say your mind to him.

Cole. What will you say if I can prove that it was decreed by an universal council in Athanasius's time, that all the Christian church should follow the determination of the church of Rome? but I do now not remember where.

Phil. If you, master doctor, can shew me the same granted to the see of Rome by the authority of the scripture, I will gladly hearken thereto. But I think you be not able to shew any such thing: for Athanasius was president of the Nicene Council, and there was no such thing decreed, I am sure.

Cole. Though it were not then, it might be at another time.

Phil. I desire to see the proof thereof.—And upon this Mr. Harpsfield, ehancellor to the bishop of London, brought in a book of Ireneus, with certain leaves turned in, and laid it before the bishops to help them in their perplexity, if it might be: the which after the bishops of Bath and Gloucester had read together, the bishop of Gloucester gave me the book.

Glo. Take the book, Mr. Philpot, and look upon that place, and there may you see how the church of Rome is to be followed of all men.

Phil. I took the book, and read the place, the which after I had read, I said it made nothing against me, but against the Arians and other heretics, against whom Ireneus wrote, proving that they were not to be credited, because they did teach and follow after strange doctrine in Europe, and that the chief church of the same was founded by Peter and Paul, and had to this time continued by faithful succession of the faithful bishops in preaching the true gospel, as they had received of the apostles, and nothing like to these late-sprung heretics, &c. Whereby he concludeth against them, that they were not to be heard, neither to be credited, the which thing if you, my lords, be able to prove now of the church of Rome, then had you as good authority against me, in my cause now, as Ireneus had against those heretics. But the church of Rome hath swerved from the truth and simplicity of the gospel, which it maintained in Ireneus' time, and was uncorrupted from that which it is now; wherefore your lordship cannot justly apply the authority of Ireneus to the church of Rome now, which is so manifestly corrupted from the primitive church.

Bonner. So will you say still, it maketh nothing for the purpose, whatsoever authority we bring, and will never be satisfied.

Phil. My lord, when I do by just reason prove that the authorities which be brought against me do not make to the purpose, (as I have already proved,) I trust you will receive mine answer.

Worc. It is to be proved most manifestly by all the ancient writers, that the see of Rome hath always followed the truth, and never was deceived, until of late certain heretics have defaced the same.

Phil. Let that be proved, and I have done.

Worc. Nay, you are of such arrogancy, singularity, and vain-glory, that you will not see it, be it never so well proved.

Phil. Ha, my lords, is it now time, think you, for me to follow singularity or vain-glory, since it is now upon danger of my life and death, not only presently, but also before God to come? And I know, if I die not in the true faith, I shall die everlastingly; and again I know, if I do not as you would have me, you will kill me and many thousands more; yet had I rather perish at your hands than to perish eternally. And at this time I have lost all my commodities of this world, and lie in a coal-house, where a man would not lay a dog; with the which I am well contented.

Cole. Where are you able to prove that the church of Rome hath erred at any time? and by what history? Certain it is by Eusebius, that the church was established at Rome by Peter and Paul, and that Peter was bishop twenty-five years at Rome.

Phil. I know well that Eusebius so writeth: but if we compare that which St. Paul writeth to the Galatians, chapter i. the contrary will manifestly appear, that he was not half so long there. He lived not past 35 years after he was called to be an apostle; and Paul maketh mention of his abiding at Jerusalem after Christ's death more than thirteen years.

Cole. What did Peter write to the Galatians?

Phil. No, I say Paul maketh mention of Peter writing to the Galatians, and of his abiding at Jerusalem: and, further, I am able to prove, both by Eusebius and other historians, that the church of Rome hath manifestly erred, and at this present doth err, because she agreeth not with that which they wrote. The primitive church did use according to the gospel, and there needeth none other proof but compare the one with the other.

Bonner. I may compare this man to a certain man I read of which fell into a desperation, and went into a wood to hang himself, and when he came there, he went viewing of every tree, and could find none on the which he might vouchsafe to hang himself. But I will not apply it as I might. I pray you, master doctor, go forth with him.

Cole. My lord, there be on every side of me that be better able to answer him, and I love not to fall into disputation; for that now-a-days a man shall but sustain shame thereby of the people. I had rather shew my mind in writing.

Phil. And I had rather that you should do so than otherwise, for then a man may better judge of your words than by argument, and I beseech you so to do. But if I were a rich man, I durst wager an hundred pounds that you shall not be able to shew that you have said to be decreed by a general council in Athanasius's time: for this I am sure of, that it was concluded by a general council in Africa many years after, that none of Africa, under pain of excommunication, should appeal to Rome. The which decree I am sure they would not have made, if by the scriptures, and by an universal council, it had been decreed that all men should abide and follow the determination of the church of Rome.

Cole. But I can shew that they revoked that error again.

Phil. So you say, master doctor; but I pray you shew me where. I have hitherto heard nothing of you for my contentation, but bare words without any authority.

Bonner. What, I pray you, ought we to dispute with you of our faith? Justinian in the law hath a title, De Fide Catholica, to the contrary.

Phil. I am certain the civil law hath such a constitution; but our faith must not depend upon the civil law: for as St. Ambrose saith, Non lex, sed fides congregavit ecclesiam: Not the law, but the gospel, saith he, hath gathered the church together.

Wore. Mr. Philpot, you have the spirit of pride wherewith ye be led, which will not let you yield to the truth; leave it for shame.

Phil. Sir, I am sure I have the spirit of faith, by the which I speak at this present; neither am I ashamed to stand to my faith.

Glo. What! do you think yourself better learned than so many notable learned men as be here?

Phil. Elias alone had the truth, when there were four hundred priests against him.

Wore. O, you would be counted now for Elias! And yet I tell thee he was deceived; for he thought there had been none good but himself, and yet he was deceived, for there were seven thousand besides him.

Phil. Yea, but he was not deceived in doctrine, as the other four hundred were.

Wore. By my faith you are greatly to blame, that you cannot be content to be of the church which ever hath been of that faithful antiquity.

Phil. My lord, I know Rome, and have been there, where I saw your lordship.

Wore. Indeed I did fly from hence thither, and I remember not that I saw you there. But I am sorry that you have been there: for the wickedness which you have seen there, peradventure causeth you to do as you do.

Phil. No, my lord, I do not as I do for that cause: for I am taught otherwise by the gospel, not altogether to refuse the minister for his evil living, so that he bring sound doctrine out of God's book.

Wore. Do you think the universal church may be deceived?

Phil. St. Paul to the Thessalonians prophesieth that there should come an universal departing from the faith in the latter days before the coming of Christ, saying, Non veniet Christus, nisi venerit defectio prius, that is, Christ shall not come, till there come a departing first.

Cole. Yea, I pray you, how take you the departing there in St. Paul? it is not meant of faith, but of the departing from the empire; for it is, in Greek, αποστασις.

Phil. Marry indeed, you, master doctor, put me in good remembrance of the meaning of St. Paul in that place; for apostasia is properly a departing from the faith, and thereof cometh apostata, which properly signifieth one that departeth from his faith; and St. Paul in the same place after speaketh of the decay of the empire.

Cole. Apostasia doth not only signify a departing from the faith, but also from the empire, as I am able to shew.

Phil. I never read it so taken; and when you shall be able to shew it, as you say in words, I will believe it, and not before.

Wore. I am sorry that you should be against the Christian world.

Phil. The world commonly, and such as be called Christians (for the multitude) hath hated the truth, and been enemies to the same.

Glo. Why, Mr. Philpot, do you think that the universal church hath erred, and you only to be in the truth?

Phil. The church that you are of was never universal; for two parts of the world, which is Asia and Africa, never consented to the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, as at this day they do not, neither do follow his decrees.

Glo. Yes, in the Florentine council they did agree.

Phil. It was said so by false report, after they of Asia and Africa were gone home; but it was not so indeed, as the sequel of them all hitherto doth prove the contrary.

Glo. I pray you, by whom will you be judged in matters of controversy which happen daily?

Phil. By the word of God: for Christ saith in St. John, 'The word that he spake, shall be judge in the latter day.'

Glo. What if you take the word one way, and I another way, who shall be judge then?

Phil. The primitive church.

Glo. I know you mean the doctors that wrote thereof.

Phil. I mean verily so.

Glo. What if you take the doctors in one sense, and I in another, who shall be judge then?

Phil. Then let that be taken which is most agreeable to God's word.

Cole. My lords, why do you trouble yourselves to answer him in this matter? It is not the thing which is laid to his charge, but his error of the sacrament, and he, to shift himself of that, brought in another matter.

Phil. This is the matter, Mr. Cole, to the which I have referred all other questions, and desire to be satisfied.

Wore. It is wonder to see how he standeth with a few against a great multitude.

Phil. We have almost as many as you: for we have Asia, Africa, Germany, Denmark, and a great part of France, and daily the number of the gospel doth increase; so that I am credibly informed, that for this religion in which I stand, and for the which I am like to die, a great multitude doth daily come out of France through persecution, that the cities of Germany be scarce able to receive them; and therefore your lordship may be sure the word of God will one day take place, do what you can to the contrary.

Worc. They were well occupied to bring you such news, and you have been well kept to have such resort unto you. Thou art the arrogantest fellow, and stoutest fond fellow, that ever I knew.

Phil. I pray your lordship to bear with my hasty speech; for it is part of my corrupt nature to speak somewhat hastily. But for all that, I mean with humility to do my duty to your lordship.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, my lords will trouble you no further at this time, but you shall go from whence you came, and have such favour as in the mean while I can shew you; and upon Wednesday next you shall be called again, to be heard what you can say for maintenance of your error.

Phil. My lord, my desire is to be satisfied of you in that I have required; and your lordship shall find me as I have said.

Worc. We wish you as well as ourselves.

Phil. I think the same, my lords, but I fear you are deceived, and have a zeal of yourselves not according to knowledge.

Worc. God send you more grace.

Phil. And also God increase the same in you, and open your eyes that you may see to maintain his truth, and his true church.

Then the bishops rose up, and consulted together, and caused a writing to be made, in the which I think my blood by them was bought and sold, and thereto they put their hands; and after this I was carried to my coal-house again.

Because I have begun to write unto you of mine examinations before the bishop and other, more to satisfy your desire than that it is any thing worthy to be written, I have thought it good to write unto you also that which had been done of late, that the same might come to light which they do in darkness and in privy corners, and that the world now, and posterity hereafter, might know how unorderly, unjustly, and unlearnedly, these ravening wolves do proceed against the silly and faithful flock of Christ, and condemn and persecute the sincere doctrine of Christ in us, which they are not able by honest means to resist, but only by tyranny and violence.

The fifth Examination of John Philpot, had before the Bishops of London, Rochester, Coventry, St. Asaph, (I trow,) and one other, whose Sees I know not, Dr. Story, Curtop, Dr. Saverson, Dr. Pendleton, with divers other, Chaplains and Gentlemen of the Queen's Chamber, and divers other Gentlemen, in the Gallery of my Lord of London's Palace.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, come you hither; I have desired my lords here, and other learned men, to take some pains once again, and to do you good, and because I do mind to sit in judgment on you to-morrow, as I am commanded, yet I would you should have as much favour as I can shew you, if you will be any thing conformable; therefore play the wise man, and be not singular in your own opinion, but be ruled by these learned men.

Phil. My lord, in that you say you will sit on me in judgment to-morrow, I am glad thereof: for I was promised by them which sent me unto you, that I should have been judged the next day after; but promise hath not been kept with me, to my farther grief. I look for none other but death at your hands, and I am as ready to yield my life in Christ's cause, as you be to require it.

Bonner. Lo, what a wilful man is this! By my faith it is but folly to reason with him, neither with any of these heretics. I am sorry that you will be no more tractable, and that I am compelled to shew extremity against you.

Phil. My lord, you need not to shew extremity against me unless you list; neither by the law, as I have said, have you any thing to do with me, for that you are not mine ordinary, albeit I am, contrary to all right, in your prison.

Bonner. Why, the queen's commissioners sent you hither unto me upon your examination had before them. I know not well the cause; but I am sure they would not have sent you hither to me unless you had made some talk to them otherwise than it becometh a Christian man.

Phil. My lord, indeed they sent me hither without any occasion then ministered by me; only they laid unto me the disputation I made in the convocation-house, requiring me to answer the same, and to recant it: the which because I would not do, they sent me hither to your lordship.

Bon. Why did you not answer them thereto?

Phil. For that they were temporal men, and ought not to be judges in spiritual causes whereof they demanded me, without shewing any authority whereby I was bound to answer them, and hereupon they committed me to your prison.

Bonner. Indeed I remember now, you maintained open heresy in my diocese: wherefore the commissioners sent you unto me, that I should proceed against you, for this you have spoken in my diocese.

Phil. My lord, I stand still upon my lawful plea in this behalf; that though it were a great heresy, as you suppose it, yet I ought not to be troubled therefore, in respect of the privilege of the parliament-house, whereof the convocation-house is a member, where all men in matters propounded may frankly speak their minds; and here is present a gentleman of the queen's majesty that was present at the disputation, and can testify the questions which were then in controversy were not set forth by me, but by the prolocutor, who required in the queen's majesty's name all men to dispute their minds freely in the same, that were of the house.

The queen's gentleman. Though the parliament-house be a place of privilege for men of the house to speak, yet may none speak any treason against the queen, or maintain treason against the crown.

Phil. But if there be any matter which otherwise it were treason to speak of, were it treason for any person to speak therein, specially the thing being proposed by the speaker? I think not.

The queen's gentleman. You make the matter easy enough to you yet, as I perceive, if you will revoke the same which you did there so stubbornly maintain.

S. As. This man did not speak under reformation, as many there did, but αγαπῶτως and κατηγορικως, which is, earnestly and persuasively, as ever I heard any.

Phil. My lords, since you will not cease to trouble me for that I have lawfully done, neither will admit my just defence for that was spoken in the convocation-house by me, contrary to the laws and custom of the realm; I appeal to the whole parliament-house, to be judged by the same, whether I ought thus to be molested for that I have there spoken.

Rochester. But have you spoken and maintained the same since that time, or no?

Phil. If any man can charge me justly therewith, here I stand to make answer.

Rochester. How say you to it now? will you stand to that you have spoken in the convocation-house, and do you think you said then well, or no?

Phil. My lord, you are not mine ordinary to proceed ex officio against me; and therefore I am not bound to tell you my conscience of your demands.

S. As. What say you now? Is there not in the blessed sacrament of the altar (and with that they all put off their caps for reverence of the idol) the presence of our Saviour Christ really and substantially, after the words of consecration?

Phil. I do believe in the sacrament of Christ's body, duly ministered, to be such manner of presence as the word teacheth me to believe.

S. As. I pray you, how is that?

Phil. As for that, I will declare another time, when I shall be lawfully called to dispute my mind of this matter. But I am not yet driven to that point: and the scripture saith, All things ought to be done in order.

Another bishop. This is a froward and vain-glorious man.

Bonner. It is not lawful for a man by the civil laws to dispute of his faith openly, as it appeareth in the title, De summa Trinitate et Fide Catholica.

Phil. My lord, I have answered you to this question before.

Bonner. Why, I never asked thee of this before now.

Phil. Yes, that you did at my last examination, by that token I answered your lordship by St. Ambrose, that the church is congregated by the word, and not by man's law. Wherefore I add now further of this saying, Quod si fidem repudiat, et legem objicit, injustus est, quia justus ex fide vivet: i. e. That he which refuseth the word, and objecteth the law, is an unjust man, because the just shall live by faith. And moreover, my lord, the title which your lordship allegeth out of the law, maketh it not unlawful to dispute of all the articles of the faith, but of the Trinity.

Bonner. Thou liest, it is not so; and I will shew you by the book how ignorant he is.—And with that he went with all haste to his study, and fetched his book, and openly read the text and the title of the law, and charged me with such words as seemed to make for his purpose, saying, How sayest thou to this?

Phil. My lord, I say as I said before, that the law meaneth of the Catholic faith, determined in the council of Chalcedonia, where the articles of the Creed were only concluded upon.

Bonner. Thou art the veriest beast that ever I heard; I must needs speak it, thou compellest me therunto.

Phil. Your lordship may speak your pleasure of me. But what is this to the purpose which your lordship is so earnest in? You know that our faith is not grounded upon the civil law: therefore it is not material to me whatsoever the law saith.

Bonner. By what law wilt thou be judged? wilt thou be judged by the common law?

Phil. No, my lord, our faith dependeth not upon the laws of man.

S. As. He will be judged by no law, but as he list himself.

Worc. The common laws are but abstracts of the scriptures and doctors.

Phil. Whatsoever you do make them, they are no ground of my faith, by the which I ought to be judged.

Bonner. I must needs proceed against thee to morrow.

Phil. If your lordship do so, I will have exceptionem forti; for you are not my competent judge.

Bonner. By what law canst thou refuse me to be thy judge?

Phil. By the civil law, De competente judice.

Bon. There is no such title in the law. In what book is it, as cunning a lawyer as you be?

Phil. My lord, I take upon me no great cunning in the law; but you drive me to my shifts for my defence, and I am sure, if I had the books of the law, I were able to shew what I say.

Bonner. What, De competente judice! I will go fetch thee my books. There is a title indeed, De officiis judicis Ordinarii.

Phil. Verily that is the same, De competente judice, which I have alleged.—With that he ran to his study, and brought the whole course of the law between his hands, which, as it might appear, he had well occupied, by the dust they were imbrued withal!

Bonner. There be the books: find it now, if thou canst, and I will promise to release thee out of prison.

Phil. My lord, I stand not here to reason matters of the civil law, although I am not altogether ignorant of the same, (for that I have been a student in the law six or seven years,) but to answer to the articles of faith, with the which you may lawfully accuse me. And whereas you go about unlawfully to proceed, I challenge, according to my knowledge, the benefit of the law in my defence.

Bonner. Why, thou wilt answer directly to nothing thou art charged withal; therefore say not hereafter but you might have been satisfied here by learned men, if you would have declared your mind.

Phil. My lord, I have declared my mind unto you and to other of the bishops at my last being with you, desiring you to be satisfied but of one thing, whereunto I have referred all other controversies; the which if your lordships now, or other learned men, can simply resolve me of, I am as contented to be reformable in all things as you shall require; the which is, to prove that the church of Rome (whereof you are) is the Catholic church.

Coven. Why, do you not believe your Creed, Credo Ecclesiam Catholicam?

Phil. Yes, that I do; but I cannot understand Rome to be the same, neither like to it.

S. As. It is most evident that St. Peter did build the catholic church at Rome; and Christ said, Tu es Petrus, et super hanc Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam. Moreover, the succession of bishops in the see of Rome can be proved from time to time, as it can be of none other place so well; which is a manifest probation of the Catholic church, as divers doctors do write.

Phil. That you would have to be undoubted, is most uncertain, and that by the authority which you allege of Christ, saying unto Peter, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, unless you can prove the rock to signify Rome, as you would make men falsely believe. And although you can prove the succession of bishops from Peter, yet this is not sufficient to prove Rome the Catholic church, unless you can prove the profession of Peter's faith, whereupon the Catholic church is builded, to have continued in his successors at Rome, and at this present to remain.

Bonner. Is there any more churches than one Catholic church? And I pray tell me into what faith were you baptized?

Phil. I acknowledge one holy Catholic and Apostolic church, whereof I am a member, I praise God, and am of that Catholic faith of Christ whereunto I was baptized.

Coven. I pray you, can you tell what this word Catholic doth signify? shew if you can.

Phil. Yes, that I can, I thank God: the Catholic faith, or the Catholic church, is not, as now-a-days the people be taught, that which is most universal, or of most part of men received, whereby you do infer our faith to hang upon the multitude, which is not so; but I esteem the Catholic church to be as St. Austin defineth the same: Æstimamus fidem Catholicam a rebus præcritis, præsentibus, et futuris: i. e. We judge, saith he, the Catholic faith, of that which hath been, is, and shall be. So that if you can be able to prove that your faith and church hath been from the beginning taught, and is, and shall be, then may you count yourselves catholic, otherwise not. And Catholic is a Greek word compounded of kata, which signifieth after or according, and ολον, a sum, or principal, or whole. So that Catholic church, or Catholic faith, is as much as to say the first, whole, sound, or chiefest, faith.

Bon. Doth St. Austin say so as he allegeth it? or doth he mean as he taketh the same? How say you, Mr. Curtop?

Curtop. Indeed, my lord, St. Augustin hath such a saying, speaking against the Donatists, that the Catholic faith ought to be esteemed of things in time past, and as they are practised according to the same, and ought to be through all ages, and not after a new manner, as the Donatists began to profess.

Phil. You have said well, Mr. Curtop, and after the meaning of St. Austin, and to confirm that which I have said for the signification of Catholic.

Coven. Let the book be seen, my lord.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord, be content, or in good faith I will break even off, and let all alone. Do you think the Catholic church (until it was within these few years, in the which a few upon singularity have swerved from the same,) have erred?

Phil. I do not think that the Catholic church can err in doctrine; but I require you to prove this church of Rome to be the Catholic church.

Curtop. I can prove that Ireneus (which was within an hundred years after Christ) came to Victor, then bishop of Rome, to ask his advice about the excommunication of certain heretics; the which he would not have done, by all likelihood, if he had not taken him to be supreme head.

Coven. Mark well this argument. How are you able to answer the same? answer, if you can.

Phil. It is soon answered, my lord, for that it is of no force; neither this fact of Ireneus maketh no more for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome than mine hath done, which have been at Rome as well as he, and might have spoken with the pope, if I had list; and yet I would none in England did favour his supremacy more than I.

S. As. You are the more to blame, by the faith of my body, for that you favour the same no better, since all the Catholic church, until these few years, have taken him to be the supreme head of the church, besides this good man Ireneus.

Phil. That is not likely, that Ireneus so took him, or the primitive church; for I am able to shew seven general councils after Ireneus' time, wherein he was never so taken; which may be a sufficient proof that the Catholic primitive church never took him for supreme head.

The other bishop. This man will never be satisfied, say what ye can. It is but folly to reason any more with him.

Phil. O my lords, would you have me satisfied with nothing? Judge, I pray you, who of us hath better authority, he which bringeth the example of one man going to Rome, or I that by these many general councils am able to prove that he was never so taken in many hundred years after Christ, as by Nicene, Ephesine, the first and second Chalcedon, Constantinopolitan, Carthaginense, Aquilense.

Coven. Why will you not admit the church of Rome to be the Catholic church?

Phil. Because it followeth not the primitive Catholic church, neither agreeth with the same, no more than an apple is like a nut.

Coven. Wherein doth it dissent?

Phil. It were too long to recite all, but two things I will name, the supremacy and transubstantiation.

Cur. As for transubstantiation, albeit it was set forth and decreed for an article of faith not much above 300 years, yet it was always believed in the church.

Bonner. Yea, that it was. Very well said of you, Mr. Curtop.

Phil. Ye have said right, that transubstantiation is but a late plantation of the bishop of Rome, and you are not able to shew any ancient writer, that the primitive church did believe any such thing.—And with this Curtop shrank away. And immediately after the ambassador of Spain came in, to whom my lord of London went, leaving the other with me. To whom I said, My lords, if you can shew me that this church of Rome (whereof you are members) is the true Catholic church, I shall be content to be one thereof, and as conformable to the same as you can require me in all things; for I know there is no salvation but within the church.

Coven. Can you disprove that the church of Rome is not the Catholic church?

Phil. Yea, that I am able; but I desire rather to hear of you for the proof thereof. And seeing I cannot have my request at your hands, neither be satisfied with any probable authority, I will shew you good proof why it is not. For if the primitive church were Catholic, (as it was indeed, and ought to be the form and schoolmistress of the church to the world's end,) then is not the church of Rome now the Catholic church, which dissenteth so far from the same both in doctrine and use of the sacraments.

Coven. How prove you that the church of Rome now dissenteth in doctrine and use of the sacraments from the primitive church?

Phil. Compare the one with the other, and it shall soon appear, as you may see both in Eusebius, and other ecclesiastical and ancient writers.

Coven. What have you to say more, why it is not the Catholic church?

Phil. Because it is not (by your interpretation of Catholic) universal, neither ever was, albeit you falsely persuade the people that it is so: for the world being divided into three parts, Asia, Africa, and Europe, two parts thereof, Asia and Africa, professing Christ as well as we, did never consent to the church of Rome, which is of Europe; which is a sufficient testimony that your faith was never universal.

Coven. How prove you that?

Phil. All the historiographers which write of the proceedings of the church, do testify the same. Besides that, this present time doth declare that to be true which I say; for at this present the church of Asia and Africa do not consent to the church of Rome. Yea, and besides all this, most part of Europe doth not agree, neither allow the church of Rome; as Germany, the kingdom of Denmark, the kingdom of Poland, a great part of France, England, and Zealand: which is a manifest proof that your church is not universal.

And after this the bishop of London called away the other bishops, and left with me divers gentlemen, with certain of his chaplains, as Dr. Saverson, an Englishman, which had proceeded doctor in Bononic, who discoursed with me on the same subject. And after this Dr. Story came in; to whom I said, Master doctor, you have done me great injury, and without law have straitly imprisoned me, more like a dog than a man; and besides this, you have not kept promise with me, for you promised that I should be judged the next day after.

Story. I am come now to keep promise with thee. Was there ever such a fantastical man as this is? nay, he is no man, he is a beast; yea, these heretics be worse than brute beasts: for they will, upon a vain singularity, take upon them to be wiser than all men, being indeed very fools and ass-heads, not able to maintain that which of an arrogant obstinacy they do stand in.

Phil. Master doctor, I am content to abide your railing judgment of me now; say what you will, I am content, for I am under your feet to be trodden on as you list. God forgive it you: yet I am no heretic. Neither you nor any other shall be able to prove that I hold any jot against the word of God, nor otherwise than a Christian man ought.

Story. The word of God! Forsooth, the word of God! It is but a folly to reason with these heretics, for they are incurable and desperate. But yet I may reason with thee, not that I have any hope to win thee: whom wilt thou appoint to judge of the word whereto thou standest?

Phil. Verily the word itself.

Story. Do you not see the ignorance of this beastly heretic? He willeth the word to be judged of the word. Can the word speak?

Phil. If I cannot prove that which I have said by good authority, I will be content to be counted an heretic and an ignorant person, and further what you please.

Story. Let us hear what wise authority thou canst bring in.

Phil. It is the saying of Christ in St. John, Verbum quod locutus sum judicabit in novissimo die. The word which I have spoken, saith Christ, shall judge in the last day. If the word shall judge in the last day, much more ought it to judge our doings now. And I am sure I have my Judge on my side, who shall absolve and justify me in another world: howsoever now it shall please you by authority unrighteously to judge me and others, sure I am in another world to judge you.

Story. What, you purpose to be a stinking martyr, and to sit in judgment with Christ at the last day to judge the twelve tribes of Israel!

Phil. Yea, sir, I doubt not thereof, having the promise of Christ, if I die for righteousness' sake, which you have begun to persecute in me.

Story. I told you it was but vain to argue with this heretic; he is drowned in his heresies without all learning.

Phil. Sir, I have brought you for that I have said good authority out of God's book, to the which you answer nothing, but go about still to give railing judgment against me without any cause.

Story. I will come to you by and by. When as the judge in Westminster-hall giveth sentence, doth the word give sentence, or the judge? tell me.

Phil. Civil matters be subject to civil men, and they have authority by the word to be judges of them. But the word of God is not subject to man's judgment, but ought to judge all the wisdom, thoughts, and doings, of men, and therefore your comparison disproveth nothing that I have said, neither answereth any whit thereto.

Story. Wilt thou not allow the interpretation of the church upon the scriptures?

Phil. Yes, if it be according to the word of the true church; and this I say to you, as I have said heretofore, that if you can prove the church of Rome, whereof ye are, to be the true Catholic church which I ought to follow, I will be as ready to yield thereto (as long as it can be so proved) as you may desire me.

Story. What a fellow is this! he will believe nothing but what he list himself. Are we not in possession of the church? Have not our forefathers these many hundred years taken this church for the Catholic church whereof we are now? And if we had none other proof but this, it were sufficient; for the prescription of time maketh a good title in the law.

Phil. You do well, master doctor, to allege prescription of many years, for it is all that you have to shew for yourselves. But you must understand, In divinis nulla occurrit prescriptio, that prescription hath no place in matters belonging unto God, as I am able to shew by the testimony of many doctors.

Story. Well, sir, you are like to go after your father, Latimer the sophister, and Ridley, who had nothing to allege for himself, but that he had learned his heresy of Cranmer. When I came to him with a poor bachelor of arts, he trembled as though he had had the palsy, as these heretics have always some token of fear whereby a man may know them, as you may see this man's eyes do tremble in his head. But I despatched them; and I tell thee, that there hath been yet never any one burnt, but I have spoken with him, and have been a cause of his despatch.

Phil. You have the more to answer for, Mr. doctor, as you shall feel in another world, how much soever you do now triumph of your proceedings.

Story. I tell thee I will never be confessed thereof. And because I cannot now tarry to speak with my lord, I pray one of you tell my lord, That my coming was to signify to his lordship, that he must out of hand rid this heretic out of the way. And going away, he said to me, I certify thee, that thou mayest thank none other man but me.

Phil. I thank you therefore with all mine heart, and God forgive it you.

Story. What, dost thou thank me? If I had thee in my study half an hour, I would make you sing another song.

Phil. No, master doctor, I stand upon too sure a ground to be overthrown by you now. And thus they departed all away from me one after another, until I was left all alone. And afterwards, with my keeper going to my coal-house, as I went I met with my lord of London, who spake unto me gently as he hath hitherto, in words, saying, Philpot, if there be any pleasure I may shew you in my house, I pray you require it, and you shall have it.

Phil. My lord, the pleasure that I will require of your lordship is, to hasten my judgment which is committed unto you, and to despatch me forth of this miserable world, unto my eternal rest. And for all this fair speech I cannot attain hitherto, this fortnight's space, neither fire nor candle, neither yet good lodging. But it is good for a man to be brought low in this world, and to be counted amongst the vilest, that he may in time of reward receive exaltation and glory. Therefore praised be God, that hath humbled me, and given me grace with gladness to be content therewithal. Let all that love the truth say, Amen.

The sixth Examination of John Philpot, had before the right honourable Lords, the Lord Chamberlain to the Queen's Majesty, the Viscount Hereford, commonly called Lord Ferras, the Lord Rich, the Lord S. John's, the Lord Windsor, the Lord Shandois, Sir John Bridport, Licutenant of the Tower, and two other more whose names are unknown, with the Bishop of London and Dr. Chedsey, the 6th day of November, anno 1555

Before that I was called afore the lords, and whiles they were in sitting down, the bishop of London came aside to me and whispered in mine ear, willing me to use myself before the lords of the queen's majesty's council prudently, and to take heed what I said; and thus he pretended to give me counsel, because he wished me to do well, as I might now do if I list. And after the lords and other worshipful gentlemen of the queen's majesty's servants were set, my lord of London placed himself at the end of the table, and called me to him, and by the lords I was placed at the upper end against him; where I kneeling down, the lords commanded me to stand up, and after in this manner the bishop began to speak.

London. Mr. Philpot, I have heretofore both privately myself, and openly before the lords of the clergy, more times than once caused you to be talked withal to reform you of your errors, but I have not found you yet so tractable as I would wish: wherefore now I have desired these honourable lords of the temporality, and of the queen's majesty's council, who have taken pains with me this day (I thank them therefore) to hear you what you can say, that they may be judges whether I have sought all means to do you good or no; and I dare be bold to say in their behalf, that if you shew yourself conformable to the queen's majesty's proceedings, you shall find as much favour for your deliverance as you can wish. I speak not this to fawn upon you, but to bring you home into the church: now let them hear what you can say.

Phil. My lord, I thank God this day, that I have such an honourable audience to declare my mind before. And I cannot but commend your lordship's equity in this behalf, which agreeth with the order of the primitive church, which was, if any body had been suspected of heresy, as I am now, he should be called first before the archbishop or bishop of the diocese where he was suspected; secondly, in the presence of others his fellow-bishops and learned elders; and thirdly, in hearing of the laity; where, after the judgment of God's word declared, and with the assent of our bishops and consent of the people, he was condemned for an heretic, or absolved. And the second point of that good order I have found at your lordship's hands already, in being called before you and your fellow-bishops, and now have the third sort of men, at whose hands I trust to find more righteousness in my cause than I have found with my lords of the clergy: God grant I may have at last the judgment of God's word concerning the same.

Lon. Mr. Philpot, I pray you, ere you go any further, tell my lords here plainly whether you were by me, or by my procurement, committed to prison or not, and whether I have shewed you any cruelty sithen ye have been committed to my prison.

Phil. If it shall please your lordship to give me leave to declare forth my matter, I will touch that afterward.

Rich. Answer first of all to my lord's two questions, and then proceed forth to the matter. How say you, were you imprisoned by my lord, or no? can you find any fault since with his cruel using of you?

Phil. I cannot lay to my lord's charge the cause of mine imprisonment, neither may I say that he hath used me cruelly; but rather for my part I may say, that I have found more gentleness at his lordship's hands than I did at mine own ordinary's for the time I have been within his prison, for that he hath called me three or four times to mine answer, to the which I was not called in a year and a half before.

Rich. Well, now go to your matter.

Phil. The matter is, that I am imprisoned for the dispu-tations had by me in the convocation-house against the sacrament of the altar, which matter was not moved principally by me, but by the prolocutor, with the consent of the queen's majesty, and of the whole house, and that house being a member of the parliament-house, ought to be a place of free speech for all men of the house, by the ancient and laudable custom of this realm. Wherefore I think myself to have sustained hitherto great injury for speaking my conscience freely in such a place, as I might lawfully do it: and I desire your honourable lordships' judgment, which be of the parliament-house, whether of right I ought to be impeached therefore, and sustain the loss of my living, as I have done, and moreover of my life, as it is sought.

Rich. You are deceived herein: for the convocation-house is no part of the parliament-house.

Phil. My lord, I have always understood the contrary by such as are more expert in things of this realm than I; and again, the title of every act leadeth me to think otherwise, which allegeth the agreement of the spirituality and temporality assembled together.

Rich. Yea, that is meant of the spiritual lords of the upper house.

Windsor. Indeed the convocation-house is called together by one writ of the summons of the parliament of an old custom; notwithstanding, that house is no part of the parliament-house.

Phil. My lords, I must be contented to abide your judgment in this behalf.

Rich. We have told you the truth. Marry yet we would not that you should be troubled for any thing that there was spoken, so that you, having spoken amiss, do declare now that you are sorry therefore.

Lon. My lords, he hath spoken there manifest heresy, yea, and there stoutly maintained the same against the blessed sacrament of the altar, (and with that he put off his cap, that all the lords might reverence and vail their bonnets at that idol as he did,) and would not allow the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the same: yet, my lords, God forbid that I should go about to shew him extremity for so doing, in case he will repent and revoke his wicked sayings; and if, in faith, he will so do, with your lordships' consent, he shall be released by and by; if he will not, he shall have the extremity of the law, and that shortly.

Chamb. My lord of London speaketh reasonably unto you: take it whiles it is offered you.

Rich. How say you? will you acknowledge the real presence of the body and blood of Christ, as all the learned men of this realm do, in the mass, and as I do, and will believe as long as I live, I do protest it?

Phil. My lord, I do acknowledge in the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ such a presence as the word of God doth allow and teach me.

Rich. That shall be no otherwise than you list.

Lon. A sacrament is a sign of a holy thing; so that there is both the sign which is the accident, (as the whiteness, roundness, and shape, of bread,) and there is also the thing itself, as very Christ, both God and man. But these heretics will have the sacraments to be but bare signs. How say you? declare unto my lords here whether you do allow the thing itself in the sacrament or no.

Phil. I do confess, that in the Lord's supper there is in due respects both the sign and the thing signified, when it is duly ministered after the institution of Christ.

Lon. You may see how he goeth about the bush, as he hath done before with my lords of the clergy, and dare not utter his mind plainly.

Rich. Shew us what manner of presence you allow in the sacrament.

Phil. If it please you, my lord of London, to give me leave to proceed orderly thereunto, and to let me declare my mind without interruption, I will thoroughly open my mind therein.

Shand. I pray you, my lord, let him speak his mind.

Phil. My lord, that at the first I have not plainly declared my judgment unto you, the reason is this, because I cannot speak hereof without the danger of my life.

Rich. There is none of us here that seeketh thy life, or means to take any advantage of that thou shalt speak.

Phil. Although I mistrust not your honourable lordships that be here of the temporality, yet here is one that sitteth against me (pointing to my lord of London) that will lay it to my charge even to the death. Notwithstanding, seeing your honours do require me to declare my mind of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, that ye may perceive that I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, neither do maintain any opinion without probable and sufficient authority of the scripture, I will shew you frankly my mind without all colour, whatsoever shall ensue unto me therefore, so that my lord of London will not let me to utter my mind.

Rich. My lord, permit him to say what he can, seeing he is willing to shew his mind.

Lon. I am content, my lords; let him say what he can, I will hear him.

Phil. That which I do intend to speak unto you, right honourable lords, I do protest here, first before God and his angels, that I speak it not of vain-glory, neither of singularity, neither of wilful stubbornness, but truly upon a good conscience, grounded on God's word, against the which I dare not do for fear of damnation, which will follow that which is done contrary to knowledge. Neither do I disagree to the proceedings of this realm in the religion, for that I love not the queen, (whom I love from the bottom of my heart,) but because I ought to love and fear God in his word more than man in his laws, though I stand as I seem to do in this consideration, and for none other, as God I call to witness.

There be two things, principally, by the which the elergy at this day doth deceive the whole realm; that is, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the name of the Catholic church; the which both they do usurp, having indeed none of them both. And as touching their sacrament, which they term of the altar, I say now, as I said in the convocation-house, that is not the sacrament of Christ, neither in the same is there any manner of Christ's presence. Wherefore they deceive the queen's majesty, and you of the nobility of this realm, in making you to believe that to be a sacrament which is none, and cause you to commit manifest idolatry in worshipping that for God which is no god. And in testimony of this to be true, besides manifest proof which I am able to make to the queen's majesty and to all you of her nobility, I will yield my life. The which to do, if it were not upon a sure ground, it were to my utter damnation.

And where they take on them the name of the Catholic church, (whereby they blind many folks' eyes,) they are nothing so, calling you from the true religion which was revealed and taught in king Edward's time, unto vain superstition. And this I will say for the trial hereof, that if they can prove themselves to be the Catholic church (as they shall never be able to do) I will never be against their doings, but revoke all that I have said. And I shall desire you, my lords, to be a mean for me to the queen's majesty, that I may be brought to the just trial hereof. Yea, I will not refuse to stand against ten of the best of them in this realm; and if they be able to prove otherwise than I have said, either by writing or by reasoning, with good and lawful authority, I will here promise to recant whatsoever I have said, and to consent to them in all points.—And in the declaration of these things more at large, which now I write in sum, the bishop of London eftsoons would have interrupted me, but the lords procured me liberty to make out my tale, to the great grief of the lord bishop of London, as it appeared by the dumps he was in.

Lon. It hath been told me before that you love to make a long tale.

Rich. All hereties do boast of the Spirit of God, and every one would have a church by himself; as Joan of Kent and the Anabaptists. I had myself Joan of Kent a seven-night in my house after the writ was out for her to be burnt, where my lord of Canterbury and bishop Ridley resorted almost daily unto her: but she was so high in the Spirit, that they could do nothing with her for all their learning. But she went wilfully unto the fire, was burnt; and so do you now.

Phil. As for Joan of Kent, she was a vain woman, (I knew her well,) and an heretic indeed, well worthy to be burnt, because she stood against one of the manifest articles of our faith, contrary to the scriptures; and such vain spirits be soon known from the true Spirit of God and his church, for that the same abideth within the limits of God's word, and will not go out of the same, neither stubbornly maintain any thing contrary to the word; as I have God's word thoroughly on my side to shew for that I stand in.

Lon. I pray you, how will you join me these two scriptures together, Pater major me est: et Pater et ego unum sumus. I must interpret the same, because my lords here understand not the Latin, that is to say, The Father is greater than I; and, I and the Father are one. But I cry you merey, my lords, I have mis-spoken in saying you understand no Latin, for the most part of you understand Latin as well as I: but I speak in consideration of my lord Shandois and Mr. Bridges his brother, whom I take to be no great Latin men. Now shew your cunning, and join these two scriptures by the word if you can.

Phil. Yes, that I can right well: for we must understand that in Christ there be two natures, the divinity and humanity, and in respect of his humanity it is spoken of Christ, The Father is greater than I: but in respect of his deity he said again, The Father and I be one.

Lon. But what scripture have you?

Phil. Yes, I have sufficient scripture for the proof of that I have said. For the first, it is written of Christ in the Psalms, Diminuisti eum paulo minus ab angelis: Thou hast made him a little lesser than angels. It is the 15th Psalm, beginning Cæli enarrant. And there I mis-reckoned; wherewithal my lord took me.

Lon. It is in Domine Dominus noster. Ye may see, my lords, how well this man is used to say his matins.

Phil. Though I say not matins in such order as your lordship meaneth, yet I remember of old that Domine Dominus noster, and Cæli enarrant, be not far asunder; and albeit I misnamed the Psalm, it is no prejudice to the truth that I have proved.

Lon. What say you then to the second scripture? how couple you that by the word to the other?

Phil. The text itself declareth, that notwithstanding Christ did abase himself in our human nature, yet he is still one in deity with the Father. And this St. Paul to the Hebrews doth more at large set forth. And as I have by the scriptures joined these two scriptures together, so am I able to do in all other articles of faith which we ought to believe, and by the manifest word of God to expound them.

Lon. How can that be, seeing St. Paul saith, That the letter killeth, but it is the Spirit that giveth life.

Phil. St. Paul meaneth not the word of God written, in itself killeth, which is the word of life, and faithful testimony of the Lord; but that the word is unprofitable, and killeth him that is void of the Spirit of God, although he be the wisest man of the world; and therefore St. Paul saith, That the gospel to some was a savour of life unto life, and to other a savour of death unto death. Also an example hereof we have in the sixth of John, of them who hearing the word of God without the Spirit were offended thereby; wherefore Christ said, The flesh profiteth nothing, it is the Spirit that quickeneth.

Lon. What, do you understand that of St. Paul and St. John so?

Phil. It is not mine own interpretation, it is agreeable to the word in other places, and I have learned the same of ancient fathers interpreting it likewise. And to the Corinthians it is written, Animalis homo non percipit ea quæ sunt Spiritus Dei; spiritualis dijudicat omnia: The natural man perceiveth not the things that be of the Spirit of God; but the spiritual man which is endued with the Spirit judgeth all things.

Lon. You see, my lords, that this man will have his own mind, and will wilfully cast away himself. I am sorry for him.

Phil. The words that I have spoken be none of mine, but the gospel, whereon I ought to stand. And if you, my lord of London, can bring better authority for the faith you will draw me unto, than that which I stand upon, I will gladly hear the same by you, or by any other in this realm.

Wherefore I kneeling down, besought the lords to be good unto me, a poor gentleman, that would fain live in the world if I might, and testify as you have heard me to say this day, that if any man can prove that I ought to be of any other manner of faith than that of which I am now, and can prove the same sufficiently, I will be neither wilful, neither desperate, as my lord of London would make you believe me to be.

Rich. What countryman be you? are ye of the Philpots of Hampshire?

Phil. Yea, my lord, I was sir P. Philpot's son of Hampshire.

Rich. He is my near kinsman; wherefore I am the more sorry for him.

Phil. I thank your lordship that it pleaseth you to challenge kindred of a poor prisoner.

Rich. In faith I would go an hundred miles on my bare feet to do you good.

Cham. He may do well enough if he list.

St. John. Mr. Philpot, you are my countryman, and I would be glad you should do well.

Rich. You said even now, that you would desire to maintain your belief before ten of the best in the realm. You did not well to compare with the nobility of the realm. But what if you have ten of the best in the realm to hear you, will you be tried by them?

Phil. My lord, your lordship mistaketh me to think that I challenge ten of the best of the nobility of this realm. It was no part of my mind: but I meant, of the best learned on the contrary side.

Rich. Well, I take your meaning. What if means be made to the queen's majesty, that you shall have your request, will you be judged by them?

Phil. My lord, it is not meet that a man should be judged by his adversaries.

Rich. By whom then would you be judged?

Phil. I will make your honours judges, that shall be hearers of us.

Rich. I dare be bold to procure for you of the queen's majesty, that you shall have ten learned men to reason with you, and twenty or forty of the nobility to hear, so you will promise to abide their judgment. How say you, will you promise here afore my lords so to do?

Phil. I will be contented to be judged by them.

Rich. Yea, but will you promise to agree to their judgment?

Phil. There be causes why I may not so do, unless I were sure they would judge according to the word of God.

Rich. O, I perceive you will have no man judge but yourself, and think yourself wiser than all the learned men in this realm.

Phil. My lord, I seek not to be mine own judge, but am content to be judged by others, so that the order of judgment in matters of religion be kept that was in the primitive church, which is, first, that God's will by his word was sought, and thereunto both the spirituality and temporality was gathered together, and gave their consent and judgment; and such kind of judgment I will stand to.

Lon. My lords, he would make you believe that he was profoundly seen in ancient writers of the judgments of the primitive church, and there was never any such manner of judgment used as he now talketh of.

Phil. In the epistle of St. Cyprian I am able to shew it you.—Lon. Ah, I tell you there is no such thing; fetch me Cyprian hither.

Phil. You shall find it otherwise when the book cometh. And Dr. Chedsey, his chaplain, whom he appointed to fetch his book, whispered the bishop in his ear, and fetched not the book; by likelihood that he should have sustained the reproach thereof, if the book had been fetched. Well, my lord, (quoth I,) Mr. Doetor knoweth it is so, or else he would have fetched the book ere this.

Rich. You would have none other judge, I see, but the word.

Phil. Yes, my lord; I will be tried by the word, and by such as will judge according to the word. As for an example, if there were a controversy between your lordship and another upon the words of a statute, must not the words of the statute judge and determine the controversy?

Rich. No, marry, the judges of the law may determine of the meaning thereof.

Lon. He hath brought as good an example against himself as can be.

And here the bishop thought he had good handfast against me, and therefore enlarged it with many words to the judgment of the church.

The Lords. He hath overthrown himself by his own argument.

Phil. My lords, it seemeth to your honours that you have great advantage of me, by the example I brought in to express my cause; but if it be pondered thoroughly, it maketh wholly with me, and nothing against me, as my lord of London hath pretended. For I will ask of my lord Rich here, whom I know to have good knowledge in the laws and statutes of this realm, albeit a judge may discern the meaning of a statute agreeable to the words, whether the same may judge a meaning contrary to the express words or no?

Rich. He cannot so do.

Phil. Even so say I, that no man ought to judge the word of God to have a meaning contrary to the express words thereof, as this false church of Rome doth in many things. And with this the lords seemed to be satisfied, and made no further replication herein.

Rich. I marvel then why you do deny the express words of Christ in the sacrament, saying, "This is my body," and yet you will not stick to say it is not his body. Is not God omnipotent? and is not he able as well by his omnipotency to make it his body as he was to make man flesh of a piece of clay? Did not he say, "This is my body which shall be betrayed for you?" and was not his very body betrayed for us?—Therefore it must needs be his body.

Lon. My lord Rich, you have said wonderful well and learnedly. But you might have begun with him before also in the 6th of John, where Christ promised to give his body in the sacrament of the altar, saying, Panis quem ego dabo caro mea est: The bread which I will give is my flesh. How can you answer to that?

Phil. If it please you to give me leave to answer first my lord Rich, I will also answer this objection.

Rich. Answer my lord of London first, and after come to me.

Phil. My lord of London may be soon answered, that the saying of St. John is, that the humanity of Christ, which he took upon him for the redemption of man, is the bread of life, whereby our bodies and souls be sustained to eternal life, of the which the sacramental bread is a lively representation and an effectual coaptation to all such as believe on his passion.—And as Christ saith in the same 6th of John, "I am the bread that came down from heaven;" but yet he is not material, neither natural, bread. Likewise the bread is his flesh, not natural or substantial, but by signification, and by grace in the sacrament.

And now to my lord Rich's argument: I do not deny the express words of Christ in the sacrament, "This is my body;" but I deny that they are naturally and corporally to be taken: they must be taken sacramentally and spiritually, according to the express declaration of Christ, saying, that the words of the sacrament which the Capernaïtes took carnally, as the Papists do now, ought to be taken spiritually, and not carnally, as they falsely imagine, not weighing what interpretation Christ hath made in this behalf, neither following the institution of Christ, neither the use of the apostles and of the primitive church, who never taught, neither declared, any such carnal manner of presence as is now exacted of us violently, without any ground of scripture or antiquity, who used to put out of the church all such as did not receive the sacrament with the rest, and also to burn that which was left after the receiving, as by the canon of the apostles and by the decree of the council of Antioch may appear.

Lon. No, that is not so; they were only Catechumeni which went out of the church at the celebration of the communion, and none other.

Phil. It was not only of such as were novices in faith, but all others that did not receive.

Lon. What say you to the omnipotency of God? Is not he able to perform that which he spake, as my lord Rich hath very well said? I tell thee, that God by his omnipotency may make himself to be this carpet, if he will.

Phil. As concerning the omnipotency of God, I say that God is able to do, as the prophet David saith, whatever he willet; but he willet nothing that is not agreeable to his word; as that is blasphemy which my lord of London hath spoken, that God may become a carpet. For as I have learned of ancient writers, Non potest Deus facere quæ sunt naturæ contraria: that is, God cannot do that which is contrary to his nature; as it is contrary to the nature of God to be a carpet. A carpet is a creature, and God is the Creator: and the Creator cannot be the creature. Wherefore, unless you can declare by the word, that Christ is otherwise present with us, than spiritually and sacramentally by grace, as he hath taught us, you pretend the omnipotency of God in vain.

After this, Mr. Philpot was obliged to undergo seven tedious public examinations, in all of which he confounded his adversaries, who could not resist the wisdom by which he spoke.

The bishops waxing now weary, and being not able by any sufficient ground, either of God's word or of the true ancient Catholic fathers, to convince and overcome him, fell by fair and flattering speech to persuade with him, promising that if he would revoke his opinions, and come home again to their Romish and Babylonical church, he should not only be pardoned that which was past, but also they would with all favour and cheerfulness of heart receive him again as a true member thereof. Which words when Bonner saw would take no place, he demanded of Mr. Philpot (and that with a charitable affection I warrant you) whether he had any just cause to allege why he should not condemn him as an heretic? Well, quoth Mr. Philpot, your idolatrous sacrament which you have found out, ye would fain defend, but ye cannot, nor ever shall.

In the end, the bishop seeing his unmoveable steadfastness in the truth, did pronounce openly the sentence of condemnation against him. And coming to these words, Teque etiam tanquam hæreticum, obstinatum, pertinacem, et impenitentem, &c. Mr. Philpot said, I thank God that I am an heretic out of your cursed church: I am no heretic before God. But God bless you, and give you once grace to repent your wicked doings, and let all men beware of your bloody church.

Moreover, whiles Bonner was about the midst of the sentence, the bishop of Bath pulled him by the sleeve, and said, My lord, my lord, know of him first whether he will recant or no. Then Bonner said, (full like himself,) O let him alone; and so read forth the sentence.

And when he had done, he delivered him to the sheriffs; and so two officers brought him through the bishop's house into Paternoster-row, and there his servant met him, and when he saw him, he said, Ah! dear master.

Then Mr. Philpot said to his man, Content thyself, I shall do well enough; for thou shalt see me again.

And so the officers thrust him away, and had his master to Newgate; and as he went he said to the people, Ah! good people, blessed be God for this day! And so the officers delivered him to the keeper. Then his man thrust to go in after his master, and one of the officers said unto him, Hence, fellow, what wouldest thou have? And he said, I would go speak with my master. Mr. Philpot then turned him about, and said to him, To-morrow thou shalt speak with me.

Then the under-keeper said to Mr. Philpot, Is this your man? And he said, Yea. So he did license his man to go in with him, and Mr. Philpot and his man were turned into a little chamber on the right hand, and there remained some time, until Alexander, the chief-keeper, did come unto him; who at his entering greeted him with these words, Ah, said he, hast not thou done well to bring thyself hither! Well, said Mr. Philpot, I must be content, for it is God's appointment; and I shall desire you to let me have your gentle favour, for you and I have been of old acquaintance. Well, said Alexander, I will shew thee gentleness and favour, so thou wilt be ruled by me. Then said Mr. Philpot, I pray you shew me what you would have me to do.

He said, If you would recant, I will shew you any pleasure I can. Nay, said Mr. Philpot, I will never recant whilst I have my life that which I have spoken, for it is most certain truth, and in witness hercof I will seal it with my blood. Then Alexander said, This is the saying of the whole pack of you heretics. Whereupon he commanded him to be set upon the block, and as many irons upon his legs as he could bear, for that he would not follow his wicked mind.

Then the clerk told Alexander in his ear, that Mr. Philpot had given his man money. And Alexander said to his man, What money hath thy master given thee? He answered, My master hath given me none. No, said Alexander, hath he given thee none? That will I know, for I will search thee. Do with me what you list, and search me all that you can, quoth his servant; he hath given me a token or two to send to his friends, as to his brother and sisters. Ah, said Alexander unto Mr. Philpot, thou art a maintainer of heretics; thy man should have gone to some of thine affinity, but he shall be known well enough. Nay, said Mr. Philpot, I do send it to my friends; there he is, let him make answer to it. But, good Mr. Alexander, be so much my friend that these irons may be taken off. Well, said Alexander, give me my fees, and I will take them off; if not, thou shalt wear them still. Then said Mr. Philpot, Sir, what is your fee? He said, Four pounds was his fees. Ah, said Mr. Philpot, I have not so much; I am but a poor man, and I have been long in prison. What wilt thou give me then? said Alexander. Sir, said he, I will give you twenty shillings, and that I will send my man for, or else I will lay my gown to gage; for the time is not long, I am sure, that I shall be with you; for the bishop said unto me that I should be soon despatched.

Then said Alexander unto him, What is that to me? And with that he departed from him, and commanded him to be had into limbo, and so his commandment was fulfilled; but before he could be taken from the block, the clerk would have a groat.

Then one Witterence, steward of the house, took him on his back, and carried him down, his man knew not whither. Wherefore Mr. Philpot said to his man, Go to Mr. Sheriff, and shew him how I am used, and desire Mr. Sheriff to be good unto me. And so his servant went straightway, and took an honest man with him.

And when they came to Mr. Sheriff, and shewed him how Mr. Philpot was handled in Newgate; the sheriff hearing this, took his ring from off his finger, and delivered it unto that honest man which came with Mr. Philpot's man, and bade him go unto Alexander, the keeper, and command him to take off his irons, and to handle him more gently, and to give his man again that which he had taken from him. And when they came again to the said Alexander, and told their message from the sheriff, Alexander took the ring, and said, Ah, I perceive that Mr. Sheriff is a bearer with him, and all such heretics as he is: therefore to-morrow I will shew it to his betters. Yet at ten of the clock he went into Mr. Philpot where he lay, and took off his irons, and gave him such things as he had taken before from his servant.

Upon Tuesday at supper, being the 17th day of December, there came a messenger from the sheriffs, and bade Mr. Philpot make him ready, for the next day he should suffer, and be burned at a stake with fire. Mr. Philpot answered and said, I am ready: God grant me strength, and a joyful resurrection. And so he went into his chamber, and poured out his spirit unto the Lord God, giving him most hearty thanks that he of his mercy had made him worthy to suffer for his truth.

In the morning the sheriffs came according to the order, about eight of the clock, and called for him, and he most joyfully came down unto them. And there his man did meet him, and said, Ah, dear master, farewell. His master said unto him, Serve God, and he will help thee. And so he went with the sheriffs to the place of execution; and when he was entering into Smithfield, the way was foul, and two officers took him up to bear him to the stake. Then he said merrily, What, will ye make me a pope? I am content to go to my journey's end on foot. But first coming into Smithfield, he kneeled down there, saying these words, I will pay my vows in thee, O Smithfield. And when he was come to the place of suffering, he kissed the stake, and said, Shall I disdain to suffer at this stake, seeing my Redeemer did not refuse to suffer the most vile death upon the cross for me? And then with an obedient heart full meekly he said the 106th, 107th, and 108th Psalms; and when he had made an end of all his prayers, he said to the officers, What have you done for me? and every one of them declared what they had done; and he gave to each of them a piece of money.

Then they bound him to the stake, and set fire unto this faithful martyr; who the 18th day of December, in the midst of the fiery flames, yielded his soul into the hands of Almighty God.

Some time after Mr. Philpot's martyrdom, a woman was taken up, and brought before Bonner, for asserting that Mr. Philpot was a true servant of God, and that Bonner was his murderer. On her promise that she would appear before him, at a time which he appointed, he dismissed her for the present. The good woman having luckily escaped from the fangs of this merciless wolf, took care to keep at a distance, and instead of appearing at the appointed time, wrote the bishop the following letter, with which the reader will be undoubtedly pleased, notwithstanding its honest bluntness.

A REPROVING LETTER TO BONNER.

"Woe be unto the idolatrous shepherds of England, that feed themselves, should not the shepherds feed the flock? But ye have eaten the fat, ye have clothed you with the wool; the best fed have ye slain, but the flock have ye not nourished; the weak have ye not holpen up, the sick have ye not healed, the broken have ye not bound together, the outcasts have ye not brought again, the lost have ye not sought, but churlishly and cruelly have ye ruled them, Ezek. xxxiv.

"Forasmuch, my lord, as my business is such that I cannot come to your lordship, according to my promise, I have been so bold to write these few words unto you, partly to excuse mine absence, and partly to answer your lordship's demands at my last most happy departure from you. As touching the breach of my promise with you, in not coming again at the hour appointed, your lordship shall understand that I take the counsel of the angel, which warned the wise men not to come again to Herod according to their promise, but to turn home again another way. Now, my lord, I perceiving your lordship to be a more cruel tyrant than ever was Herod, and more desirous to destroy Christ in his poor members than ever he was, which to destroy Christ killed his own son, I thought good to take the angel's counsel, and to come no more at you; for I see that you are set all in a rage like a ravening wolf against the poor lambs of Christ, appointed to the slaughter for the testimony of the truth. Indeed you are called the common cut-throat, and general slaughter-slave, to all the bishops of England; and therefore it is wisdom for me, and all other simple sheep of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's stall, as long as we can: especially seeing that you have such store already, that you are not able to drink all their blood, lest you should break your belly; and therefore let them lie still and die for hunger. Therefore, my lord, I thought it good to tarry a time, until your lordship's stomach were come to you a little better; for I do perceive, by your great fat cheeks, that you lack no lamb's flesh yet, and belike you are almost glutted with supping so much blood, and therefore you will let some of the leanest die in prison, which will then be meat good enough for your barking beagles, Harpsfield and his fellows: but yet, my lord, it were a great deal more for your lordship's honour, if your chaplains might have the meat roasted in Smithfield, at the fire of the stake, yea, and when it is something fat and fair-liking; for now they have nothing but skin and bones, and if the dogs come hastily to it, they may chauce shortly to be choked, and then your hunting will be hindered greatly, if it be not altogether marred. I hear say, my lord, that some of the butcherly curs came of late to my house to seek their prey, and that they go round about the city (as David saith) grinning and grudging that they have not meat enough. Therefore belike they have killed my poor brethren and sisters that have lain so long upon their butcherly stall, and eaten them up: for I hear say their friends could not be suffered to see them these three days and more. Therefore I perceive now, that if I had come again according to my promise, your lordship, like a ravening wolf, or else some of your hell-hounds, would quickly have worried me: but I see well my appointed time is not yet come, therefore I will yet live and thank Him for my deliverance with continual songs of laud and praise.— Thus have I been bold to trouble your lordship with telling you the truth, and the very cause that I came not to you again according to my unpurposed promise. I trust your lordship will take this in good part, and accept it as a lawful excuse, and not doubting but your lordship would have done the like if you had been in my case.

“Now as concerning the second part that caused me to write unto your lordship, which is to answer unto your subtle or rather cruel demand of my judgment of the death of that blessed martyr of Christ Jesus, good Mr. John Philpot, I will answer your lordship simply and plainly, what peril soever shall come thereof. Truly, my lord, I do not only think, but I am also most certain and sure, that he as a very man of God died a true martyr and constant confessor of his dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom he did most faithfully commit his sweet soul, who will surely keep the same with him in joy for evermore. Also, my lord, I do verily believe and know that your lordship hath committed an horrible and most cruel murder in the unjust condemning and killing of him, and that you shall make as heavy an account for his blood, which shortly shall be required at your hand, as ever your great-grandfather, cruel Cain, did or shall do for his innocent brother Abel. Moreover, because I am credibly informed that your lordship doth believe, and have in secret said, that there is no hell, I certify you that your lordship did never any thing in all your life that so much did redound to your lordship's dishonour, and perpetual shame and infamy, as your killing the body of this blessed prophet doth; especially seeing that he was none of your diocese, nor had offended any of your lordship's devilish and cruel laws. Verily I hear almost every body say, in all places where I come, that your lordship is made the common slaughter-slave to all your fellow bite-sheep, bishops I would say; yea, the very papists themselves begin now to abhor your blood-thirstiness, and speak shame of your ty-ramy. Like tyranny! believe me, my lord, every child that can any whit speak, can call upon you by your name, and say, “Bloody Bonner is bishop of London,” and every man hath it as perfectly upon his finger's end, as his Pater-noster, how many you for your part have burned with fire, and furnished in prison; they say the whole sum surmounteth to forty persons within this three-quarters of this year. Therefore, my lord, though your lordship believeth that there is neither heaven nor hell, nor God nor devil; yet if your lordship love your own honesty, (which was lost long ago,) you were best to surcease from this cruel burning of true Christian men, and also from murdering of some in prison; for that indeed offendeth men's minds most; yea, even your old friends the rankest Papists that be. For, say they, Felix, the heathen ruler, did not forbid Paul's friends to visit him in prison, and to bring him necessary relief; and therefore it is a very great shame and sin, to see a bishop that beareth the name of a Christian, to be more cruel upon his poor brethren than an heathen, Turk, or infidel.

“This is men's sayings in every place, not only of this realm, but also of the most part of the world, and the common talk they have of your lordship: therefore I thought to be so bold with your lordship, as to tell you of it, though perchance you will give me but small thanks for my labour. Well, as for that, I put it to your lordship's choice, for I have as much already as I look for. Finally, my lord, I will give you to understand, that the death of this constant martyr and valiant soldier of Jesus Christ hath given a greater shake towards the overthrowing of your papistical kingdom, than you shall be ever able to recover again these seven years, do the best you can, and set as many crafty daubers to patch it up with untempered clay as you will; yea, though prating Pendleton, that wicked apostate, apply all his wily wits to help them. Verily, my lord, by all men's reports, his blessed life could never have done the like sorrow to Satan's synagogue, whereof some say your lordship is a mighty member, as his happy death hath done. You have broken a pot indeed, but the precious word contained therein is so notably therewithal shed abroad, that the sweet savour thereof hath wonderfully well refreshed all the true household or congregation of Christ, that they cannot abide any more the stinking savour of your filthy ware that came from the dunghill of Rome, though your lordship's Judases do set them to sale every where to fill your bags. I put your lordship out of doubt, that if you do break any more such pots, you will mar your own market altogether: for I promise you, most men begin to mislike your devilish doings, and wonderfully to loath your Popish pedlarly wares.

“Thus have I (according to your lordship's commandments) shewed you simply what I think of that good man's death, whose blood crieth for vengeance against your lordship's butcherly bloody proceedings in the ears of the Lord of hosts, who will shortly revenge the same upon your pilled pate, and upon the rest of all your poll-shorn brethren, the very marked cattle of the great Antichrist of Rome. The measure of his iniquity is filled up to the brim, therefore will God shortly pour in double unto your deserved destruction. And then I shall rejoice, when your new-made proselytes will be glad to cover their crowns with a cow-t—(saving your lordship's reverence, I should have said first.) Well, I rather desire their conversion than confusion: the Lord send the one of them shortly, as may be most to his glory, Amen.

“I signify also unto your lordship, that the railing words which your lying preacher shewed forth of his filthy fountain, upon Sunday, against the dear servant of God, good Mr. Philpot, do greatly redound to your lordship's dishonesty, and much deface your spiritual honour. Verily, I see the great wrath of God hath so blinded your eyes, that you see not what is with you, or what is against you, but still you vomit out your own shame, and make all the world wonder upon you. Was it not enough for you to condemn him most unjustly, yea, contrary to your own laws, and to kill his innocent body most tyrannously, but you must also set a lying limb of the devil to blaspheme, slander, and belie him, now he is dead! O, viperous generation, seed of the serpent, and right children of the devil! full well do you counterfeit your father's steps, whom Christ calleth a murderer and a liar from the beginning; which two things be the only weapons of your war, wherewith you maintain all your mischief, that is to say, lying and murder; for those whom ye cannot overcome with your lying persuasions, them you kill most cruelly, and then blaspheme and belie them with railing sentences when they are dead. But all this will not blind the people of God, nor yet make them any whit the less believe the truth, nor abate their love from the true preachers thereof, yea, it is a true sign and a token that they are the very disciples of Christ; for he hath said, "Blessed are ye when men revile you, and say all manner of evil sayings against you, for my name's sake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven." And doubtless great is the good man's reward in heaven by this time, as your lordship's damnation shall be great in hell, except you repent and surcease from shedding innocent blood.—But it is to be feared your heart is hardened as Pharaoh's was, seeing that with Judas ye have sold and betrayed your Master. Take heed, my lord, lest you come to the same end, or a worse, than he did: for, verily, I cannot perceive how you should escape it long; therefore say not but a woman gave you warning, if you list to take it. And as for the obtaining of your Popish purpose in suppressing the truth, I put you out of doubt, you shall not obtain it so long as you go this way to work as ye do; for verily I believe that you have lost the hearts of 20,000 that were rank Papists within this twelve months.

"It is found very true what one holy doctour saith, The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the gospel; when one is put to death, a thousand doth rise for him." And that this is true, you may well perceive by the hearty love that the people shewed unto good Mr. Philpot at his going to death. They went not about to make an idol of him, as your adders-brood would bear men in hand; but they worshipped God, which gave such strength to his dear child, to die so constantly for the testimony of his truth, unto the utter destruction of that detestable idolatry which your lordship doth most devilishly maintain with the force of fire, faggots, and sword: yea, and rather than fail, to famish men in prison again, as ye have done already. It is reported of your own tormentors, that the six prisoners that you have in your prison, be put in six several places all the day, and every night brought together, and set in the stocks. Forsooth, my lord, this doth get you a foul name all abroad the country, and yet all will not help your lordship's pestilent purpose, but every way hinder the same. For Zerubbabel will be found no liar, which said, The truth shall have victory. You do but strive against the stream, and kick against the prieks: the Lord doth laugh your doings to scorn, and will bring all your counsels and devices to nought; who of his great mercy shortly convert your lordship, or utterly confound you, and get his name a glory over you, Amen.

"Your lordship's orator, who prayeth daily to God that he may reward you according to your deeds.—Anno 1556."

The Story of SEVEN MARTYRS, suffering together at London, for the Testimony of Christ's Gospel.

The Catholic prelates of the pope's band being as yet not satisfied with this their one year's bloody murdering of the reverend, learned, and principal members of Christ's church, (whereof there were now very few which either were not consumed by fire, or else, for the avoiding of their Popish rage, compelled to flee their country,) continued still this next year also, which was anno 1556, in no less cruelty towards the poor, simple, and inferior sort of people, (I mean in degree, though, God be praised, not in steadfastness,) having yet sometimes amongst them such as were both learned and of good estimation, as in continuance of this story shall appear.

Wherefore as the first fruits thereof, to begin this year withal, about the 27th day of January, were burned in Smithfield, at London, these seven persons hereafter following, to wit.

Thomas Whittle, priest,
Bartlet Green, gentleman,
John Tudson, artificer,
John Went, artificer,
Thomas Browne,
Isabel Foster, wife,
Joan Warne, alias Lashford, maid.

All which seven, as they were burned together in one fire, so were they likewise all upon one sort and form of articles condemned in one day. Howbeit, forasmuch as the gifts of God in them were divers, some more abounding in knowledge than others, their dealings withal were also diverse. And therefore, for the better understanding hereof, I will (first passing over their private articles and examinations had at sundry times in the bishop's house) set forth their general examinations in the public consistory, upon the bishop's articles there ministered unto them, with their answers also unto the same.

The form and words of Bonner's Articles ministered to the seven persons above mentioned.

And first to behold the manner of speech in these bishops, sitting in their majesty to terrify the ears of the simple withal, let us hear the pontifical phrase of this bishop, beginning in this sort:

"The within-written articles, and every of them, and every part and parcel of them, we, Edmund, by the permission of God, bishop of London, do object and minister to thee, Thomas Whittle, &c. of our mere office, for thy soul's health, and for the reformation of thine offences and misdemeanours, monishing thee in the virtue of obedience, and under the pains of both censures of the church, and also of other pains of the law, to answer fully, plainly, and truly, to all the same.

1. First, That thou N. hast firmly, steadfastly, and constantly believed in times past, and so dost now believe at this present, that there is here in earth a Catholic church, in the which Catholic church the faith and religion of Christ is truly professed, allowed, received, kept, and retained, of all faithful and true Christian people.

2. Item, That thou the said N. in times past hast also believed, and so dost believe at this present, that there are in the Catholic church seven sacraments, instituted and ordained by God, and by the consent of the holy church allowed, approved, received, kept, and retained.

3. Item, That thou the said N. wast in times past baptized in the faith of the said Catholic church, professing by thy godfathers and godmother the faith and religion of Christ, and the observation thereof, renouncing there the devil and all his pomps and works, and wast by the said sacrament of baptism incorporate to the Catholic church, and made a faithful member thereof.

4. Item, That thou the said N. coming to the age of fourteen years, and so to the age of discretion, didst not depart from the said profession and faith, nor didst mislike any part of the same faith or doings, but didst like a faithful Christian person abide and continue in all the same by the space of certain years, ratifying and confirming all the same.

5. Item, That thou the said N. notwithstanding the premises, hast of late, that is to say, within these two years last past, within the city and diocese of London, swerved at the least way from some part of the said Catholic faith and religion; and among other things thou hast misliked and earnestly spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the unity of the church, railing and maligning the authority of the see of Rome, and the faith observed in the same.

6. Item, That thou the said N. hast heretofore refused, and dost refuse at this present, to be reconciled again to the unity of the church, not acknowledging and confessing the authority of the said see of Rome to be lawful.

7. Item, That thou the said N. misliking the sacrifice of the mass, and the sacrament of the altar, hast refused to come to thy parish church to hear mass, and to receive the said sacrament, and hast also expressly said, that in the said sacrament of the altar there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, really, substantially, and truly; but hast affirmed expressly that the mass is idolatry and abomination, and that in the sacrament of the altar there is none other substance but only material bread and material wine, which are tokens of Christ's body and blood only, and that the substance of Christ's body and blood is in no wise in the said sacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That thou the said N. being convented before certain judges or commissioners, for thy disorder herein, and being found obstinate, wilful, and heady, wast by their commandment sent unto me and my prison, to be examined by me, and process to be made against thee for thy offence herein.

9. Item, That all and singular the premises have been, and be true and manifest, and thyself not only infamed and suspected thereof, but also culpable therein; and by reason of the same thou wast and art of the jurisdiction of me, Edmund, bishop of London, and before me, according to the order of the ecclesiastical laws, are to be convented, and also by me to be punished and reformed."

Here follow their Answers in general to the above.

To the first article they altogether agreeing, affirmed the same to be true; John Tudson and Thomas Browne further adding, that the church of England, as it was at that present used, was no part of the true Catholic church.

To the second article they answered, that they acknowledged but only two sacraments in Christ's Catholic church, that is to say, baptism and the supper of the Lord; John Went and Tudson affirming, that the sacrament of the altar, as it is used, is an idol, and no sacrament at all.

To the third article they all agreed, and confessed it to be true, that they were baptized in the faith of Christ, and of the church then taught; and afterward during the time of king Edward VI. they hearing the gospel preached, and the truth opened, followed the order of the religion and doctrine then used and set forth in the reign of the said king Edward.

To the fourth article they granted also and agreed; John Went adding, moreover, that about seven years past, he then being about twenty years of age, began to mislike certain things used in the church of England, as the ministrations of the sacrament of the altar, likewise all the ceremonies of the said church, and did likewise at the present time mislike the same as they were used, although his godfathers and godmother promised for him the contrary. John Tudson added also in much like sort, and said, that when he came to the years of discretion, that is, about nine years past, being about eighteen years of age, he did mislike the doctrine and religion then taught and set forth in the church of England, saving in king Edward's time, in whose time the gospel was truly set forth; and further said, that the doctrine set forth in the queen's reign was not agreeable to God's word, nor yet to the true Catholic church that Christ speaketh of, &c. Isabel Foster, with other, granted, adding likewise and saying to the said four articles, that she continued in the same faith and religion which she was baptized in after she came to the years of discretion, as other common people did, howbeit, blindly and without knowledge, till the reign of king Edward VI. at which time she hearing the gospel truly preached and opened to the people, received thereupon the faith and religion then taught and set forth, &c.

To the fifth article, they answered the same to be true, according to the contents thereof; Thomas Whittle adding, moreover, that he had swerved and gone away, and not in whole but in part, not from the whole Catholic church, but from the church of Rome, in speaking against the mass, the sacrifice thereof, and the see of Rome. Joan Lashford, alias Warne, granting with the other said article, addeth moreover that she never hitherto swerved or went away, nor yet doth, from any part of Christ's Catholic faith and religion; but saith, that from the time she was eleven years of age she hath misliked the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the authority of the see of Rome, with the doctrine thereof, because they be against Christ's Catholic church, and the right faith of the same. Bartlet Green answering with the other to this article, addeth and saith, that he swerveth not from the Catholic faith, but only from the church of Rome, &c.

To the sixth article, they answer and confess the same to be true, rendering the cause thereof: because (say they) the same church and doctrine therein set forth and taught, disagreeeth from the unity of Christ's word and the true Catholic faith, &c. Whereunto Bartlet Green answered, that he is contented to be reconciled to the unity of Christ's Catholic church, but not of the church of Rome. In like manner added also John Went.

To the seventh article, they answer and confess the contents thereof to be true, giving withal the reason and cause of this their so doing, for that the mass with the sacrament thereof, as it was then used and set forth in the church of England, is dissonant to the word and teaching of the people, &c. John Went furthermore said, as concerning the mass, that he believeth no less but the mass which he calleth the supper of the Lord, as it is now used in the realm of England, is naught, full of idolatry, and against God's word, so far as he seeth it; howbeit, he saith, that since the queen's coronation, by chance he hath been present where the mass hath been said, whereof he is sorry. Isabel Foster also answering to the said articles, with the other before, confessed moreover, that since queen Mary's reign she hath not heard the mass, nor received the sacrament, but hath refused to come in place where it was ministered: for she knoweth no such sacrament to be. And being demanded of her belief in the same, she saith, that there is but only material bread and material wine, and not the real substance of the body of Christ in the same sacrament: for so she hath been taught to believe by the preachers in the time of king Edward, whom she believeth to have preached the truth in that behalf.

To the eighth article, they grant the same and the contents thereof to be so. Thomas Whittle adding and affirming, that the lord chancellor that then was, sent him up to the bishop there present. Bartlet Green added, that he was sent up to the said bishop, but for no offence herein articulate. John Went said, that Dr. Story, queen Mary's commissioner, examined him upon the sacrament, and because he denied the real presence, he presented this examine to the bishop. John Tudson likewise, examined by Mr. Cholmley and Dr. Story upon the same matters, and for not coming to the church, and accused by the same because he would not agree to them, was sent to the bishop. Thomas Brown also said, that he for not coming to the church of St. Bride's, was brought by the constable to the bishop, &c. Joan Warne confessed, that she was sent by Dr. Story to the bishop of London, about twelve weeks ago, since which time she hath continued with the said bishop.

To the ninth article they confess and say, that as they believe the premises before by them confessed to be true, so they deny not the same to be manifest, and that they be of the jurisdiction of London.

And thus having expressed their articles, with their answers jointly made unto the same, it remaineth furthermore fully to discourse the stories and handling of all the seven aforesaid martyrs severally and particularly by themselves, first beginning with Thomas Whittle.

The story of all these seven Martyrs, particularly described in order here followeth: and first of THOS. WHITTLE, who, first recanting, then returning again, with great constancy and fortitude stood to the defence of Christ's doctrine against the Papists, to the fire.

In the story of Mr. Philpot, mention was made before of a married priest, whom he found in the coal-house at his first coming thither, in heaviness of mind and great sorrow, for recanting the doctrine which he had taught in king Edward's days, whose name was Thos. Whittle, of Essex: and thus lieth his story.—This Thos. Whittle, after he had been expelled from the place in Essex where he served, went abroad where he might, now here and there, as occasion was ministered, preaching and sowing the gospel of Christ. At length being apprehended by one Edmund Alabaster, in hope of reward and promotion, which he miserably gaped after, he was brought first as prisoner before the bishop of Winchester, who then was fallen lately sick of his disease, whereof not long after he died most strangely. But the apprehender for his proffered service was highly checked and rated of the bishop, asking if there were no man unto whom he might bring such rascals but to him? Hence (quoth he) out of my sight, thou varlet: what dost thou trouble me with such matters? The greedy cormorant being thus defeated of his desired prey, yet thinking to seek and to hunt further, carried his prisoner to the bishop of London, with whom what an evil mess of handling this Whittle had, and how he was by the bishop also beaten and buffeted about the face, by this his own narration, in a letter sent unto his friend, manifestly may appear:

Upon Thursday, which was the tenth of January, the bishop of London sent for me, Thos. Whittle, minister, out of the porter's lodge, where I had been all night lying upon the earth upon a pallet, where I had as painful a night of sickness as ever I had, God be thanked; and when I came before him, he talked with me many things of the sacrament so grossly, as is not worthy to be rehearsed. And amongst other things he asked me, if I would have come to mass that morning if he had sent for me? Whereunto I answered, that I would have come to him at his commandment; but to your mass, said I, I have small affection. At which answer he was displeased sore, and said, I should be fed with bread and water. And as I followed him through the great hall, he turned back and beat me with his fist, first on the one cheek and then on the other, as the sign of my beating did many days appear. And then he led me into a little salt-house, where I had no straw nor bed, but lay two nights on a table, and slept soundly, I thank God.

Then, upon the Friday next after, I was brought to my lord, and he then gave me many fair words, and said he would be good to me; and so he going to Fulham, committed me to Dr. Harpsfield, that he and I in that afternoon should commune together, and draw out certain articles, whereunto if I would subscribe, I should be dismissed. But Dr. Harpsfield sent not for me till night, and then persuaded me very sore to forsake my opinions. I answered, I held nothing but the truth, and therefore I could not so lightly turn therefrom. So I thought I should at that time have no more ado: but he had made a certain bill, which the register pulled out of his bosom, and read it. The bill indeed was very easily made, and therefore more dangerous: for the effect thereof was, to detest all errors and heresies against the sacrament of the altar and other sacraments; and to believe the faith of the Catholic church, and live accordingly.

To this bill I did indeed set my hand, being much desired and counselled so to do; and the flesh being always desirous to have liberty, I considered not thoroughly the inconvenience that might come thereupon; and respite I desired to have had, but earnestly they desired me to subscribe. Now when I had so done, I had little joy thereof: for by and by my mind and conscience told me by God's word that I had done evil, by such a sleight means to shake off the sweet cross of Christ: and yet it was not my seeking, as God he knoweth, but altogether came of them. O the crafty subtilty of Satan in his members! Let every man that God shall deliver into their hands take good heed, and cleave fast to Christ; for they will leave no corner of his conscience unsought, but will attempt all guileful and subtle means to corrupt him, to fall both from God and his truth. But yet let no man despair of God's help; for Peter did fall and rise again; and David saith, "A righteous man, though he fall he shall not be cast away; for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand." For I for my part have felt my infirmities, and yet have I found God's present help and comfort in time of need: I thank him therefore.

The night after I had subscribed, I was sore grieved, and for sorrow of conscience could not sleep; for in the deliverance of my body out of bonds, which I might have had, I could find no joy nor comfort, but still was in my conscience tormented more and more, being assured by God's Spirit and his word, that I through evil counsel and advisement had done amiss. And both with disquietness of mind, and with my other cruel handling, I was sickly, lying upon the ground when the keeper came; and so I desired him to pray Dr. Harpsfield to come to me, and so he did.

And when he came, and the register with him, I told him that I was not well at ease, but especially I told him I was grieved very much in my conscience and mind, because I had subscribed; and I said, that my conscience had so accused me, through the just judgment of God and his word, that I had felt hell in my conscience, and Satan ready to devour me; and therefore I pray you, Mr. Harpsfield, (said I,) let me have the bill again, for I will not stand to it. So he gently commanded it to be fetched, and gave it me, and suffered me to put out my name; whereof I was right glad when I had so done, although death should follow. And hereby I had experience of God's providence and mercy towards me: for in the midst of this temptation and trouble he gave me warning of my deed, and also delivered me; his name be praised for evermore, Amen.

Neither devil nor cruel tyrant can pluck any of Christ's sheep out of his hand. Of the which flock of Christ's sheep I trust undoubtedly I am one, by means of his death and blood-shedding, which shall at the last day stand at his right hand, and receive with other his blessed benediction. And now being condemned to die, my conscience and mind, I praise God, is quiet in Christ, and I by his grace am very well willing and content to give over this body to the death, for the testimony of his truth and pure religion, against Antichrist and all his false religion and doctrine.

By me, THOMAS WHITTLE, minister.

The Condemnation and Martyrdom of Thomas Whittle.

Concerning the words and answers of the said Thomas Whittle, at his last examination before the bishop, upon the 14th day of January, the year above expressed, Bonner, with other of his fellow Bonnerlings, sitting in his consistory at afternoon, first called forth Thomas Whittle, with whom he began in effect as followeth: Because ye be a priest, as I and other bishops here be, and did receive the order of priesthood after the rite and form of the Catholic church, ye shall not think but I will minister justice as well unto you as unto other. And then the said Bonner in further communication did charge him, that where in times past he had said mass according to the order then used, the same Whittle now of late had spoken and railed against the same, saying, that it was idolatry and abomination. Whereunto Thos. Whittle answering again, said, That at such time as he so said mass, he was then ignorant, &c. adding, moreover, that the elevation of the sacrament at the mass giveth occasion of idolatry to them that be ignorant and unlearned. After this, the bishop making haste to the articles, (which in all his examinations ever he harped upon,) came to this article, That thou wast in times past baptized in the faith of the Catholic church.

To this the said Whittle inferred again, I was baptized in the faith of the Catholic church, although I did forsake the church of Rome; and ye, my lord, do call these heresies that be no heresies, and do charge me therewith as heresies, and ye ground yourself upon that religion which is not agreeable to God's word.

Then the said victorious soldier and servant of our Saviour, constant in the verity received and professed, was again admonished, and with persuasions entreated by the bishop; who because he would not agree unto the same, the bishop forthwith proceeded first to his actual degradation, that is, to unpriest him of all his priestly trinkets and clerical habit. The order and manner of which their Popish and most vain degradation, before in the story of bishop Hooper is to be seen. Then Whittle, in the midst of the ceremonies, when he saw them so busy in degrading him after their father the pope's pontifical fashion, said unto them, Paul and Titus had not so much to do with their priests and bishops. And farther, speaking to the bishop, he said unto him, My lord, your religion standeth most with the church of Rome, not with the Catholic church of Christ.

The bishop after this, according to his accustomed formal proceedings, assayed him yet again with words, rather than with substantial arguments, to conform him to his religion; who then denying so to do, said, As for your religion, I cannot be persuaded that it is according to God's word.

The bishop then asked what fault he found in the administration of the sacrament of the altar? Whittle answered and said, It is not used according to Christ's institution, in that it is privately and not openly done; and also for that it is ministered but in one kind to the lay people, which is against Christ's ordinance. Farther, Christ commanded it not to be elevated nor adored: for the adoration and elevation cannot be approved by scripture.

Well, quoth Bonner, my lords here, and other learned men, have shewed great learning for thy conversion; wherefore if thou wilt yet return to the faith and religion of the Catholic church, I will receive thee thereunto, and not commit thee to the secular power, &c. To make short, Whittle, strengthened with the grace of the Lord, stood strong and unmoveable in that he had affirmed. Wherefore the sentence being read, the next day following he was committed to the secular power, and so in a few days after brought to the fire with the other six aforementioned, sealing up the testimony of his doctrine with his blood, which he willingly and cheerfully gave for witness of the truth.

2. The Story of Mr. BARTLET GREEN, gentleman and lawyer, Martyr.

After the martyrdom of T. Whittle, next followed that of Bartlet Green, who the next day after the aforesaid Whittle, was likewise condemned. This Green was of a good family, and had such parents as both favoured learning and were also willing to bring up their child in the same. Who after some entrance in other inferior schools, was by them sent unto the university of Oxford; where through exercise and diligent study he so profited, that within short time he attained as well to the knowledge of sundry profane sciences, as also now in his last years unto the godly understanding of divinity. To which he was at the first an utter enemy, until such time as God of his mercy had opened his eyes, by his often repairing unto the common lectures of Peter Martyr, reader of the divinity lecture in the same university, so that thereby, as by God's instrument, he saw the true light of Christ's gospel.

Whereof when he had once tasted, it became unto him as the fountain of living water that our Saviour Christ spake of to the woman of Samaria, so as he never thirsted any more, but had a well springing unto everlasting life. Insomuch, as when he was called by his friends from the university, and was placed in the Temple at London, there to attain to the knowledge of the common laws of the realm, he yet continued in his former study and earnest profession of the gospel, wherein also he did not a little profit. Howbeit, such is the frailty of our corrupt nature without the special assistance of God's Holy Spirit, through the continual accompanying and fellowship of such worldly (I will not say too much youthful) young gentlemen, as are commonly in that and the like houses, he became by little and little a compartner of their fond follies and youthful vanities, as well in his apparel as also in banquetings and other superfluous excesses; which he afterward, being again called by God's merciful correction, did sore lament and bewail, as appeareth by his own testimony notified and left in a book of a certain friend of his a little before his death, written with his own hand, in manner as followeth:

"Two things have very much troubled me whilst I was in the Temple, pride and gluttony; which, under the colour of glory and good fellowship, drew me almost from God. Against both there is one remedy,—prayer, earnest and without ceasing. And forso much as vain-glory is so subtle an adversary, that almost it woundeth deadly ere ever a man can perceive himself to be smitten, therefore we ought so much the rather by continual prayer to labour for humbleness of mind. Truly gluttony beginneth under a charitable pretence of mutual love and society, and hath in it most uncharitableness. When we seek to refresh our bodies, that they may be the more apt to serve God, and to perform our duties towards our neighbours, then stealeth it in as a privy thief, and murdereth both body and soul, that now it is not apt to pray, or serve God, apt to study, or labour for our neighbour. Let us therefore watch and be sober; for our adversary the devil walketh about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. And remember what Solomon saith, A patient man is better than a strong warrior; and he that conquereth his own stomach, is better than he that conquereth towns and cities.

"BARTLET GREEN."

And now therefore to return to our history: For the better maintenance of himself in these his studies, and other his affairs, he had a large exhibition of his grandfather Mr. Doctor Bartlet, who during the time of Green's imprisonment made unto him large offers of great livings, if he would recant, and (forsaking the truth and gospel of Christ) come home again to the church and synagogue of Rome. But those his persuasions took small effect in his faithful heart, as the sequel did declare. He was a man beloved of all men (except of the Papists, who love none that love the truth,) and so he well deserved; for he was of a meek, humble, discreet, and most gentle behaviour to all. Injurious he was to none, beneficial to many, especially to those that were of the household of faith; as appeareth amongst other by his friendly dealings with Mr. Christopher Goodman, being at that present a poor exile beyond the seas. With whom this Bartlet Green, as well for his toward learning, as also for his sober and godly behaviour, and often society in Oxford, in the days of good king Edward; which now, notwithstanding his friend's misery and banishment, he did not lightly forget; and that turned as it chanced (not without the providence of Almighty God) to the great grief of both; the one of heart for the loss of his friend, and the other of body in suffering the cruel and murdering rage of Papists.

The cause hereof was a letter which Green did write unto the said Goodman, containing as well the report of certain demands or questions, which he meant to have sent unto Mr. Philpot, as also an answer to a question made by the said Christopher Goodman, in a letter written unto him, in which he required to have the certainty of the report which was spread amongst them on the other side of the seas, that the queen was dead. Whereunto Mr. Green answered simply, and as the truth then was, that she was not dead.

These letters, with many other written to divers of the godly exiles by their friends here in England, being delivered by a messenger to carry over, came by the apprehension of the said bearer unto the hands of the king and queen's council; who amongst them espied this letter of Mr. Green, written unto his friend Christopher Goodman, in which they found these words, The queen is not yet dead. Which words were only written as an answer, to certify Mr. Goodman of the truth of his former demand. Howbeit, to some of the council they seemed very heinous words, yea, treason they would have made them, if the law would have suffered.

Which when they could not do (and being yet very loath to let any such depart freely, whom they suspected to be a favourer of the gospel,) they then examined him upon his faith in religion, but upon what points is not certainly known.

Nevertheless, as it seemeth, his answers were such as little pleased them, but especially the anointed sort; and therefore after they had detained him in prison, as well in the Tower of London as elsewhere, they sent him at last unto Bonner, bishop of London, to be ordered according to his ecclesiastical law.

The bishop perceiving Green's learning and constancy to be such, as neither he nor any of his doctors and chaplains could by the scriptures refute, began then to object and put in practice his chief and strongest argument against him, which was the rigour of the law, and cruelty of execution; an argument, I assure you, which, without the special grace of our God, to flesh is unsupportable. And therefore using laws as a cloak of his tyranny, the 28th day of November, the said bishop examined him upon certain points of the Christian religion. Whereunto when he had answered, the bishop appointed the register (as their most common manner is) to draw thereout an order of confession; which being afterwards read unto Green, was also subscribed by him, as a confirmation of his former assertions; the tenor whereof here ensueth:

The Confession and Saying of Bartlet Green.

Bartlet Green, born in the city of London, in the parish of Bassingshal, of the diocese of London, and of the age of 25 years, being examined in the bishop's palace the 27th day of November, anno 1555, upon certain articles, answered as followeth, viz. That neither in the time of king Edward, after the mass by him was put down, neither in the time of queen Mary after the mass was restored again, he hath heard any mass at all; but he saith, that in the reign of the said queen's majesty, he the said Bartlet, two times, to wit, at two Easter-tides or days, in the chamber of John Pulline, one of the preachers in king Edward's time, within the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, of the diocese of London, did receive the communion with the said Pulline and Christopher Goodman, some time reader of the divinity lecture in Oxford, now gone beyond the sea; and the second time, with the said Pulline, and with one Rimnegar, master of arts, of Magdalen-college in Oxford; and this examine also saith, that at both the said communions he, and the other before named, did take and receive bread and wine, which bread and wine he called sacramental bread and sacramental wine, which he saith were used there by them, Pulline only reading the words of the institution, expressed in the book of communion.

In which receiving and using, this examine saith, that the other afore-named did receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that they received material bread and material wine, no substance thereof changed, and so no real presence of the body and blood of Christ there being, but only grace added thereto. And further, this examine saith, that he had heretofore, during the reign of the queen's majesty aforesaid, refused, and so now doth refuse, to come and hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, as they are now used and ministered in this church of England; because he saith, that concerning the mass he cannot be persuaded in his conscience that the sacrifice pretended in the same is agreeable to God's word, or maintained by the same; and that without deadly offence he cannot worship the body and blood of Christ, that is pretended to be there.

And as concerning the sacrament of the altar, this examine saith, that he heretofore during the said reign hath refused, and now doth refuse, to receive the same, as is now used in this church of England, because it is not used according to the institution of Christ, but both in a strange tongue, and also not ministered in both kinds; and besides that, contrary to God's word, it is there taught that the thing there ministered is to be adored, as the real and true body of Christ. And furthermore this examine saith, that during the said reign he had not been confessed to the priest, nor received absolution at his hands, because he is not bound by God's word to make any confession.

BARTLET GREEN.

Many other conferences and public examinations they brought him unto. But in the end, seeing his steadfastness of faith to be such, as against the which neither their threatenings nor yet their flattering promises could prevail, the 15th day of January the bishop caused him, with the rest above named, to be brought into the consistory at St. Paul's; where being set in his judgment-seat, accompanied with Fecknam, then dean for the same church, and other his chaplains, after he had condemned the other six, he then called for Bartlet Green, and asked him if he would recant? He said, Nay, he would not. But, my lord, (said he) in old time there were no men put to death for their conscience, until such time as bishops found the means to make it death to believe contrary to them; but excommunication, my lord, was the greatest penalty which men had for their conscience: yea, insomuch, that St. Augustine wrote and commanded that no man should be put to death for his opinion.

Then Bonner said, that when St. Augustine saw what inconveniences followed of that commandment, he wrote again to the temporal rulers, commanding them to punish their bodies also.

But, said Green, he bade not put them to death.

He bade punish them, quoth Bonner.

Yea, said Green, but not put them to death.

That they should be punished, quoth Bonner again.

This talk ended, he asked Green if he would recant, and return to their Romish mother? Which when he denied, the bishop pronounced the sentence definitive against him, and so committed him to the sheriffs of London, who caused him to be carried to Newgate.

And as he was going thither, there met with him two gentlemen, being both his special friends, minding belike to comfort this their persecuted brother: but at their meeting, their loving and friendly hearts, not able any longer to hide themselves, were manifested by the abundance of their pitiful tears. To whom, when Green saw them, he said in these or like words, Ah, my friends, is this your comfort you are come to give me, in this my occasion of heaviness? Must I, who needed to have comfort ministered to me, become now a comforter of you? And thus declaring his most quiet and peaceable mind and conscience, he cheerfully spake to them and others, until he came to the prison door, into which he joyfully entered, and there remained always either in prayer (whereunto he much gave himself,) or else in some other godly meditations and exercises, unto the 27th day of January, when he with his other above-mentioned brethren went most cheerfully unto the place of their torments, often repeating, as well by the way as also at the stake, these Latin verses following:

Christe Deus, sine et spes est mihi nulla salutis:
Te duce vera sequor, te duce falsa nego.

In English thus,

O Christ, my God, sure hope of health,
Besides thee have I none:
The truth I love, and falsehood hate,
Be thee my guide alone.

3. THOMAS BROWN, Martyr.

Thomas Brown, born in the parish of Histon, within the diocese of Ely, came afterwards to London, where he dwelled in the parish of St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, a married man, of the age of 37 years, who because he came not to his parish church, was presented by the constable of the parish to Bonner.

Being had to Fulham, with the others, there to be examined, he was required upon Thursday, being the 26th day of September, to come into the chapel to hear mass, which he refusing to do, went into the warren, and there kneeled among the trees. For this he was accused by the bishop, because he said it was done in despite and contempt of their mass; which seemed to the bishop and his chaplains no small offence. At length being produced to his last examination before the said bishop the 15th day of January, there to hear sentence definitive against him; first he was required, with many fair words and glozing promises, to revoke his doctrine; to whom the aforesaid bishop speaking these words, said, Brown, ye have been before me many times, oft I have travailed with thee, to win thee from thine errors; yet thou, and such like, have and do report that I go about to seek thy blood, &c.

To whom the said Thomas Brown answered again, Yea, my lord, indeed ye be a blood-sucker; and I would I had as much blood as is water in the sea, for you to suck.

Bonner then proceeding to the articles, when he had read them unto him again, as he had done divers times before, asked whether he was content and willing to relinquish those his heresies and erroneous opinions, as he called them, and return again unto the unity of the Catholic faith! Whereunto he made answer again, saying, If they were heresies, he would forsake them. They be heresies, quoth the bishop. How will ye prove it? said Brown: for I will not go from mine answer, except you can prove them to be heresies, which ye can never do; for that which you call heresy, is no heresy. With that Bonner, not able, or else not disposed, to supply the part of a good teacher in proving that which the other had denied, by good authority and doctrine of the scripture, went about with words and promise of pardon to allure him to renounce those his heresies, as he called them, and to return unto the unity of his mother, the holy Catholic church, &c.

To whom the said Thomas answered again, Prove it (said he) to be heresy that I do hold and maintain, and I will turn to you. But you condemn me, because I will not confess and believe the bread in the sacrament of the altar, as you call it, to be the body of Christ, and therefore ye spill mine and such like innocents' blood, being the queen's true subjects, for which you shall answer, and that shortly.

After this being spoken, Bonner, as he had done to the other before, read in writing the sentence definitive against him. The form of which sentence wherewith the Papists were wont to condemn all the innocent saints of Christ, has already been mentioned. And so this done, he was committed to the sheriffs to be had away, and was burned the 27th day of the said month of January, faithfully abiding with the others the pope's torments, for the true confession of the Christian faith.

4. JOHN TUDSON, martyr.

The same day and time, when the aforesaid Thomas Brown with his fellows were condemned, as is above rehearsed, being the 15th day of January, John Tudson was also brought forth with the rest of the said company, unto the like condemnation. This John Tudson was born in Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, after that was apprentice in London; who being complained of to sir Richard Cholmley and Dr. Story, was by them sent unto Bonner, bishop of London, and was divers times before him in examination.

The articles and interrogatories ministered unto him, as unto the rest, before are specified, with his answers also unto the same annexed, &c. After this he was brought unto the open consistory; where the said blessed and true servant of the Lord, John Tudson, appearing before the said bishop and his accomplices, was moved with sundry persuasions to go from his opinion, which they named heresy, and to persist in the unity of the church which they were of; but he, constantly persisting in that which he had received by the preachers in king Edward's time, refused so to do, saying, there was no heresy in his answers: for I (said he) defy all heresy. The bishop yet still used his old-acustomed persuasion to remove him, promising moreover all his offences and errors, as he called them, should be forgiven him, if he would return, &c. Then said Tudson, Tell me wherein I have offended, and I will return. Then said the bishop, In your answers. No, said Tudson again, I have not therein offended; and ye, my lord, pretend charity, but nothing thereof appeareth in your works. Thus after a few words the bishop pronounced against him the sentence of condemnation; which being read, the godly and constant martyr was committed to the secular power, and so with much patience finished this life the 27th day of January.

5. JOHN WENT, martyr.

John Went, born at Langham, in Essex, within the diocese of London, of the age of 27, and a sheerman by occupation, was first examined by Dr. Story upon the sacrament of his popish altar; and because the poor man did not accord with him thoroughly in the real presence of the body and blood of Christ, the said Story did send him up to Bonner, bishop of London. Who likewise, after divers examinations upon the articles aforesaid, in the consistory attempted the like manner of persuasions with him, as he did to the others, to recant and return. To whom in few words the said Went answered again, he would not, but that by the leave of God he would stand firm and constant in that he had said. And when the bishop yet notwithstanding did still urge and call upon him, with words and fair glozes, to give over himself to their opinion, he could have no other answer of him but this, No, I say as I have said, &c. Whereupon being condemned by the bishop's sentence, he was committed unto the sheriffs, and so brought to his martyrdom, which he with no less constancy suffered to the end, with the rest of that blessed society above-mentioned.

6. ISABEL FOSTER, martyr.

With these five persons before mentioned and condemned, were also two women in the said company condemned the said time, and likewise burned for the same; the one a wife, called Isabel Foster, the other a maid, named Joan Warne, or otherwise Lashford.

This aforesaid Isabel was born in Grafestock, in the diocese of Carlisle, and afterwards married to one John Foster, cutler, of the parish of St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, being of the age of 55 years. She likewise, for not coming unto the church, being sent unto Bonner, and so imprisoned, was sundry times examined by the said bishop, but never overcome nor removed from the constant confession of Christ's gospel.

At length, coming unto her final examination before the bishop in the consistory, the 15th day of the said month of January, she was moved again whether she would go from her former answers. Whereunto she gave a resolute answer in few words: I will not (said she) go from them, by God's grace; and thereunto did adhere, neither being east down by the threats of the bishop, nor yet yielding through his alluring enticements, promising both life and liberty, if she would associate herself in the unity of the Catholic church. Whereunto she said again in this wise, That she trusted she was never out of the Catholic church, &c. and so persisting in the same, continued constant till the sentence definitive was pronounced, and then she was committed by commandment of the bishop to the secular power; and so brought a few days after to the stake, the 27th of the aforesaid month, where she like a faithful witness of the Lord's truth ended her troubles here, to find a better rest in the kingdom of Christ our Saviour.

7. JOAN LASHFORD, alias WARNE, martyr.

We have already shewn that Elizabeth Warne, who with her husband John Warne, in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, were apprehended in Bow Church-yard for being there at a communion, and both suffered for the same, first the man in the month of May, then the wife in July after; and now the daughter in the month of January followed her parents in the same martyrdom.

This Joan Lashford, born in the parish of Little Allhallows, in Thomas-Street, was the daughter of one Robert Lashford, cutler, and of the aforesaid Elizabeth, who afterwards was married to John Warne, upholsterer, who was persecuted for the gospel of God to the burning fire; and after him his wife; and after her this Joan Lashford, her daughter; who about the age of twenty years, ministering to her father and mother in prison, suspected and known to be of the same doctrine and religion, was sent to Bonner, bishop of London, by Dr. Story, and so committed to the Compter in the Poultry, where she remained the space of five weeks, and from thence had to Newgate, where she continued the space of some months.

After that, remaining prisoner in the custody of the said Bonner, her confession was, being examined, that the whole twelvemonth before, and more, she came unto no Popish mass service in the church, neither would do, either to receive the sacrament of the altar, or to be confessed, because her conscience would not suffer her so to do; confessing and protesting, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the real presence of Christ's body and blood; nor that auricular confession or absolution after the Popish sort was necessary, nor the mass to be good or according to the scripture, but said that both the said sacrament, confession, absolution, and the mass, with all other their superfluous sacraments, ceremonies, and divine service, as then used in this realm of England, were most vile, and contrary to Christ's words and institution; so that neither they were at the beginning, nor shall be at the latter end. This godly damsel, feeble and tender of age, yet strong by grace, in this her confession and faith stood so firm, that neither the flattering promises nor the violent threats of the bishop, could turn her: but being moved and exhorted by the bishop to return to the Catholic unity of the church, said boldly to him again, If ye will leave off your abomination, so I will return, and otherwise I will not.

Whereupon the bishop yet again promised her pardon of all her errors, as he called them, if she would be conformed. To this she answered again, saying unto the bishop, Do as it pleaseth you, and I pray God that you may do that which may please God.

And thus she constantly persevering in the Lord's holy truth, was by the sentence definitive condemned, and committed unto the sheriffs; by whom, the aforesaid 27th day of January, she with the rest being brought to the stake, there washed her clothes in the blood of the Lamb, dying most constantly for his word and truth, to whom most lovingly she espoused herself.

And thus much concerning the life, story, and condemnation, of these seven martyrs before specified.

FIVE other MARTYRS in Canterbury, four Women and one Man, at two Stakes and one Fire, all together burned.

After these seven before rehearsed, martyred together in Smithfield, shortly after in the same month, the 31st day of January, followed another like fellowship of godly martyrs at Canterbury, four women and one man, whose names be these:

John Lomas, a young man,
Agnes Snoth, widow,
Anne Albright,
Joan Sole, wife.
Joan Catmer,

First, JOHN LOMAS, of the parish of Tenderden, was accused of that religion which the Papists call heresy, and cited upon the same to appear at Canterbury; examined there of the first article, whether he believed the Catholic church, or no? answered thus, That he believed so much as is contained in God's book, and no more.

Then being assigned to appear again under the pain of the law, the next Wednesday se'nnight after, which was the 17th day of January, the said Lomas being examined whether he would be confessed of a priest or no? answered and said, That he found it not written that he should be confessed to any priest in God's book, neither would be confessed, unless he were accused by some man, of sin. Again, being examined whether he believed the body of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar really, under the forms of bread and wine, after the consecration, or no? he answered, That he believed no reality of Christ's body to be in the sacrament, neither found he written that he is there under form or tressel, but he believed so much as is written. Being then demanded whether he believed that there is a Catholic church or no, and whether he would be content to be a member of the same? he answered thereunto, That he believed so much as was written in God's book; and other answer than this he refused to give. Whereupon the sentence was given and read against him the 18th day of January; and so being committed to the secular power, he constantly suffered for the conscience of a true faith, with the four women here following.

2. AGNES SNOTH, martyr.

Agnes Snoth, widow, of the parish of Smarden, likewise accused and cited for the true profession of Christ's religion, was divers times examined before the pharisaical fathers; who, there compelled to answer to such articles and interrogatories as should be ministered unto her, first denied to be confessed to a priest; notwithstanding, she denied not to confess her offences as one to another, but not anrientially to any priest. And as touching the sacrament of the altar, she protested, that if she or any other did receive the sacrament so as Christ and his apostles after him did deliver it, then she and they did receive it to their comfort; but as it is now used in the church, she said that no man could otherwise receive it than to his damnation, as she thought. Afterwards being examined again concerning penance, whether it were a sacrament or no? she plainly denied the same, and that the popish manner of their absolutions was not consonant to the word, nor necessary to be taken; with such other like, agreeing with the answers and confession of John Lomas before mentioned.

Whereupon the sentence being likewise read, she was committed to the sheriffs of Canterbury, and so suffering martyrdom with the rest, declared herself a perfect and constant witness of Christ and of his truth, the 31st day of January.

3. ANNE ALBRIGHT, alias CHAMPNESS, martyr.

Against Anne Albright, likewise appearing before the judge and his colleagues, it was also objected concerning the same matter of confession. Whereunto she answered in these words, saying, that she would not be confessed of a priest; and added moreover, speaking unto the priest, You priests are the children of perdition, and can do no good by your confession. And likewise speaking to the judge and his assistants, she told them that they were subverters of Christ's truth.

And as touching the sacrament of the altar, she said it was a naughty and abominable idol, and so utterly denied the same sacrament.

Thus persisting and persevering in her former sayings and answers, she was condemned the said 18th day of the said month with the others above mentioned; with whom also she suffered quietly, and with great comfort, for the right of Christ's religion.

4. JOAN SOLE, martyr.

In the like manner Joan Sole, of the parish of Horton, was condemned by the same pharisees and priests, for not allowing confession auricular, and for denying the real presence and substance of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar; who, farther, their pharisaical sentence being read, was brought by the sheriffs to the stake with the other four, and sustained the like martyrdom with them, through the assistance of God's holy grace and Spirit mightily working in her, to the glory of his name, and confirmation of his truth.

5. JOAN CATMER, martyr.

The fifth and last of this heavenly company of martyrs was Joan Catmer, of the parish of Hythe, wife of George Catmer, burned before. Who being asked what she said to confession made to a priest? denied to be confessed to any such priest. And moreover, the judge speaking of the sacrament of the altar, she said and affirmed, That she believed not in that sacrament as it was then used; for that it was made (she said) a very idol. In this her confession she remaining and persisting, was by the like sentence cruelly by them condemned, and so suffered with the aforesaid Thomas Lomas and the other three fellow-martyrs, ratifying and confirming with their blood the true knowledge and the doctrine of the glorious gospel of Christ Jesus our Saviour.

These five persons were burnt at two stakes, and one fire, together at Canterbury; who, when the fire was flaming about their ears, did sing psalms; whereat the good knight, sir John Norton, being there present, wept bitterly.

The 8th day of August, was brought William Sarton, weaver, of Bristol, before one Dalby, chancery of Bristol aforesaid, and by him committed to prison, and also condemned, for holding that the sacrament was a sign of an holy thing; also he denied that the flesh and blood of Christ is there after the words of consecration. He was burned the 18th of September, anno 1556, and as he went to the fire he sung psalms. The sheriff, John Griffith, had prepared green wood to burn him; but one Mr. John Pikes, pitying the man, caused divers to go with him to Ridland, half a mile off, who brought good store of haum sheaves, which indeed made good despatch with little pain, in comparison to that he should have suffered with the green wood. In the mean space, whilst they went for the sheaves, the said Sarton made many good exhortations to the people, and after died joyfully and patiently.

A Note of PREST'S Wife, of Exeter.

In Cornwall, not far from Launceston, within the diocese of Exeter, in queen Mary's days, dwelled a poor man, whose name was Prest, his wife being an honest woman, very simple, but of good zeal and upright life, being taught by God in hearing of his word (albeit it was in those days very seldom preached any where,) and feeling a sweet taste thereof, framed her life anew after the rule of the same; and banished quite from her all the popish dregs of superstition and hypocrisy, and gave herself wholly to prayer and invoking the name of God, both for the afflicted church of Christ, in those days very dangerously tossed and turmoiled, as also for her own inward contentation and spiritual consolation, which she not a little felt to her unspeakable joy and incomparable comfort. And when some, who had before known her, saw that marvellous change in her, and (as the cruel serpent) envied her felicity, they went upon the same immediately, and accused her to certain justices of the shire, being extreme enemies to the truth, and persecutors of the same; who taking the matter in hand, as very glad of such occasion, sent for her to the place where she was, and began to demand her belief in their popish sacrament of the altar.

The good poor woman, who had learned not to be ashamed to confess her master, Christ, before men, and to render account of her faith when it was asked, told freely and frankly her opinion therein, and hid back nothing that either she thought might profit them, if they had any grace to receive it, or else might sound to God's glory and praise, though it were never so much by them threatened and rebuked. Whereupon she was forthwith committed to the gaol of Launceston, where she remained a quarter of a year, or thereabouts, and afterwards was taken from that vile and filthy prison, and delivered over to the hands of two champions of the pope's; the one called Dr. Raynolds, dean of Exeter, and the other named Mr. Blaxton, treasurer of the same church, men fervently hot in the furtherance of the Romish affairs, and in withstanding the truth of the pure gospel. So the time that this good woman was under their hands, she had many sore conflicts by them. And the said Blaxton having a concubine, which sundry times resorted to him with other of his gossips; always when they came, this said good woman was called forth to his house; and there to make his minion, with the rest of his company, some mirth, he would examine her with such mocking manner, deriding the truth, that it would have vexed any Christian soul to have seen it. Then when he had long used his foolishness in this sort, and had sported himself enough in deriding this Christian martyr; in the end he sent her to prison again, and there kept her very miserably, saving sometimes he would send for her when his aforesaid guest came to him, to use with her his accustomed folly. But, in fine, the vile wretches, (after many combats and scoffing persuasions,) when they had played the part of a cat with a mouse, at length they condemned her, and delivered her over to the secular power, who within a short space after most cruelly brought her to the place where she would suffer, and there, in great contempt of the truth which she most constantly confessed, they consumed her body immediately with fire into ashes; which she very patiently suffered and most joyfully received, yielding her soul and life unto the Lord, and her body to the tormentors; for which the Lord's name therefore be praised, Amen.

The Martyrdom of one Snel, burned about Richmond, in Queen Mary's time.

At Bedale, a market-town in Yorkshire, were two men in the latter days of queen Mary, the one named John Snel, and the other Richard Snel; who being suspected for religion, were sent unto Richmond, where Dr. Dakins had commission from the bishop of Chester to have the examination of them.

This Dr. Dakins many times conferred with them, sometimes threatening fire and faggot if they would not recant, and sometimes flattering them with fair fables, if they would return into the holy Catholic church. But they stood constantly to the sure rock, Jesus Christ, in whom they put their whole trust and confidence; whilst at last being so sore imprisoned that their toes rotted off, and the one of them could not go without crutches, they brought them to the church by compulsion, where the one of them heard their abominable mass, having a certain sum of money given him by the benevolence of the people; and so departed thence. But the first news that was heard of him within three or four days, was, that he had drowned himself in a river running by Richmond, called Swaile.

Immediately after, Dr. Dakins, giving sentence that the other should be burned, came home to his house, and never joyed after, but died. The commissary of Richmond, named Hillings, preached at Snel's burning, exhorting him to return to the church: but his labour was in vain, the constant martyr standing strongly to the faith which he professed.

Then being brought to the stake, whereunto he was tied by a girdle of iron, there was given unto him gunpowder, and a little straw was laid under his feet, and set round about with small wood and tar-barrels; the fire was put in the straw, which by and by flaming about his head, he cried thrice together, "Christ, help me!" insomuch, that one Robert Atkinson being present, said, Hold fast there, and we will all pray for thee. Thus this blessed martyr ended his life.

The Life, Sufferings, and Martyrdom, of THOMAS CRANMER, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, burnt at Oxford the 21st of March, 1556.

This eminent prelate was born at Aslacton in Nottinghamshire, on the 2nd of July, 1489. His family was ancient, and came in with William the Conqueror. He was early deprived of his father, Thomas Cranmer, Esq. and after no extraordinary education, was sent by his mother to Cambridge, at the age of fourteen, according to the custom of those times.

Having completed his studies at the university, he took the usual degrees, and was so well beloved, that he was chosen fellow of Jesus-college; soon after which he became celebrated for his great learning and abilities.

In 1521 he married, by which he forfeited the fellowship of Jesus-college; but his wife dying in childbed within the year, he was re-elected. This favour he most gratefully acknowledged, and chose to decline an offer of a much more valuable fellowship in cardinal Wolsey's new seminary at Oxford, rather than to relinquish friends who had treated him with the most distinguished respect.

In 1523 he commenced doctor of divinity; and being in great esteem for theological learning, he was chosen divinity lecturer in his own college, and appointed by the university one of the examiners in that science. In this office he principally inculcated the study of the holy scriptures, then greatly neglected, as being indispensably necessary for the professors of that divine knowledge.

The plague happening to break out at Cambridge, Mr. Cranmer, with some of his pupils, removed to Waltham-abbey, where falling into company with Gardiner and Fox, the one secretary, the other almoner, of king Henry VIII. that monarch's intended divorce of Catharine, his queen, the common subject of discourse in those days, came upon the carpet: when Cranmer advising an application to our own, and to the foreign, universities, for their opinion in the ease, and giving these gentlemen much satisfaction, they introduced him to the king, who was so pleased with him, that he ordered him to write his thoughts on the subject, made him his chaplain, and admitted him into that favour and esteem which he never afterwards forfeited.

In 1530 he was sent by the king, with a solemn embassy, to dispute on the subject of the divorce at Paris, Rome, and other foreign parts. At Rome he delivered his book which he had written in defence of the divorce, to the pope, and offered to justify it in a public disputation: but after various promises and appointments, none appeared to oppose him; while in private conferences he forced them to confess that the marriage was contrary to the law of God. The pope constituted him penitentiary-general of England, and dismissed him. In Germany he gave full satisfaction to many learned men, who were before of a contrary persuasion; and prevailed on the famous Osander (whose niece he married while there) to declare the king's marriage unlawful.

During the time he was abroad, the great archbishop Warham died: Henry, convinced of Cranmer's merit, determined that he should succeed him; and commanded him to return for that purpose. He suspected the cause, and delayed: he was desirous by all means to decline this high station; for he had a true and primitive sense of the office. But a spirit so different from that of the churchmen of his time, stimulated the king's resolution; and the more reluctance Cranmer shewed, the greater resolution Henry exerted. He was consecrated on March 30, 1533, to the office; and though he received the usual bulls from the pope, he protested at his consecration against the oath of allegiance, &c. to him: for he had conversed freely with the reformed in Germany, had read Luther's books, and was zealously attached to the glorious cause of reformation.

The first service he did the king in his archiepiscopal character was pronouncing the sentence of his divorce from queen Catharine, and the next, in joining his hands with Anne Boleyn; the consequence of which marriage was the birth of the glorious Elizabeth, to whom he stood godfather.

As the queen was greatly interested in the reformation, the friends to that good work began to conceive high hopes; and, indeed, it went on with desirable success. But the fickle disposition of the king, and the fatal end of the unhappy Anne, for a while alarmed their fears, though, by God's providence, without any ill effects. The pope's supremacy was universally exploded; monasteries, &c. destroyed upon the fullest detection of the most abominable vices and inordinances; that valuable book of the Erudition of a Christian man, was set forth by our great archbishop with public authority; and the sacred scriptures at length, to the infinite joy of Cranmer and the worthy lord Cromwell, his constant friend and associate, were not only translated, but introduced into every parish. The translation was received with inexpressible joy; every one that was able purchased it, and the poor flocked greedily to hear it read; some persons in years learnt to read on purpose, that they might peruse it; and even little children crowded with eagerness to hear it—We cannot help reflecting on this occasion, how much we are bound to prize this sacred treasure, which we enjoy so perfectly, and how much to contend against every attempt of those enemies, and that church, which would deprive us of it, and again reduce us to legends and schoolmen, to ignorance and idolatry.

Cranmer, that he might proceed with true judgment, made a collection of opinions from the works of the ancient fathers and later doctors: of which bishop Burnet saw two vols. in folio; and it appears by a letter of lord Burleigh's, that there were then six volumes of Cranmer's collections in his hands: a work of incredible labour, but vast utility.

A short time after this, he gave a shining proof of his sincere and disinterested constancy, by his noble opposition to what are commonly called king Henry's Six Bloody Articles. (By these none were allowed to speak against transubstantiation, on pain of being burned as heretics, and forfeiting their goods and chattels, as in ease of treason. It was also thereby made felony, and forfeiture of lands and goods, to defend the communion in both kinds, or marriage of the clergy, or of those who had vowed celibacy; or to speak against private masses and auricular confession.) However, he weathered the storm; and published, with an incomparable preface written by himself, the larger Bible, six of which even Bonner, then newly consecrated bishop of London, caused to be fixed for the perusal of the people in his cathedral of St. Paul's.

The enemies of the reformation, however, were restless; and Henry, alas! was no Protestant in his heart. Cromwell fell a sacrifice to them; and they aimed every possible shaft at Cranmer. Gardiner in particular was indefatigable: he caused him to be accused in parliament, and several lords of the privy council moved the king to commit the archbishop to the Tower. The king perceived their malice; and one evening, on pretence of diverting himself on the water, ordered his barge to be rowed to Lambeth side: the archbishop, being informed of it, came down to pay his respects, and was ordered by the king to come into the barge, and sit close by him. Henry made him acquainted with the accusations of heresy, faction, &c. which were laid against him; and spoke of his opposition to the Six Articles: the archbishop modestly replied, That he could not but acknowledge himself to be of the same opinion with respect to them; but was not conscious of having offended against them.—The king then, putting on an air of pleasantry, asked him, if his bedchamber could stand the test of these Articles? The archbishop confessed that he was married in Germany, before his promotion; but assured the king, that on passing that act he had parted with his wife, and sent her abroad to her friends. His majesty was so charmed with his openness and integrity, that he discovered the whole plot that was laid against him; and gave him a ring of great value, to produce upon any future emergency.

A few days after this, Cranmer's enemies summoned him to appear before the council. He accordingly attended, when they suffered him to wait in the lobby amongst the footmen, treated him on his admission with haughty contempt, and would have sent him to the Tower. But he produced the ring, and gained his enemies a severe reprimand from Henry, and himself the highest degree of security and favour.

On this occasion he shewed that lenity and mildness for which he was always so much distinguished: he never persecuted any of his enemies, but on the contrary freely forgave even the inveterate Gardiner, on his writing a supplicatory letter to him for that purpose.—The same lenity he shewed towards Dr. Thornton, the suffragan of Dover, and Dr. Barber, who (though entertained in his family, and intrusted with his secrets, and indebted to him for many favours) had ungratefully conspired with Gardiner to take away his life.

When Cranmer first discovered their treachery, he took them aside into his study, and telling them that he had been basely and falsely accused by some, in whom he had always reposed the greatest confidence, desired them to advise him how he should behave himself towards them? They, not suspecting themselves to be concerned in the question, replied, That such vile abandoned villains ought to be prosecuted with the greatest rigour; nay, deserved to die without mercy. At this the archbishop, lifting up his hands to heaven, cried out, Merciful God, whom may a man trust! And then taking out of his bosom the letters by which he had discovered their treachery, asked them if they knew those papers? When they saw their own letters produced against them, they were in the utmost confusion, and, falling down upon their knees, humbly sued for forgiveness. The archbishop told them that he forgave them, and would pray for them; but that they must not expect him ever to trust them for the future.

As we are upon the subject of the archbishop's readiness to forgive and forget injuries, it may not be improper here to relate a pleasant instance of it, which happened some time before the above circumstances:

The archbishop's first wife, whom he married at Cambridge, was kinswoman to the hostess at the Dolphin inn, and boarded there; and he often resorting thither on that account, the Popish party had raised a story that he was hostler to that inn, and never had the benefit of a learned education. This idle story a Yorkshire priest had with great confidence asserted in an ale-house which he used to frequent, railing at the archbishop, and saying that he had no more learning than a goose. Some people of the parish informed lord Cromwell of this, and the priest was committed to the Fleet prison. When he had been there nine or ten weeks, he sent a relation of his to the archbishop, to beg his pardon, and to sue for a discharge. The archbishop instantly sent for him, and after a gentle reproof, asked the priest whether he knew him? To whom he answering, No; the archbishop expostulated with him, why he should then make so free with his character. The priest excused himself, by saying he was disguised with liquor; but this, Cranmer told him, was a double fault. He then said to the priest, if he was inclined to try what a scholar he was, he should have liberty to oppose him in whatever science he pleased. The priest humbly asked his pardon, and confessed himself to be very ignorant, and to understand nothing but his mother-tongue. No doubt then (said Cranmer) you are well versed in the English Bible, and can answer any question out of that: pray tell me who was David's father? The priest stood still for some time to consider; but at last told the archbishop he could not recollect his name.—Tell me then (says Cranmer) who was Solomon's father? The poor priest replied, that he had no skill in genealogies, and could not tell. The archbishop then advising him to frequent ale-houses less, and his study more, and admonishing him not to accuse others for want of learning till he was master of some himself, discharged him out of custody, and sent him home to his cure.

These may serve as instances of Cranmer's clement temper. Indeed, he was much blamed by many for his too great lenity; which, it was thought, encouraged the Popish faction to make fresh attempts against him; but he was happy in giving a shining example of that great Christian virtue which he most diligently taught.

The king, who was a good discernor of men, remarking the implacable hatred of Cranmer's enemies towards him, changed his coat of arms from three cranes to three pelicans feeding their young with their own blood, and told his grace, "That these birds should signify to him, that he ought to be ready, like the pelican, to shed his blood for his young ones, brought up in the faith of Christ; for, said the king, you are like to be tried, if you will stand to your tackling, at length." The event proved the king to be no bad prophet.

In 1546, king Henry experienced the impartiality of death; and left his crown to his only son, Edward, who was godson to Cranmer, and had imbibed all the spirit of a reformer. This excellent young prince, influenced no less by his own inclinations than by the advice of Cranmer, and other friends of reformation, was diligent in every endeavour to promote it. Homilies were composed by the archbishop, and a Catechism; Erasmus's Notes on the New Testament translated, and fixed up in churches; the sacrament administered in both kinds; and the liturgy used in the vulgar tongue. Ridley, the archbishop's great friend, and one of the brightest lights of the English reformation, was equally zealous in the good cause: and with him the archbishop drew up the forty-two articles of religion, which were revised by other bishops and divines; as through him he had perfectly conquered all his scruples respecting the doctrine of the corporal presence, and published a much esteemed treatise, entitled, A Defence of the true and catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

But this happy scene of prosperity was not to continue: God was pleased to deprive the nation of king Edward, in 1553, designing in his wise providence to perfect the new-born church of his Son Jesus Christ, in England, by the blood of martyrs, as at the beginning he perfected the church in general.

Anxious for the success of the reformation, and wrought upon by the artifices of the duke of Northumberland, king Edward had been persuaded to exclude his sisters, and to bequeath the crown to that duke's amiable and every way deserving daughter, the lady Jane Gray. The archbishop did his utmost to oppose this alteration in the succession; but the king was over-ruled; the will was made, and subscribed by the council and the judges. The archbishop was sent for last of all, and required to subscribe: but he answered, that he could not do it without perjury, having sworn to the entail of the crown on the two princesses, Mary and Elizabeth. To this the king replied, That the judges, who being best skilled in the constitution, ought to be regarded in this point, had assured him that, notwithstanding that entail, he might lawfully bequeath the crown to lady Jane. The archbishop desired to discourse with them himself about it; and they all agreeing that he might lawfully subscribe the king's will, he was at last prevailed with to resign his own private scruples to their authority, and set his hand to it.

Having done this, he thought himself obliged in conscience to join the lady Jane: but her short-lived power soon expired; when Mary and persecution mounted the throne, and Cranmer could expect nothing less than what ensued,—attainder, imprisonment, deprivation, and death.

He was condemned for treason, and pardoned; but to gratify Gardiner's malice, and her own implacable resentment against him for her mother's divorce, Mary gave orders to proceed against him for heresy. His friends, who foresaw the storm, had advised him to consult his safety by retiring beyond sea; but he chose rather to continue steady to the cause, which he so nobly supported hitherto, and preferred the probability of sealing his testimony with his blood, to an ignominious and dishonourable flight.

The Tower was crowded with prisoners, insomuch that Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, and Bradford, were all put into one chamber; which they were so far from thinking an inconvenience, that, on the contrary, they blessed God for the opportunity of conversing together, reading and comparing the scriptures, confirming themselves in the true faith, and mutually exhorting each other to constancy in professing it, and patience in suffering for it.—Happy society! blessed martyrs! rather to be envied than the purpled tyrant with the sword deep drenched in blood, though encircled with all the pomp and pageantry of power.

In April, 1554, the archbishop, with bishop Ridley and Latimer, was removed from the Tower to Windsor, and from thence to Oxford, to dispute with some select persons of both universities. But, alas! what farces are disputations, where the fate of men is fixed, and every word is misconstrued! And such was the case here: for on April the 20th Cranmer was brought to St. Mary's before the queen's commissioners, and refusing to subscribe to the Popish articles, he was pronounced an heretic, and sentence of condemnation was passed upon him. Upon which he told them, that he appealed from their unjust sentence to that of the Almighty; and that he trusted to be received into his presence in heaven for maintaining the truth, as set forth in his most holy gospel.

After this, his servants were dismissed from their attendance, and himself closely confined in Bocardo, the prison of the city of Oxford. But this sentence being void of law, as the pope's authority was wanting, a new commission was sent from Rome in 1555; and in St. Mary's church, at the high altar, the court sat, and tried the already condemned Cranmer. He was here well nigh too strong for his judges; and if reason and truth could have prevailed, there would have been no doubt who should have been acquitted, and who condemned.

The February following, a new commission was given to bishop Bonner and bishop Thirlby, for the degradation of the archbishop. When they came down to Oxford, he was brought before them; and after they had read their commission from the pope, (for not appearing before whom in person, as they had cited him, he was declared contumacious, though they themselves had kept him a close prisoner,) Bonner in a scurrilous oration insulted over him in the most unchristian manner, for which he was often rebuked by bishop Thirlby, who wept, and declared it the most sorrowful scene he had ever beheld in his whole life. In the commission it was declared, that the cause had been impartially heard at Rome, the witnesses on both sides examined, and the archbishop's counsel allowed to make the best defence for him they could.

At the reading of this, the archbishop could not help crying out, "Good God! what lies are these! that I, being continually in prison, and not suffered to have counsel or advocate at home, should produce witness and appoint my counsel at Rome. God must needs punish this shameless and open lying!"

When Bonner had finished his invective, they proceeded to degrade him; and that they might make him as ridiculous as they could, the episcopal habit which they put on him was made of canvass and old rags. Bonner in the meantime, by way of triumph and mockery, calling him Mr. Canterbury, and the like.

He bore all this treatment with his wonted fortitude and patience, and told them the degradation gave him no concern, for he had long despised those ornaments; but when they came to take away his crosier, he held it fast, and delivered his appeal to Thirlby, saying, "I appeal to the next general council."

When they had stripped him of all his habits, they put on him a poor yeoman-beadle's gown, threadbare and ill-shaped, and a townsman's cap; and in this manner delivered him to the secular power to be carried back to prison, where he was kept entirely destitute of money, and totally secluded from his friends. Nay, such was the iniquity of the times, that a gentleman was taken into custody by Bonner, and narrowly escaped a trial, for giving the poor archbishop money to buy him a dinner.

Cranmer had now been imprisoned almost three years, and death should have soon followed his sentence and degradation: but his cruel enemies reserved him for greater misery and insult. Every means that could be thought of was employed to shake his constancy; but he held fast to the profession of his faith. Nay, even when he saw the barbarous martyrdoms of his dear companions, Ridley and Latimer, he was so far from shrinking, that he not only prayed to God to strengthen them, but also by their example to animate him to a patient expectation and endurance of the same fiery trial.

The Papists, after trying various severe ways to bring Cranmer over, without effect, at length determined to try what gentle methods would do. They accordingly removed him from prison to the lodgings of the dean of Christ-church, where they urged every persuasive and affecting argument to make him deviate from his faith; and, indeed, too much melted his gentle nature, by false sunshine of pretended civility and respect.

The unfortunate prelate, however, withstood every temptation; at which his enemies were so irritated, that they removed him from the dean's lodgings to the most loathsome part of the prison in which he had been confined, and then treated him with unparalleled severity. This was more than the infirmities of so old a man could support: the frailty of human nature prevailed, and he was induced to sign six different recantations, drawn from him by the malice and artifices of his enemies.

This, however, did not satisfy them: they were determined not to spare his life. Nothing less than his death could satiate the gloomy queen, who said, "that as he had been the promoter of heresy, which had corrupted the whole nation, the abjuration, which was sufficient in other cases, should not serve his turn; for she was resolved he should be burned." Accordingly she sent orders to Dr. Cole, to prepare a sermon on the occasion of his death, which was fixed to be on the 21st of March.

The archbishop had no suspicion that such would be his fate, after what he had done; but he soon found his mistake.

The Papists, determined to carry their resentment to the most extravagant length, thought to inflict a farther punishment on him, by obliging him to read his recantation publicly in St. Mary's church; and on this they proposed to triumph in his death: but their base intentions were happily frustrated.

On the morning of the day appointed for his execution, he was conducted between two friars to St. Mary's church. As soon as he entered, Dr. Cole mounted the pulpit, and the archbishop was placed opposite to it on a low scaffold, a spectacle of contempt and scorn to the people.

Cole magnified his conversion as the immediate work of God's inspiration; exhorted him to bear up with resolution against the terrors of death; and by the example of the thief on the cross, encouraged him not to despair, since he was returned, though late, into the bosom of the church. He also assured him, that dirges and masses should be said for his soul in all the churches of Oxford.

As soon as the archbishop perceived, from Cole's sermon, what was the bloody decree, struck with horror at the base inhumanity of such proceedings, he gave by all his gestures a full proof of the deep anguish of his soul.

At length, being called upon by Cole to declare his faith and reconciliation with the Catholic church, he rose with all possible dignity, and, while the audience was wrapped in the most profound expectation, he kneeled down, and repeated the following prayer:

"O Father of heaven! O Son of God, redeemer of the world! O Holy Ghost, proceeding from them both! three Persons and one God, have mercy upon me, most wretched and miserable sinner! I, who have offended both heaven and earth, and more grievously than any tongue can express, whither then may I go, or where shall I fly for succour? To heaven I may be ashamed to lift up mine eyes, and in earth I find no refuge: what shall I then do? shall I despair? God forbid! O good God, thou art merciful, and refusest none who come to thee for succour! To thee therefore do I run: to thee do I humble myself, saying, O Lord God, my sins be great, but yet have mercy upon me, for thy great mercy! O God the Son, thou wast not made man, this great mystery was not wrought, for few or small offences; nor didst thou give thy Son unto death, O God the Father, for our little and small sins only, but for all the greatest sins of the world: so that the sinner return unto thee with a penitent heart, as I do here at this present; wherefore have mercy upon me, O Lord, whose property is always to have mercy: for although my sins be great, yet thy mercy is greater. I crave nothing, O Lord, for my own merits, but for thy name's sake, that it may be glorified thereby, and for thy dear Son Jesus Christ's sake. And now, therefore, our Father, &c."

He then rose up, exhorted the people to a contempt of this world, to obedience to their sovereign, and to mutual love and charity. He told them, that being now on the brink of eternity, he would declare unto them his faith, without reserve or dissimulation. He then repeated the Apostles' Creed, and professed his belief thereof, and of all things contained in the Old and New Testament.

By speaking thus in general terms, the attention of the audience was kept up; but amazement continued that attention, when they heard him, instead of reading his recantation, declare his great and unfeigned repentance for having been induced to subscribe the popish errors; he lamented with many tears, his grievous fall, and declared, that the hand which had so offended should be burnt before the rest of his body.

He then renounced the pope in most express terms, and professed his belief concerning the eucharist to be the same with what he had asserted in his book against Gardiner.

This was a great disappointment to the Papists; they made loud clamours, and charged him with hypocrisy and falsehood. To which he meekly replied, that he "was a plain man, and never had acted the hypocrite, but when he was seduced by them to recantation."

He would have gone on further? but Cole cried, Stop the heretic's mouth, and take him away.

Upon this the monks and friars rudely pulled him from the scaffold, and hurried him away to the stake, (where Ridley and Latimer had before been offered up,) which was at the north side of the city, in the ditch opposite Baliol-college.

But if his enemies were disappointed by his behaviour in the church, they were doubly so by that at the stake. He approached it with a cheerful countenance, prayed and undressed himself; his shirt was made long down to his feet, which were bare, as was his head, where a hair could not be seen. His beard was so long and thick, that it covered his face with wonderful gravity: and his reverend countenance moved the hearts both of friends and enemies.

The friars tormented him with their admonitions; while Cranmer gave his hand to several old men who stood by, bidding them farewell. When he was chained to the stake, and the fire kindled, he seemed superior to all sensation but of piety. He stretched out the offending hand to the flame, which was seen burning for some time before the fire came to any other part of his body; nor did he draw it back, but once to wipe his face, till it was entirely consumed; saying often, This unworthy hand, this hand hath offended! and raising up his eyes to heaven, he expired with the dying prayer of St. Stephen in his mouth, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!

He burned to all appearance without pain or motion; and seemed to repel the torture by mere strength of mind, shewing a repentance and fortitude, which ought to cancel all reproach of timidity in his life.

Thus died archbishop Cranmer, in the 67th year of his age, and the 23d of his primacy, leaving an only son, of his own name, behind him.

He was a man naturally of a mild and gentle temper, not soon provoked, and yet so easy to forgive, that it became a kind of proverb concerning him, "Do my lord of Canterbury a shrewd turn, and he will be your friend as long as you live."

His candour and sincerity, meekness and humility, were admired by all who conversed with him: but the queen could not forgive his zeal for the reformation, nor his divorce of her mother, and therefore she brought him to the stake; which has justly numbered him amongst the noblest martyrs who suffered for the truth of the gospel.

He may truly be ranked with the greatest primitive bishops, and the fathers of the very first class, who were men as well as himself; and therefore, if in a scrutiny of their's, or of his character, some infirmities and imperfections may appear, we may learn to make a wise and moral improvement by them. His learning was great, and his endeavour to encourrage it greater. To him, under God, we are indebted for the great blessing we enjoy of Reformation, of which he was the pillar and ornament; and while we repeat the liturgy, and hear the Bible, in our congregations, so long shall we venerate the name of Archbishop Cranmer.

Cranmer's labours were well seconded by Ridley, Latimer, and Hooper, who were his fellow-martyrs in the cause of reformation: but the characters of this illustrious quadrumvirate differed one from the other: Cranmer was most respected, Latimer was most followed, Ridley best esteemed, and Hooper most beloved. The art and address of Cranmer proved a happy balance to the zeal of Latimer, while the relaxed notions of Hooper were tempered by the virtue and wisdom of Ridley.

Mr. Cranmer during his imprisonment wrote a great number of letters to different persons, whom he knew to be professors of Christ's gospel. Among these we shall preserve the following:

A Letter from Archbishop Cranmer to Mrs. Wilkinson, exhorting her to fly in the time of persecution.

"The true comforter in all distress is only God, through his Son Jesus Christ; and whoever hath him, hath company enough, if he were in a wilderness all alone; and he that hath twenty thousand in his company, if God be absent, is in a miserable wilderness and desolation. In him is all comfort, and without him is none. Wherefore I beseech you, seek your dwelling there, where you may truly and rightly serve God, and dwell in him, and have him ever dwelling in you. What can be so heavy a burden as an unquiet conscience, to be in such a place as a man cannot be suffered to serve God in Christ's religion? if you be loath to depart from your kindred and friends, remember that Christ called them his mother, sisters, and brothers, that do his Father's will. Where we find, therefore, God truly honoured according to his will, there we can lack neither friend nor kindred.

"If you be loath to depart for the slander of God's word, remember, that Christ, when his hour was not yet come, departed out of his country into Samaria, to avoid the malice of the Scribes and Pharisees; and commanded his apostles, that if they were pursued in one place, they should fly to another. And was not Paul let down by a basket out of a window, to avoid the persecution of Aretas? And what wisdom and policy he used, from time to time, to escape the malice of his enemies, the Acts of the Apostles do declare. And after the same sort did the other apostles: albeit, when it came to such a point that they could no longer escape danger of the persecutors of God's true religion, then they shewed themselves that their flying before came not of fear, but of godly wisdom to do more good; and that they would not rashly, without urgent necessity, offer themselves to death; which had been but a temptation of God. Yea, when they were apprehended, and could no longer avoid, then they stood boldly to the profession of Christ, then they shewed how little they regarded death; and how much they feared God more than men, how much they loved and preferred the eternal life to come above this short and miserable life.

"Wherefore I exhort you, as well by Christ's commandment, as by the example of him and his apostles, to withdraw yourself from the malice of your and God's enemies, into some place where God is most purely served; which is no slandering of the truth, but preserving of yourself to God and the truth, and to the society and comfort of Christ's little flock. And that you will do, do it with speed, lest by your own folly you fall into the persecutors' hands. And the Lord send his Holy Spirit to lead and guide you wheresoever you go! and all that be godly will say, Amen."

AGNES POTTEN and JOAN TRUNCHFIELD, and other Martyrs.

In the story of Robert Samuel, mention was made before of two godly women of the same town of Ipswich, which shortly after him suffered likewise, and obtained the crown of martyrdom: the names of whom were, Agnes, the wife of Robert Potten, and another, Joan, wife of Michael Trunchfield, a shoemaker, both dwelling in one town: who, about the same time that the archbishop was burned at Oxford, suffered likewise in the town of Ipswich.

Their opinion was this, that in the sacrament was the memorial only of Christ's death and passion: For, say they, Jesus Christ is ascended up into heaven, and is on the right hand of God the Father, according to the scriptures, and not in the sacrament as he was born of the Virgin Mary.

For this they were burned; in whose suffering their constancy was to be wondered at, who being simple women, resolutely stood to the confession and testimony of God's word and truth; inasmuch that when they had prepared and undressed themselves ready for the fire, with comfortable words of the scripture they earnestly required the people to credit and to lay hold on the word of God, and not upon man's devices and inventions, despising the ordinances and institutions of the Romish Antichrist, with all his superstitions and rotten religion; and so continuing in the torment of fire, they held up their hands, and called unto God constantly so long as life did endure.

This Potten's wife, one night a little before her death, being asleep in her bed, saw a bright burning fire, right up as a pole, and on the side of the fire she thought there stood a number of queen Mary's friends looking on. Then, being asleep, she seemed to muse with herself whether her fire should burn so bright or no? and indeed her suffering was not far unlike to her dream.

This also I thought further to note, how these two being always together in prison, the one, which was Michael's wife, seemed to be not so ardent and zealous as Potten's wife was, although (God be thanked) they did both stoutly stand to the confession of the truth; but when the said Michael's wife came to the stake, and saw nothing but present death before her, she much exceeded the other in joy and comfort: albeit both of them did so joyfully suffer, as it was marvelled at by those that knew them, and did behold their end. And thus these two martyrs ended their life with great triumph.

The Story of JOHN MAUNDREL, WILLIAM COBERLY, and JOHN SPICER, Martyrs.

First, John Maundrel, which was the son of Robert Maundrel, of Rowd, in the county of Wiltshire, farmer, was from his childhood brought up in husbandry, and after he came to man's state, did abide and dwell in a village called Buchampton, in the parish of Kevel, within the county of Wiltshire aforesaid, where he had wife and children, being of good name and fame. Which John Maundrel, after that the scripture was translated into English by the faithful apostle of England, William Tindal, became a diligent hearer and a fervent embracer of God's true religion, so that he delighted in nothing so much, as to hear and speak of God's word, never being without the New Testament about him, although he could not read himself. But when he came into any company that could read, his book was always ready, having a very good memory ; so that he could recite by heart most places of the New Testament.

So it was, that in the days of king Henry the Eighth, at what time Dr. Trigonion and Dr. Lee did visit the abbeyes, the said John Maundrel was brought before Dr. Trigonion at an abbey called Edyngton, within the county of Wiltshire aforesaid ; where he was accused that he had spoken against the holy water and holy bread, and such like ceremonies, and for the same did wear a white sheet, bearing a candle in his hand about the market, in the town of Devizes, which is in the said county. Nevertheless, his fervency did not abate, but by God's merciful assistance he took better hold, as the sequel will declare.

For in the days of queen Mary, when popery was restored again, and God's true religion put to silence, the said John Maundrel left his own house, and departed into the county of Gloucestershire, and into the north part of Wiltshire, wandering from one to another to such men as he knew feared God, and became a servant to keep cattle. He spent some time with John Bridges, or some other, at Kingswood ; but after a time he returned to his country, and there coming to the Vyes, to a friend of his named Anthony Clee, had talk with him in a garden of returning home to his house.

And when the other exhorted him, by the words of scripture, to fly from one city to another, he replied again by the words of the Apoccalypse xxi. of them that be fearful, &c. saying, that he needs must go home ; and so did. Where he, with Spicer and Coberly, used at times to confer together.

At length, upon the Sunday following, they agreed together to go to the parish church of Kevel, where the said Maundrel and the other two, seeing the parishioners in the procession to follow and worship the idol there carried, advertised them to leave the same, and to return to the living God, namely, speaking to one Robert Barksdale, head man of the parish ; but he took no regard to their words.

After this, the vicar came into the pulpit, who there being about to read his bederol, and to pray for the souls in purgatory ; the said John Maundrel, speaking with an audible voice, said, that was the pope's pinfold ; the other two affirming the same. After which words, by commandment of the priest, they were had to the stocks, where they remained till the service was done, and then were brought before a justice of peace, and so the next day carried to Salisbury all three, and presented before bishop Capon, and W. Geoffrey, being chancellor of the diocese. By whom they were imprisoned, and oftentimes examined of their faith in their houses, but seldom openly ; and at the last examination they demanded how they did believe ?

They answered, As Christian men should and ought to believe : and first, they said, they believed in God the Father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost, the twelve articles of the creed, and the holy scripture, from the first of Genesis to the last of the Apoccalypse.

But that faith the chancellor would not allow. Wherefore he opposed them in particular articles : first, whether that they did not believe that in the sacrament of the altar (as he termed it) after the words of consecration spoken by the priest at mass, there remained no substance of bread nor wine, but Christ's body, flesh and blood, as he was born of the Virgin Mary ? Whereunto they answered negatively, saying, That the popish mass was abominable idolatry, and injurious to the blood of Christ ; but confessing that in a faithful congregation, receiving the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, being duly ministered according to Christ's institution, Christ's body and blood is spiritually received of the faithful believer.

Also, being asked whether the pope was supreme head of the church, and Christ's vicar on earth ; they answered negatively, saying, That the bishop of Rome doth usurp over emperors and kings, being Antichrist, and God's enemy. The chancellor said, Will you have the church without a head ? They answered, Christ was the head of his church ; and under Christ, the queen's majesty. What, said the chancellor, a woman head of the church ! Yea, said they, within her grace's dominions.

Also, whether the souls in purgatory were delivered by the pope's pardons, and the suffrages of the church ? they said, They believed faithfully that the blood of Christ had purged their sins, and the sins of them that were saved unto the end of the world ; so that they feared nothing the pope's purgatory, or esteemed his pardons.

Also, whether images were necessary to be in the churches, as laymen's books, and saints to be prayed unto and worshipped : they answered negatively : John Maundrel adding, that wooden images were good to roast a shoulder of mutton, but evil in the church, whereby idolatry was committed.

Those articles thus answered, (for their articles were one, and their answers in a manner alike,) the chancellor read their condemnation, and so delivered them to the sheriff. Then spake John Spicer, saying, O master sheriff, now must you be their butcher, that you may be guilty also with them of innocent blood before the Lord. This was the 23d of Mareh, anno 1556, and the 24th day of the same month they were carried out of the common gaol to a place betwixt Salisbury and Wilton, where were two posts set for them to be burnt at. Which men coming to the place, kneeled down, and made their prayers secretly together ; and then being unclothed to their shirts, John Maundrel spake with a loud voice, Not for all Salisbury ! Which words men judged to be an answer to the sheriff, which offered him the queen's pardon if he would recant. And after that in like manner spake J. Spicer, saying, This is the joyfulest day that ever I saw. Thus were they three burnt at two stakes ; where most constantly they gave their bodies to the fire, and their souls to the Lord, for testimony of his truth.

As touching William Coberly, this moreover is to be noted, that his wife also, called Alice, being apprehended, was in the keeper's house the same time detained while her husband was in prison. Where the keeper's wife, named Agnes Penicote, had secretly heated a key fire-hot, and laid it on the grass in the back side. So speaking to Alice Coberly to fetch her the key in all haste, the said Alice went with speed to bring the key : and so taking up the key in haste, did piteously burn her hand. Whereupon she crying out at the sudden burning of her hand : Ah, thou drab, (quoth the other,) thou that canst not abide the burning of the key, how wilt thou be able to abide burning thy whole body ? And so she afterwards revoked.

These six pious Christians resided in the county of Essex, and diocese of London. Being accused of heresy, they were all apprehended, and sent by the lord Rich, and other commissioners, at different times, to bishop Gardiner, lord chancellor of England ; who, after a short examination, sent the four first to the Marshalsea prison, in the Borough, and the two last to the King's Bench, where they continued during the space of a whole year, till the death of Bishop Gardiner.

When Dr. Heath, archbishop of York, succeeded to the chancellorship, four of these persecuted brethren, namely, Richard and Thomas Spurg, John Cavill, and George Ambrose, weary of their tedious confinement, presented a petition to the lord chancellor, subscribing their names, and requesting his interest for their enlargement. A short time after the delivery of this petition, sir Richard Read, one of the officers of the court of Chancery, was sent by the chancellor to the Marshalsea to examine them.

RICHARD SPURG, the first who passed examination, being asked the cause of his imprisonment, replied, that he, with several others, being complained of by the minister of Bocking, for not coming to their parish church, to the lord Rich, was thereupon sent up to London by his lordship, to be examined by the late chancellor.

He acknowledged that he had not been at church since the English service was changed into Latin, (except on Christmas-day was twelvemonth,) because he disliked the same, and the mass also, as not agreeable to God's holy word.

He then desired that he might be no farther examined concerning this matter, until it pleased the present chancellor to inquire his faith concerning the same, which he was ready to deliver.

THOMAS SPURG, on his examination, answered to the same effect with the other, confessing that he absented himself from church, because the word of God was not then truly taught, nor the sacraments of Christ duly administered, as prescribed by the same word.

Being farther examined touching his faith in the sacrament of the altar; he said, that if he stood accused in that particular, he would answer as God had given him knowledge, which he should do at another opportunity.

JOHN CAVILL likewise agreed in the chief particulars with his brethren; but farther said, the cause of his absenting himself from church was, that the minister there had advanced two doctrines contrary to each other; for, first, in a sermon he delivered when the queen came to the crown, he exhorted the people to believe the gospel, declaring it to be the truth, and that, if they believed it not, they would be damned; and that, secondly, in a future discourse, he declared that the New Testament was false in forty places; which contrariety gave him much disgust, and was, among other things, the cause of his absenting himself from church.

GEORGE AMBROSE answered to the same effect, adding moreover, that after he had read the late bishop of Winchester's book, entitled, De Vera Obedientia, with bishop Bonner's preface thereto annexed, both inveighing against the authority of the bishop of Rome, he esteemed their principles more lightly than he had done before.

ROBERT DRAKE was minister of Thundersly, in Essex, to which living he had been presented by the lord Rich in the reign of Edward VI. when he was ordained priest by Dr. Ridley, then bishop of London, according to the reformed English service for ordination.

On the accession of queen Mary to the throne of England, he was sent for by Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, who demanded of him, whether he would conform, like a good subject, to the laws of the realm then in force? He answered, that he would abide by those laws that were agreeable to the law of God; upon which he was immediately committed to prison.

WILLIAM TIMS was a deacon and curate of Hockley, in Essex, in the reign of king Edward VI. but being deprived of his living soon after the death of that monarch, he absconded, and privately preached in a neighbouring wood, whither many of his flock attended to hear the word of God.

In consequence of these proceedings, he was apprehended by one of the constables, and sent up to the bishop of London, by whom he was referred to Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor, who committed him to the King's-bench prison.

A short time after his confinement, he, with the others before mentioned, was ordered to appear before the bishop of London, who questioned them in the usual manner concerning their faith in the sacrament of the altar.

Mr. Tims answered, that the body of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar, really and corporally, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest; and that he had been a long time of that opinion, ever since it had pleased God of his infinite mercy to call him to the true knowledge of the gospel of his grace.

On the 28th of March, 1556, these six persons were all brought into the consistory court, in St. Paul's church, before the bishop of London, in order to be examined for the last time, who assured them, that if they did not submit to the church of Rome, they should be condemned for heresy.

The bishop began his examination with Tims, whom he called the ringleader of the others: he told him, that he had taught them heresies, confirmed them in their erroneous opinions, and endeavoured, so far as in him lay, to render them as abominable as himself: with many other accusations equally false and opprobrious.

He was then asked by the bishop, what he had to say in his own vindication, in order to prevent him proceeding against him as his ordinary? To which he replied as follows:

"My lord, I marvel that you will begin with a lie. You call me the ringleader and teacher of this company; but how untruly you have said, shall shortly appear. For there is none of all these my brethren, which are brought hither as prisoners, but when they were at liberty and out of prison, they dissented from you and your doings, as much as they do at this present, and for that cause they are now prisoners. So it is evident that they learned not their religion in prison.

"And as for me, I never knew them, until such time as I by your commandment was prisoner with them; how could I then be their ringleader and teacher? So that all the world may see how untruly you have spoken.

"And as for my fault, which you make so grievous, whatsoever you judge of me, I am well assured that I hold none other religion than Christ preached, the apostles witnessed, the primitive church received, and now of late the apostolical and evangelical preachers of this realm have faithfully taught; for the which you have cruelly burned them, and now you seek our blood also. Proceed on hardly by what rule you will: I force not, I do not refuse you for my ordinary."

The bishop then finding it necessary to come to a point with him, demanded if he would submit himself to the holy mother-church: promising that if he did, he should be kindly received; and threatening, at the same time, that if he did not, judgment should be pronounced against him as an heretic.

In answer to this, Tims told his lordship he was well persuaded that he was within the pale of the Catholic church, whatever he might think; and reminded him, that he had most solemnly abjured that very church to which he since professed such strenuous allegiance; and that, contrary to his oath, he again admitted in this realm the authority of the pope, and was therefore perjured and forsworn in the highest degree. He also recalled to his memory, that he had spoken with great force and perspicuity against the usurped power of the pope, though he afterwards sentenced persons to be burnt, because they would not acknowledge the pope to be the supreme head of the church.

Have I? said Bonner, sternly. Where have I written any thing against the church of Rome?

"My lord, (said Tims,) the bishop of Winchester wrote a very learned oration, entitled, De Vera Obedientia, which containeth worthy matter against the Romish authority: unto the which book you made a preface, inveighing against the bishop of Rome, reproving his tyranny and falsehood, calling his power false and pretended. The book is extant, and you cannot deny it."

The bishop, struck with the poignancy of this reproof, evasively told him, that the bishop of Winchester wrote a book against the supremacy of the pope's holiness, and he wrote a preface to the same book, tending to the same purpose; but that the cause of the same arose not from their disregard to his holiness, but because it was then deemed treason by the laws of the realm to maintain the pope's authority in England.

He also observed, that at such time it was dangerous to profess to favour the church of Rome, and therefore fear compelled them to comply with the prevailing opinions of the times: for if any person had conscientiously acknowledged the pope's authority in those days, he would have been put to death; but that since the queen's happy accession to the throne, they might boldly speak the dictates of their consciences; and farther reminded him, that as my lord of Winchester was not ashamed to recant his errors at Paul's cross, and that he himself had done the same; every inferior clergyman should follow the example of their superiors.

Mr. Tims still persisting in the vindication of his own conduct, and reprehension of that of the bishop, again replied, "My lord, that which you have written against the supremacy of the pope, may be well proved from scripture; that which you now do is contrary to the word of God, as I can sufficiently prove."

Bonner, after much farther conversation, proceeded to form of law, causing his articles, with the respective answers to each, to be publicly read in court.

Mr. Tims acknowledged only two sacraments, baptism, and the Lord's supper; commended the bishop of Winchester's book, De Vera Obedientia, and the bishop of London's preface to the same. He declared that the mass was blasphemy against Christ's passion and death; that Christ is not corporally but spiritually present in the sacrament, and that, as they used it, it was an abominable idol.

Bonner exhorted him to revoke his errors and heresies, conform to the church of Rome, and not abide so strenuously by the literal sense of the scripture, but use the interpretation of the fathers.

Our martyr frankly declared he would not conform thereunto, notwithstanding the execrations denounced against him by the church of Rome; and demanded of the bishop what he had to support the doctrine of the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, but the bare letter of scripture?

On the bishop's replying, The authority of the holy Catholic church; Tims informed him, that he had the Popish church, for which he was perjured and forsworn; declaring that the see of Rome was the see of Antichrist, and therefore he would never consent to yield obedience to the same.

The bishop, finding Mr. Tims so inflexible in his adherence to the faith he professed, that every attempt to draw him from it was vain and fruitless, read his definitive sentence; and he was delivered over to the secular power.

Bonner then used the same measures with Drake as he had done with Tims; but Drake frankly declared, that he denied the church of Rome, with all the works thereof, even as he denied the devil and all his works.

The bishop perceiving all his exhortations fruitless, pronounced sentence of condemnation, and he was immediately delivered into the custody of the sheriff's.

After this, Thomas and Richard Spurg, George Ambrose, and John Cavill, were severally asked, if they would forsake their heresies, and return to the Catholic church? They all refused consenting to the church of Rome; but said, they were willing to adhere to the true Catholic church, and continue in the same.

Bonner then read their several definitive sentences; after which he committed them to the custody of the sheriff's of London, by whom they were conducted to Newgate.

On the 14th of April, 1556, the day appointed for their execution, they were all led to Smithfield, where they were chained to the same stake, and burnt in one fire, patiently submitting themselves to the flames, and resigning their souls into the hands of that glorious Redeemer, for whose sake they delivered their bodies to be burnt.

LETTERS OF WILLIAM TIMS.

To his faithful sister in the Lord, parishioner in the town of Hockley, Agnes Glascock.

"The grace, mercy, and peace, of God our Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to your everlasting comfort, be with you, my dear sister Glascock, both now and evermore, Amen.

"My most dear and entirely beloved sister, (yea, mother I might rightly well call you, for the motherly care which you have always had for me,) I have me most heartily commended unto you, giving God most hearty thanks for you, that he hath given you so loving a heart, to Christ's poor gospel, and his poor afflicted flock for the same: and as you have full godly begun, so I beseech God to give you power to go forward in the same, and never more to look back, fearing neither fire, neither sword: and then, I warrant you, you have not far to run.

"And now, my dear heart, remember well what I have taught you when I was present with you, and also written being absent, and no doubt we shall shortly meet again with a most joyful meeting. I go upon Friday next to the bishop of London's coal-house, which is the 20th day of March, where I think it will be hard for any of my friends to speak with me. Howbeit, I trust I shall not long tarry there, but shortly after be carried up after my dear brethren and sisters, which are gone before me into heaven in a fiery chariot: therefore now I take my leave of you, till we meet in heaven; and lie you after. I have tarried a great while for you, and seeing you be so long a making ready, I will tarry no longer for you. You shall find me merrily singing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth, at my journey's end. Therefore now, my dear heart, make good haste, and loiter not by the way, lest night take you, and so ye be shut out of the gate, with the foolish virgins. And now, my sister, in witness that I have taught you nothing but the truth, here I write my name with my blood for a testimonial unto you, that I will seal the simple doctrine which I have taught you, with the rest. And thus fare you well: and God defend you from Antichrist, and all his ministers, the false priests, Amen.

[These words following were written with his own blood:]

"Continue instant in prayer—ask in faith—and obtain your desire. By me, WILLIAM TIMS, in the King's Bench for the gospel of Christ."

Another Letter of the said William Tims, wherein he comforts his sister Glaseock, being in great sorrow and repentance for going to the mass.

"God be merciful unto you, pardon and forgive all your sins, and send you faith to believe the same, that you may be partaker of his heavenly kingdom, Amen.

"My dear sister, I have most heartily commended unto you, and as I have lamented your falling from God, by being partaker with that idolatrous priest; so have I, since I heard of your earnest repentance, very much rejoiced, and also praised Almighty God for his mercy shewn unto you, in that he hath not left you to yourself, but since your denial he hath shewed his mercy on you, by looking back on you as he did on Peter, and so caused you to repent as Peter did, and bitterly to weep for your sins: whereas if God had left you to yourself, you had run forward from one evil to another, till at length your heart should either have been hardened, or else you should have despaired of the mercy of God. And seeing that God hath been so merciful unto you as he hath been, be you not unthankful unto him for the same. For I certify you, that your sorrowful heart that you have had, doth declare unto me that God hath pardoned and forgiven all your sins for the bloodshedding of that immaculate Lamb, Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour.

"Therefore as Peter, after the time that Christ had forgiven him his sin, did boldly confess Christ before all his enemies; even so, my dear heart in the Lord, seeing that God hath so mercifully pardoned and forgiven you your sins, now cleave unto him, and be at defiance with his enemies the Papists. And as they do bear witness with their father the devil, by going to the church, and shedding the innocent blood of all those that will not go with them; even so do you bear witness with Christ, by not coming there. For all those that do go thither shall be partakers of their brethren's blood that is shed for the testimony of Christ, except they repent and amend: which grace that they may so do, I beseech the eternal God for his Christ's sake, if it be his good will, to give them in his good time. And the same good God that hath been so merciful unto you to call you to repentance, him I beseech to keep you in his fear and love, that you may have always affiance in him, and evermore seek his honour and glory, to your everlasting comfort in Christ, Amen. Thus fare you well. From the King's Bench, this 28th of August.

"By me, WILLIAM TIMS."

The Story of JOHN HARPOLE, of the Parish of St. Nicholas, in Rochester; JOAN BEACH, Widow, of Tunbridge; and JOHN HULLIER,—Martyrs.

Against Joan Beach, widow, within the diocese of Rochester, by Maurice, bishop of the said diocese, it was alleged:

1. That she was of the parish of Tunbridge, in the diocese of Rochester.

2. Item, That all persons which preach, teach, believe, or say, otherwise or contrary to that their mother holy Catholic Church of Christ, are excommunicate persons and heretics.

3. Item, That the said Joan Beach hath, and yet doth affirm, maintain, and believe, contrary to the said mother church of Christ, viz. That in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under form of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour, in substance, but only a token and a memorial thereof; that the very body and blood of Christ is in heaven, and not in the sacrament.

4. Item, That she hath been, and yet is, amongst the parishioners of Tunbridge openly noted, and vehemently suspected, to be a sacramentary and heretic.

Her personal Answers to the said Articles.

First, That she was and is of the said parish of Tunbridge, in the diocese of Rochester.

2. That all persons who do preach and hold otherwise and contrary to that which the holy Catholic church of Christ doth, are to be reputed for excommunicate and heretics; adding withal, that nevertheless she believeth not the holy Catholic Church to be her mother, but believeth only the Father of heaven to be her Father.

3. That she hath, and yet doth verily believe, hold, and affirm, in the sacrament of the altar, under forms of bread and wine, not to be the very body and blood of our Saviour in substance, but only a token and remembrance of his death to the faithful receiver, and that his body and substance is only in heaven, and not in the sacrament.

4. Lastly, as touching how she hath been or is noted and reputed among the parishioners of Tunbridge, she said she could not tell; howbeit, she believeth she was so taken and reputed.

Examination and Condemnation of John Harpole and Joan Beach.

The like matter, and the same four articles, were also the same present time and place ministered to John Harpole by the aforesaid bishop Maurice; who, after the like answers received of him as of the other before, adjudged and condemned them both together to death, by one form of sentence.

And thus these two Christian martyrs, coupled in one confession, being condemned by the bishop, suffered together at one fire in the town of Rochester, where they ended their lives about the first of the month of April.

JOHN HULLIER, Minister and Martyr.

Next after these ensueth the martyrdom of John Hullier, minister, who first being brought up in the school of Eton, was afterward scholar and then conductor in the King's-college at Cambridge; suffered under Doctor Thurlby, bishop of Ely, and his chancellor, for the sincere setting out of the light of God's gracious gospel revealed in these our days. In whose behalf this is to be lamented, that so little matter is left unto us touching the process of his judgment and order of his suffering, who so innocently gave his life in such a cause. His martyrdom was about the second of April, 1556.

A Letter of Mr. John Hullier, Minister.

"John Hullier, being of long time prisoner, and now openly judged to die for the testimony of the Lord Jesus, wisheth heartily to the whole congregation of God the strength of his holy Spirit, to their everlasting health both of body and soul.

"I now, most dear Christians, having the sweet comfort of God's saving health, and being confirmed with his free Spirit, (be he only praised therefore,) am constrained in my conscience, thinking it my very duty, to admonish you, as ye tender the salvation of your souls, by all manner of means to separate yourselves from the company of the pope's hirelings, considering what is said in the Revelation of St. John, by the angel of God, touching all men. The words be these, 'If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured into the cup of his wrath, and he shall be punished with fire and brimstone before the holy angels, and before the Lamb, and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up evermore.' Mark well here, good Christians, who is the beast, and worshippers, that shall be partakers of that unspeakable torment: this beast is none other but the carnal and fleshly kingdom of Antichrist, the pope, with his rabble of false prophets and ministers; which, to maintain their high titles, worldly promotions, and dignities, do with much cruelty daily more and more set forth and establish their own traditions, decrees, and decretals, contrary to God's holy ordinances, statutes, laws, and commandments, and wholly repugnant to his sincere and pure religion.

"Now what do they else but worship this beast and his image, who after they had once already escaped from the filthiness of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, are yet again tangled therein, and overcome, using dissimulation for fear of their displeasure, doing one thing outwardly, and thinking inwardly another; so having them in reverence under a cloak and colour, to whom they ought not so much as to say, God speed; and adjoining themselves to the malignant congregation, which they ought to abhor as a den of thieves and murderers, and as the brothel-house of most blasphemous fornicators; whose voices being contrary to Christ's voice, if they were of his flock, they would not know, but would flee from them; as he himself, being the good Shepherd of our souls, doth full well in his holy gospel testify. Again, what do they else, I pray you, but receive the beast's mark in their foreheads and in their hands, which do bear a fair face and countenance outwardly in supporting them, being ashamed openly to confess Christ and his holy gospel? But this dissimulation, Christ and his gospel will in no wise allow; of whom it is said, Luke ix. 'Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in the glory of his Father with his holy angels.' Therefore saith almighty God by his prophet Malachi, ch. i. 'Cursed be the dissemblers.'

"Wherefore, good Christians, for God's most dear love, deceive not yourselves through your own wisdom, and through the wisdom of the world, which is foolishness before God: but certify and stay your own conscience with the sure truth and faithful word of God, and with the infallible testimonies of holy scripture. For although God's mercy is over all his works, yet it doth not extend but only to them that hold fast the confidence and rejoicing in hope unto the end; not being weary in well doing, but rather waxing every day stronger and stronger in the inward man. Therefore in the Revelation of St. John, where it is treated of the beast and his image, it is also said, 'Here is the sufferance of saints, and here are they that keep the commandments and the faith of Jesus Christ,' Rev. xiii. Whereby Almighty God doth shew plainly, that he doth use those wicked men as instruments for a time, to try the patience and faith of his peculiar people, without the performance whereof we can have no part among the living; but as it is said in the same Revelation, 'The fearful shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.'

"But peradventure ye will object and say unto me, What shall we do? Shall we cast ourselves headlong to death? I say not so; but this I say, that we are all bound (if ever we look to receive salvation at God's hand) in this case wholly to be obedient to his determinate counsel and foreknowledge, expressed by the gift of the Spirit in holy scripture; and then to cast all our care upon him, who worketh all in all for the best unto them that love him; and thus he giveth commandment, saying, 'Come away from her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues,' Apoc. xviii. Now, who hearing this terrible voice of God, which must needs be fulfilled, will not with all speed and diligence apply himself to do thereafter, except such as will presumptuously tempt him: Come out from among them, and join not yourselves to their unlawful assemblies; yea, do not once shew yourselves with the least part of your body to favour their wicked doings, but glorify God, as most right is, as well in your whole body outwardly as inwardly in your spirit, or else you can do neither of both well; for your body doth belong to God as well as your spirit. At the dreadful day of judgment we shall all receive the works of our bodies, according to that we have done, whether it be good or bad.

"Therefore whatsoever we do, we may not bring the spirit in bondage to the body, but contrariwise we must subdue the body, and the will of the flesh, to the spirit, that the spirit may freely accomplish the will of God in all things; for otherwise we shall never be partakers of his promise, with the true children of Abraham. For as St. Paul saith, 'They which are the children of the flesh, are not the children of God. If we shall live according to the flesh, we shall die. For to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace; because that the fleshly mind is enmity to God; for it is not obedient to the law of God, neither can be. So then they that are in the flesh, cannot please God.' Now choose you which way you will take: either the narrow way that leadeth unto life, which Christ himself and his faithful followers have gone through before; or else the broad path-way that leadeth to destruction, which the wicked worldlings take their pleasure in for a while. I, for my part, have now written this short admonition unto you of good will, as God is my witness, to exhort you to that way, which at length you yourselves shall prove and find to be best, yea, and rejoice thereof. And I do not only write this, but I will also (with the assistance of God's grace) ratify and confirm, and seal the same with the effusion of my blood, when the full time shall be expired that he hath appointed; which, so far forth as I may judge, must needs be within these few days. Therefore I now bid you all most heartily farewell in the Lord, whose grace be with your spirit, Amen. Watch and pray, watch and pray, pray. So be it.

"JOHN HULLIER."

The Death and Martyrdom of SIX constant PROFESSORS of CHRIST, burned at Colchester, for the testimony of the Gospel, the 28th day of April.

Not long after the death of Robert Drakes, William Tims, and other Essex Martyrs, executed in Smithfield, as is above specified, followed in the same order likewise of martyrdom at one fire, in the town of Colchester, (where the most part of them did inhabit,) six other blessed martyrs, whose names be these:

Christopher Lyster, of Dagneham, husbandman;
John Mace, of Colchester, apothecary;
John Spencer, of Colchester, weaver;
Simon Joyne, sawyer;
Richard Nichols, of Colchester, weaver;
John Hamond, of Colchester, tanner.

Of these above named, the bishop, because he (as it seemed by the short process recorded by his register) waxed now weary, made a very quick despatch. For soon after that they were delivered unto one John Kingstone, bachelor of civil law, and then commissary to the bishop, by the earl of Oxford and other commissioners, (as appeareth by a bill indented, made between the commissioners and the said commissary, for the receipt of the said prisoners, dated the 28th of March, Anno Regni Regis et Regine Philippi et Marie secundo et tertio; which is the year of our Lord 1556,) and by him sent up to his lord and master, the bishop caused them to be brought unto him at Fulham. Where in the open church judicially were ministered unto them the same articles that were propounded unto Bartlet Green, and others, mentioned before. To the which they made their several answers, agreeing together in one truth.

1. To the first article they all consented and agreed; John Spencer adding further thereto, That the church malignant, which is the church of Rome, is no part of Christ's Catholic church; and that he neither hath nor doth believe the doctrine and religion taught and set forth in the said Romish and malignant church.

2. To the second they answered, That they believed that in the true Catholic church of Christ there be but two sacraments; that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ.

3. To the third article they all agreed, confessing that they were baptized in the faith and belief of the Catholic church, and that their godfathers and godmothers had professed and promised for them, as it is contained in the same article.

4. To the fourth they answered, That they always were, and yet then did continue in the faith and profession wherein they were baptized; Richard Nichols adding also, That he had more plainly learned the truth of his profession by the doctrine set forth in king Edward the VIth's days, and thereupon he had builded his faith, and would continue in the same to his life's end, God assisting him.

5. To the fifth they answered, That they neither swerved nor went away from the Catholic faith of Christ. Howbeit they confessed that within the time articulate, and before, they had misliked and earnestly spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, and against the sacrament of the altar, affirming that they would not come to hear or to be partakers thereof, because they had and then did believe, that they were set forth and used contrary to God's word and glory. And, moreover, they did grant, that they had spoken against the usurped authority of the bishop of Rome, as an oppressor of Christ's church and gospel, and that he ought not to have any authority in England. For all which sayings they were no whit sorry, but rather rejoiced and were glad.

6. To the sixth they answered, That they never refused, nor yet then presently did refuse, to be reconciled to the unity of Christ's Catholic church. But they said they had, and then did, and so ever would hereafter, utterly refuse to come to the church of Rome, or to acknowledge the authority of the see thereof, but did utterly abhor the same, for putting down the book of God, the Bible, and setting up the Babylonical mass, with all other of Antichrist's merchandise.

7. To the seventh article, the effect thereof they all granted. And Simon Joyne declared further, that the cause of his refusing to be partaker of their trumpery was, for that the commandments of God were there broken, and Christ's ordinances changed and put out, and the bishop of Rome's ordinances instead thereof put in. Moreover, as touching the sacrament of Christ's body, Christopher Lyster affirmed, that in the said sacrament there is the substance of bread and wine, as well after the words of consecration as before; and that there is not in the same the very body and blood of Christ really, substantially, and truly, but only sacramentally and spiritually by faith in the faithful receivers; and that the mass is not propitiatory for the quick or the dead, but mere idolatry and abomination, &c. &c.

These answers thus made, the bishop did dismiss them for that present until the afternoon: at which time having their articles and answers read to them again, and they standing most firmly unto their Christian profession, they were by divers ways and means tried if they would revoke the same their professed faith, and return to the unity of Antichrist's church.

Which thing when they refused, the bishop stoutly pronounced the sentence of condemnation against them, committing them unto the temporal power. Who, upon the receipt of the king and queen's writ, sent them unto Colchester, where the 28th day of April most cheerfully they ended their lives, to the glory of God's holy name, and the great encouragement of others.

THE MARTYRDOM OF VARIOUS PERSONS.

HUGH LAVEROCK, an old man, and JOHN APPRICE, a blind man, Martyrs, burnt at Stratford-le-bonne.

In the discourse of this parcel or part of history, I know not whether more to marvel at the great and unsearchable mercies of God, (with whom there is no respect in degrees of persons, but he chooseth as well the poor, lame, and blind, as the rich, mighty, and healthful, to set forth his glory,) or else to note the unreasonable, or rather unnatural doing of these unmerciful Catholics, in whom was so little favour or mercy to all sorts and kinds of men, that they spared neither impotent age, neither lame nor blind, as may well appear by these poor creatures, whose names and stories hereunder follow: Hugh Laverock, of the parish of Barking, painter, of the age of 68, a lame cripple, and John Apprice, a blind man.

These two poor and simple creatures, being belike accused by some promoting neighbour of theirs unto the bishop, and other of the king and queen's commissioners, were sent for by their officer: and so being brought and delivered into the hands of the said bishop, were the first day of May examined before him in his palace at London, where he first propounded and objected against them those nine articles, whereof mention is made of before, ministered as well unto Bartlet Green, as also unto many others. To which they answered in effect as Christopher Lyster, John Maee, and other before mentioned, had done. Whereupon they were again sent to prison, and beside other times, the 9th of the same month in the consistory of Paul's, were again openly produced, and there (after the old order) exhorted to recant their opinions against the sacrament of the altar.

Whereunto Hugh Laverock first said, I will stand to mine answers, and to that I have confessed: and I cannot find in the scriptures, that the priests should lift up over their head a cake of bread.

The bishop then turned him to J. Apprice, and asked him what he would say? To whom he answered, Your doctrine that ye set forth and teach, is so agreeable with the world, and embraced of the same, that it cannot be agreeable with the scripture of God: and ye are not of the Catholic church, for ye make laws to kill men, and then make the queen to be the executioner.

At which words the bishop, somewhat tickled, and therefore very loath to delay their condemnation any longer, (such now was his hot burning charity,) commanded that they should be brought after him unto Fulham, whither he went before dinner, and there in the afternoon, after his solemn manner, in the open church he pronounced the definitive sentence of condemnation against them, and so delivering them into the hands of the temporal officer, thought to rid his hands of them; but could not so despatch his conscience before the judgment of God, from the guiltiness of innocent blood.

The poor men, being now in the temporal officer's hands, might not there be sufficed long to remain, and therefore the 15th day of May, very early in the morning, were carried from Newgate in a cart to Stratford-le-Bow, and most courageously in the fire praising God, yielded up their souls into his hands, through a lively faith in Jesus Christ, whom unto the end they did most constantly confess.

At their death, Hugh Laverock, after he was chained, cast away his crutch, and comforting John Apprice, his fellow-martyr, said unto him, Be of good comfort, my brother, for my lord of London is our good physician; he will heal us both shortly, thee of thy blindness and me of my lameness. And so patiently these two good saints of God suffered together.

Three Women the same time burnt in Smithfield.

The next day, in the said month of May, were brought to the fire three women, with whom also was afterwards joined another, who being in the same constancy with them, was likewise partaker of the said condemnation.—The names of these were,

Katharine Hut, of Bocking, widow;
Joan Horns, of Bilerica, maid;
Eliz. Thackvel, of Great Burstled, maid;
Margaret Ellis, of Bilerica, maid.

How these, with divers others more, were persecuted and sent up, especially by sir John Mordant and Edmund Tyrel, esq. justices of peace, this their letter following will declare:

“Our humble commendations to your lordship.—These shall be to advertise you, that we have sent unto your good lordship Joan Potter, the wife of Hugh Potter, James Harris, servant of William Harris, of Bromhill, and Margaret Ellis, for that they be not conformable to the orders of the church, nor to the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, to use your lordship's pleasure with them, as you think good; not doubting, with the punishment of these and other before sent to your lordship, but that the parish of Great Burstled and Bilerica shall be brought to good conformity. Thus, committing your good lordship to the tuition of the Almighty God, we take our leave. From Great Burstled, this present 2d day of March, 1556.

“Your lordship's to command,
“J. MORDANT, E. TYREL.”

After the receipt of these letters, bishop Bonner entering to examination of these four women above named, laid and objected the like articles to them as after his usual form he used to minister, and are before expressed. Whereunto the said women likewise agreeing in the same spirit and doctrine, accorded in their answers as the others before them.

After their answers received, they were brought again, about the 13th of April, to further examination, and so at length to their final judgment; where Katharine Hut, widow, standing before the bishop, boldly and constantly stood to that which she had said before, neither yielding to his fair promises, nor overthrown with his terror. Who being required of the sacrament to say her mind, and to revoke herself unto the fellowship of the Catholic faith, openly protested, saying, I deny it to be God, because it is a dumb god, and made with men's hands. Wherein the good and faithful martyr of Christ firmly persisting, so received her sentence, being condemned of Bonner to the fire; which she with great constancy sustained by the grace and strength of the Lord, and did there abide for the cause and love of Christ.

Joan Horns, maid, brought forth likewise to her judgment and condemnation, with like firmness and Christian fortitude declared herself a true martyr and follower of Christ's testament, giving no place to the adversary; but being charged that she did not believe the sacrament of Christ's body and blood to be Christ himself, of the which sacrament, contrary to the nature of a sacrament, the adversaries are wont to make an idol-service; to this she protesting openly her mind, said as followeth: If you can make your god to shed blood, or to shew any condition of a true lively body, then will I believe you: but it is but bread, as touching the substance thereof, (meaning the matter whereof the sacrament consisteth;) and that which you call heresy, I trust to serve my Lord God in, &c.

And as concerning the Romish see, she said, My lord, (speaking to Bonner,) I forsake all his abominations; and from them, good Lord, deliver us. From this her stable and constant assertion, when the bishop was too weak to remove her, and too ignorant to convince her, he knocked her down with the butcherly axe of his sentence. And so the holy virgin and martyr, committed to the shambles of the secular sword, was offered up with her other fellows a burnt sacrifice to the Lord.

As touching Margaret Ellis, she likewise persevering in her aforesaid confession, and resisting the false Catholic errors and heresies of the Papists, was by the said Bonner adjudged and condemned; but before the time of her burning came, prevented by death in Newgate prison, departed and slept in the Lord.

No less strength in the grace of the Lord appeared in the other maid, Elizabeth Thackvel, whose heart and mind the Lord had so confirmed in his truth, so armed with patience, that as her adversaries could by no sufficient knowledge of scripture convince her affirmation, so by no forcible attempts they could remove her confession. Whereupon she standing to the death, being in the like sort condemned by the said bishop, gave her life willingly and mildly for the confirmation and sealing up of the sincere truth of God's word.

These three innocent and godly women, thus falsely and wrongfully by men condemned for the just quarrel and cause of God's gospel, were had to Smithfield, and there, cruelly bound to the stake, gave their bodies to the tormentors, and their spirits they commended to God. For whose glory they were willing and ready to suffer whatsoever the cruel hands of their enemies should work against them, dying more joyfully in the flaming fire, than some of them that burned them did peradventure in their beds. Such a Lord is God, glorious and wonderful in all his saints.

The martyrdom of these saints of God was the 16th of May, 1556.

THOMAS DROWRY, a blind Boy, and THOMAS CROKER, bricklayer, Martyrs.

Ye heard a little before of two men, the one blind, the other lame, which suffered about the 15th of May. And here is not to be forgotten another as godly a couple, which suffered the like martyrdom for the same cause of religion at Gloucester: of which two, the one was a blind boy, named Thomas Drowry, (mentioned before in the history of bishop Hooper, whom the said virtuous bishop confirmed then in the Lord, and in the doctrine of his word.)

With him also was burned another in the same place, and at the same fire, in Gloucester, about the 5th of May, whose name was Thomas Croker, bricklayer.

Concerning which blind boy, how long he was in prison, and in what year he suffered, I am not certain. Of this credible intelligence I have received by the testimony of the register then of Gloucester, named John Taylor, alias Barker, that the said blind boy at his last examination and final condemnation, was brought (by the officers under whose custody he had remained) before Dr. Williams, then chancellor of Gloucester, sitting judicially with the said register Taylor, in the consistory, near unto the south door, in the nether end of the church of Gloucester. Where the said chancellor then ministered unto the boy such usual articles as are accustomed in such cases, and are sundry times mentioned in this book.—Amongst which he chiefly urged the article of transubstantiation, saying,

Dost thou not believe, that after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, there remaineth the very real body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar?—To whom the blind boy answered, No, that I do not.

Chan. Then thou art an heretic, and shalt be burned. But who hath taught thee this heresy?

Boy. Yon, master chancellor.

Chan. Where, I pray thee?

Boy. Even in yonder place; (pointing with his hand, and turning towards the pulpit, standing upon the north side of the church.)

Chan. When did I teach thee so?

Boy. When you preached there (naming the day) a sermon to all men, as well as to me, upon the sacrament. You said, the sacrament was to be received spiritually by faith, and not carnally and really, as the Papists have heretofore taught.

Chan. Then do as I have done, and thou shalt live as I do, and escape burning.

Boy. Though you can so easily dispense with yourself, and mock with God, the world, and your conscience, yet will I not so do.

Chan. Then God have mercy upon thee: for I will read the condemnation sentence against thee.

Boy. God's will be fulfilled.

The register being herewith somewhat moved, stood up, and said to the chancellor: Fie for shame, man! will you read the sentence against him, and condemn yourself! Away, away, and substitute some other to give sentence and judgment.

Chan. No, register, I will obey the law, and give sentence myself according to mine office.

And so he read the sentence condemnatory against the boy, (with an unhappy tongue and a more unhappy conscience,) delivering him over unto the secular power, who, the said 5th day of May, brought the said blind boy to the place of execution at Gloucester, together with Thomas Croker, condemned also for the like testimony of the truth. Where both together, in one fire, most constantly and joyfully yielded their souls into the hands of the Lord Jesus.

Three burnt at Beckles, May 21.

After the death of these above rehearsed, were three men burnt at Beckles, in Suffolk, in one fire, about the 21st of May, anno 1556; whose names are here specified: Thomas Spicer, of Winston, labourer; John Denny, and Edmund Poole.

This Thomas Spicer was a single man, of the age of 19 years, and by vocation a labourer, dwelling in Winston, in the county of Suffolk, and there taken in his master's house in summer, about the rising of the sun, being in his bed, by James Ling and John Keretch, of the same town, and William Daveis, of Debnam, in the said county.

The occasion of his taking was, for that he would not go to their popish church to hear mass, and receive their idol, at the commandment of sir John Tyrel, knight, of Gippinghall, in Suffolk, and certain other justices there, who sent both him and them to the dungeon, in Suffolk, till at length they were all three together brought before Dunning, then chancellor of Norwich, and Mr. Mings, the register, at the town of Beckles, to be examined.

And there the said chancellor, endeavouring what he could to turn them from the truth, could by no means prevail; wherefore, minding in the end to give sentence on them, he burst out in tears, entreating them to remember themselves, and to turn again to the holy mother church, for that they were deceived, and out of the truth, and that they should not wilfully cast away themselves: with such like words.

Now as he was thus labouring them, and seemed very loath to read the sentence, (for they were the first that he condemned in that diocese,) the register, sitting by, being weary of tarrying, or else perceiving the martyrs to be at a point, called upon the chancellor in haste to rid them out of the way, and to make an end. At which words the chancellor read the condemnation over them with tears, and delivered them to the secular power.

The Articles.

The articles objected to these, and commonly to all other condemned in that diocese, by Dr. Hopton, bishop of Norwich, and by Dunning, his chancellor, were these:

First, It was alleged against them, that they believed not the pope of Rome to be supreme head, immediately under Christ, on earth, of the universal Catholic church.

2. That they believed not holy bread and holy water, ashes, palms, and all other like ceremonies used in the church, to be good and laudable for stirring up the people to devotion.

3. That they believed not, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, the very natural body of Christ, and no other substance of bread and wine, to be in the sacrament of the altar.

4. That they believed it to be idolatry to worship Christ in the sacrament of the altar.

5. That they took bread and wine in remembrance of Christ's passion.

6. That they would not follow the cross in procession, nor to be confessed to a priest.

7. That they affirmed no mortal man to have of himself free will to do good or evil.

For this doctrine and articles above prefixed, these three, as is aforesaid, were condemned by Dr. Dunning, and committed to the secular power, sir John Silliard being the same time high sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk. And the next day following upon the same, they were all burnt together in the said town of Beckles.

In the mean time while these good men were at the stake, and had prayed, they said the Creed, and when they came to the reciting of the Catholic church, sir John Silliard spake to them, That is well said, sirs ; I am glad to hear you say you do believe the Catholic church : that is the best word I have heard of you yet.

To which Edmund Poole answered, That though they believe the Catholic church, yet do they not believe in their Popish church, which is no part of Christ's Catholic church, and therefore no part of their belief.

When they rose from prayer, they all went joyfully to the stake, and being bound thereto, and the fire burning about them, they praised God in such an audible voice, that it was wonderful to all those that stood by and heard them.

Then one Robert Bacon, dwelling in the said Beekles, a very enemy of God's truth, and a persecutor of his people, being there present within hearing thereof, willed the tormentors to throw one faggot to stop the knaves' breaths, as he termed them ; so hot was his burning charity. But these good men, not regarding their malice, confessed the truth, and yielded their lives to the death for the testimony of the same, very gloriously and joyfully.

Four Men condemned at Lewis.

In June next following, about the 6th of the same month, four martyrs suffered together at Lewis, whose names were these: Thomas Harland, of Woodmancote, carpenter; J. Oswald, of Woodmancote, husbandman; Thomas Avington, of Ardingly, turner; and Thomas Read.

To Thomas Harland, I find in the bishop of London's register, it was objected his not coming to church. Whereunto he answered, That after the mass was restored, he never had will to hear the same, because (said he) it was in Latin, which I did not understand; and therefore as good, quoth he, never a whit as never the better.

John Oswald denied to answer any thing, until his accusers should be brought face to face before him; and nevertheless said, That fire and faggots could not make him afraid: but as the good preachers which were in king Edward's time, have suffered and gone before, so was he ready to suffer and come after, and would be glad thereof.

These four, after long imprisonment in the King's Bench, were burned together at Lewis, in Sussex, in one fire, the day aforesaid.

Two others in the same town.

In the same town of Lewis, and in the same month likewise, were burned Thomas Whood, minister, and Thomas Milles, about the 20th day of the same month, for resisting the erroneous and heretical doctrine of the pretended Catholic church of Rome.

A Merchant's Servant burnt at Leicester.

We read of a certain young man, a merchant's servant, who for the like godliness suffered cruel persecution of the Papists, and was burnt at Leicester the 26th day of the month of June.

The Death of WILLIAM SLECH, in the King's Bench.

The last day of the month of May, in the year aforesaid, William Slech being in prison for the said doctrine of the Lord's gospel, and the confession of his truth, died in the King's-Bench, and was buried on the back side of the prison; for that the Romish Catholic spirituality thought him not worthy to come within the Popish holy church-yards, neither in any other Christian burial, as they call it.

Two others dead in the same place.

William Adherall, minister, imprisoned in the King's-Bench, there died the 24th of the same month, and was buried in the back side. Also John Clement, wheelwright, who dying in the said prison, upon the dunghill, was buried in the back side two days after, viz. the 25th day of June.

A Story of one GREGORY CROW, marvellously preserved with his New Testament, upon the Seas, May 26, 1556.

Forasmuch as we are now about the month of May, before we proceed any farther, and because the story is not long, and not unworthy of being noted, it shall not grieve the studious reader to hear the following story, which was written to me by one of the party, called Thomas Morse.

Upon Tuesday after Whitsunday, the 26th day of May, in this present year 1556, (or else as he rather thinketh in the year before, 1555,) a certain poor man, whose name was Gregory Crow, dwelling in Maulden, went to the sea, minding to have gone into Kent for fulling earth; but by the way, being foul weather, was driven upon a sand, where presently the boat sunk, and was full of water, so that the men were forced to hold themselves by the mast of the boat, and all things that would swim did swim out of her. Amongst which Crow saw his Testament in the water, and caught it, and put it in his bosom. Now it was ebbing water, so that within one hour the boat was dry, but broken so as they could not save her; but they went themselves upon the sand (being ten miles at least from the land,) and there made their prayers together, that God would send some ship that way to save them, (being two men and one boy in all;) for they might not tarry upon the sand above half an hour, but it would be flood. In the which time they found their chest, wherein was money to the sum of five pounds six shillings and eight pence, the which money the man which was with the said Crow (whose name I know not) took and gave unto Crow, who was owner thereof; and he cast it into the sea, saying, If the Lord will save our lives, he will provide us a living. And so they went upon the mast there, hanging by the arms and legs for the space of ten hours; in the which time the boy was so weary, and beaten with the sea, that he fell off, and was drowned.

And when the water was gone again, and the sand dry, Crow said to his man, It were best for us to take down our masts, and when the flood cometh we will sit upon them, and so it may please God to bring us to some ship that may take us up. Which thing they did, and so at ten of the clock of the night of the same Tuesday, the flood did bear up the mast wherupon they sat.

And upon the Wednesday in the night, the man died, being overcome with hunger and watching. So there was none left but this Crow, who driving up and down in the sea, called upon God as he could, and might not sleep, for fear that the sea would have beaten him off.

So at length I myself (said Thomas Morse) being laden to Antwerp with my crayer, going from Lee upon Friday, having within my crayer of mariners and merchants to the number of 46 persons, and so coming to the Foreland, the wind was not very good, so that I was constrained to go somewhat out of my way, being in the afternoon about six of the clock; where at the last we saw a thing afar off, appearing unto us like a small buoy, that fishermen use to lay with their hooks.

When we saw it, some said, Let us have some fish. And I said to him that was at the helm, Keep your course away, for we shall but hinder the fishermen, and have no fish neither; and so at my commandment he did. But at length he at the helm, standing higher than all we did, said, Mc-think, master, it is a man. But yet they, being in doubt that it was but a fisher's buoy, turned the ship from him again to keep their course.

Crow beholding the ship to turn from him, being then in utter despair, and ready now to perish with watching, famine, and moreover miserably beaten with the seas, at last took his mariner's cap from his head, and holding up the same with his arm as high as he could, thought by shaking it as well as he might, to give them some token of better sight.

Wherenpon the steersman more sensibly perceiving a thing to move, advertised us again, declaring how he did see plainly a man's arm; and with that we all beheld him well, and so came to him and took him up. And as soon as we had him in our ship, he began to put his hand in his bosom; and one asked him if he had money there. No, said he, I have a book here; I think it be wet. And so drew out his Testament, which we then dried. But the sea had so beaten him, that his eyes, nose, and mouth, were almost closed with salt, that the heat of his face and the weather had made. So we made a fire, and shifted him with dry clothes, and gave him aqua composita to drink, and such meat as was in the ship, and then let him sleep.

The next day we awaked him about eight of the clock in the morning, and his blood began somewhat to appear in his flesh, (for when we took him up, his flesh was even as though it had been sodden, or as a drowned man's is,) and then we talked with him of all the matter before rehearsed. And so sailing to Antwerp, the merchants which saw the thing, published the same in Antwerp; and because it was wonderful, the people there, both men and women, came to the ship to see him, and some of them gave him a petticoat, and some a shirt, some hosen, and some money, (always noting how he cast away his money, and kept his book.)

And many of the women wept when they heard and saw him: and master-governor of the English nation there had him before him, and talked with him of all the matter, and pitying his case, commanded the officer of the English house to go with him to the free oste-houses amongst the English merchants, and I with them; at three houses there were given him six pounds ten shillings. And so from thence he went with me to Rouen, where the people also came to him to see him, marvelling at the great works of God.

And thus much concerning this poor man with his New Testament preserved in the sea, which Testament the pope's clergy condemneth on the land. In which story this by the way understand, good reader, that if this poor man, thus found and preserved in the sea, with a New Testament in his bosom, had had instead of that a pix with a consecrated host about him, no doubt it had been rung ere this time all Christendom over for a miracle, so far as the pope hath any land. But to let the pope with his false miracles go, let us return again to our matter begun, and adjoin another history of much like condition, testified likewise by the information of the said Thomas Morse above mentioned, to the intent to make known the worthy acts of the Almighty, that he may be magnified in all his wondrous works. The story is thus declared, which happened anno 1556, about Michaelmas.

Another like Story of God's Providence upon three men delivered upon the Sea.

There was a ship (saith the said Thomas Morse) whereof I had a part, going toward the Bay for salt, with two ships of Bricklesey, which were together going for salt, as before is said. At that time we were within ten miles of the North Foreland, otherwise called Tenet, the wind did come so contrary to our ship, that we were forced to go clean out of the way, and the other ships kept their course still, until our ship was almost out of sight of them. And then they saw a thing driving upon the sea, and hoisted out their boat, and went into it: and it was three men sitting upon a piece of their ship, which had sitten so two days and two nights.

There had been in their ship eight men more which were drowned, being all Frenchmen, dwelling in a place in France called Oloronne. They had been at Dantzic, and lost their ship about Oxford Naas, as might be learned by their words. They were men that feared God: the one of them was owner of the ship. Their exercise, while they were in our ship, was, that after their coming in they gave thanks for their deliverance: both morning and evening they exercised prayer, and also before and after meat; and when they came into France, our ships went to the same place where these men dwelled, and one of them did sell unto our men their ship's lading of salt, and did use them very courteously and friendly, and not at that time only, but always whensoever that ship cometh thither, (as she hath been there twice since,) he always doth for them so that they can lack nothing. I should have noted, that after our ship had taken up those three men out of the sea, they had the wind fair presently, and came and overtook the other two ships again; and so they proceeded in their voyage together.

For the greater credit of this story, to satisfy either the doubtful, or to prevent the quarreller, I have not only alleged the name of the party which was the doer of it, but also expressed the matter in his own words. Of him I received it: a man so well known amongst the merchants of London, that whosoever heareth the name of Thomas Morse will never doubt thereof. And again, the matter itself being so notoriously known to merchants, as well here as at Antwerp, that though his name were not expressed, the story cannot be destitute of witnesses.

THIRTEEN MARTYRS burned at Stratford le-Bow.

The following thirteen persons were apprehended in the different places where they lived, the greater part of them being inhabitants of the county of Essex, and were sent at various times up to London, to be examined by bishop Bonner concerning their religious principles:

Henry Wyc,	George Searls,
William Holywell,	Lyon Couch,
Ralph Jackson,	Henry Adlington,
Laurence Peru,	John Ronth,
John Derifall,	Edmund Hurst,
Thomas Bowyer,	Elizabeth Peper,
and Agnes George.

On the ninth of June they were all brought together before Dr. Darbyshire, the bishop's chancellor, who, in form of law, administered to them the following articles:

1. That there is on earth a Catholic church, wherein the religion of Christ is truly professed.

To this they all answered in the affirmative; but added, They believed the true faith of Christ was wherever the word of God was truly preached.

2. That there were seven sacraments.

They all answered in the negative: some affirmed, That in the church of Christ there were only two sacraments, viz. baptism and the Lord's supper; others desired to believe as the scriptures taught them ; and others refused to reply, not properly understanding these points.

3. That they were baptized in the faith of the Catholic church, professing, by their godfathers, &c. the religion of Christ, and to renounce the devil and all his works, &c.

To this they all assented without exception.

4. That when they came to years of discretion, they did not depart from the said profession and faith, and did not disprove any part thereof for several years.

The greater part of them answered in the affirmative. One of the women added, That in the days of king Edward VI. she departed from her old faith and religion, and embraced the gospel of Christ, as it was then taught.

5. That of late they had swerved from their former Catholic faith, and spoken against the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and authority of the papal see.

This, upon the whole, they confessed to be true.

One of them said, the mass was of such a nature, that he could not, in his own conscience, believe it to be authorized from God. Another observed, that for nine or ten years past he could not approve the mass nor the sacrament of the altar, because they could not be proved from the scripture of truth ; declaring, at the same time, that at the age of fourteen he had taken an oath against the authority of the papal see, and would by the grace of God firmly abide by the same.

6. That they refused to be reconciled to the unity of the church, or to confess the lawfulness of the papal see.

To this article they all, except two, answered in the affirmative. Those who refused, said they did not understand the import of the same. The two women added, They refused to be reconciled to the faith and religion that was then used in the realm of England, though they never refused to be reconciled and brought to the unity of the Catholic church of Christ.

7. That disproving the service of the church, they refused to come to their parish churches, denied the bodily presence of Christ in the sacrament, called the mass an abomination, &c.

This was answered in general in the affirmative ; but one denied that he called the mass an abomination, or an idol : another, though he granted the article, confessed his infirmity, that he went to his parish church, and received it before he was put in prison.

8. This article related to their being brought before the commissioners, and by them sent to the bishop of London ; to which they answered in the following order.

Edmund Hurst, Ralph Jackson, and George Searls, answered in the affirmative.

Henry Wye said, that he was brought before several justices of peace in Essex, concerning one Highted, his late master, and thereupon committed to Colechester castle, and from thence sent to London to the bishop of London, for farther examination.

William Holywell made the like confession, excepting the circumstance of Highted.

John Derifall said, he was called before the lord Rich, and Mr. Mildmay, of Chelmsford, and by them sent to the bishop of London, to be farther examined.

Thomas Bowyer said, he was brought before one Mr. Wiseman, of Falsted, and by him sent to Colechester castle, and from thence to the bishop of London, to be farther examined.

Lyon Couch said, that he was three times brought before the king and queen's commissioners, and by them sent to the bishop of London.

Henry Adlington said, that coming to Newgate to speak with one Gratwick, prisoner there for the testimony of Jesus Christ, was apprehended and brought before Dr. Story, and by him sent to the bishop of London.

Agnes George said, that she was committed to prison in Colchester, by Mr. Maynard, an alderman of the town, for refusing to go to church, and by him sent to the bishop of London.

Elizabeth Peper said, that she was apprehended by two constables and an alderman, for refusing to come to church, and by them sent to the bishop of London, to be farther examined.

9. That they believed the premises to be true, as confessed above, and that they were of the diocese of London.

This was generally agreed to.

Elizabeth Peper added, she was of the town of Colchester ; and Agnes George said, she was of the parish of Barefold.

These thirteen persons being thus examined by the bishop of London's chancellor, in open court, persisting in their answers, and refusing to recant, or be reconciled to the church of Rome, had sentence of condemnation pronounced against them ; and being delivered over to the secular power, were all sent to Newgate.

Three others were also condemned to die at the same time ; but before the day appointed for their execution, a reprieve was sent them by cardinal Pole.

On the Sunday following the condemnation of these pious Christians, Dr. Feeknem, dean of St. Paul's, told the audience in his sermon, that they held as many tenets as there were faces among the whole ; which being represented to them, they drew up the following confession of their faith, to which they respectively subscribed their names :

1. There are but two sacraments in Christ's church, that is, the sacrament of baptism, and the Lord's supper. For in these are contained the faith of Christ his church ; that is, the two testaments, the law and the gospel. The effect of the law is repentance, and the effect of the gospel remission of sins.

2. We believe there is a visible church, wherein the word of God is preached, and the holy sacraments truly administered, visible to the world, although it be not credited, and by the death of saints confirmed, as it was in the time of Elias the prophet, as well as now.

3. The see of Rome is the see of Antichrist, the congregation of the wicked, &c. whereof the pope is head under the devil.

4. The mass is not only a profanation of the Lord's supper, but also a blasphemous idol.

5. God is neither spiritually nor corporally in the sacrament of the altar, and there remaineth no substance in the same, but only the substance of bread and wine.

For these the articles of our belief, we being condemned to die, do willingly offer our corruptible bodies to be dissolved in the fire, all with one voice assenting and consenting therunto, and in no point dissenting or disagreeing from any of our former articles.

Early in the morning of the 28th of June, 1556, being the day appointed for their execution, they were conducted from Newgate to Stratford-le-Bow, the place allotted for them to confirm that faith they had professed, and to which they had so strenuously adhered.

On their arrival at the destined place, the sheriff made use of a stratagem to bring them over to the Romish faith. He divided them into two companies, and placed them in separate apartments. This done, he visited one company, told them the other had recanted, by which their lives would be saved; and exhorted them to follow their example, and not cast themselves away by their own mere obstinacy.

But this scheme failed in its effect: for they told the sheriff, that their faith was not built on man, but on Christ crucified.

The sheriff, finding his project fail with the first party to whom he applied, had recourse to the same means with the others, admonishing them to recant like wise men, and not be guilty of destroying themselves by their own bigotry and prejudice.

But they answered to the same effect as their brethren had done before, assuring the sheriff that their faith was not built on man, but on Christ and his infallible word.

They were then brought from their different apartments, and led together to the place of execution, where they embraced each other, and after praying in the most fervent manner, prepared themselves for their fate.

These thirteen steadfast believers in Christ were chained to different stakes, but all burnt together in one fire, shewing such love to each other, and firm faith in their Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, that the concourse of spectators assembled on the occasion were astonished at the undaunted behaviour of so many poor innocents thus patiently enduring the acutest torments, rather than comply with the errors and superstitions of the church of Rome.

In the diocese of Litchfield, about the 14th of June, in the same year, John Colstock, who was lately come from London before, and now dwelling at Wellington, though he suffered no martyrdom, yet sustained some trouble, being attached and examined by the bishop, named Ralph Bane, for his religion, especially for two points: in holding against the reality of Christ in the sacrament, and against auricular confession to be made to the priest. For which cause being compelled to recant, he was enjoined in the church of St. Cedde to bear a faggot before the cross, bare-headed, having in the one hand a taper, and in the other a pair of beads, &c.

Amongst divers other which in the same diocese, and the same time, were suspected and troubled for the like, was Thomas Flier, of Uttoxeter, shoemaker: Nicholas Ball, of Uttoxeter, capper; Thomas Pyot, of Chedull; and Henry Crimes, for marrying his wife on Palm-Sunday even, &c.

Concerning which Thomas Flier, being a godly and zealous man, this furthermore is to be noted, that whereas in the town of Uttoxeter commandment was directed unto him, amongst others, from the ordinary, for pulling down monuments of superstition, and namely the rood-loft, or place where the crucifix stood; he being one of the churchwardens or sidemen, on a time had talk upon the same with certain of his neighbours, where one wished them ill to achieve that should go about such an act.

What words passed else amongst them, ministering matter of further provocation, it is not perfectly known. In fine, the said Flier being offended, and afterwards meeting with him that had used such words before, began to commune with him of the matter: but in the end the man so little repented him of those sayings, that he added yet more fierce words, and at length strokes also, in such wise that the said Thomas Flier was slain. And yet so was the matter handled, and such amends was made with money by the murderer and his friends to the said Flier's wife, that he suffered little or nothing for the same, save only that he was banished the town, and sworn and bound never to come in it so long as the said Flier's wife should live.

Three Men dead in the Prison of the King's Bench.

After the burning of these in Stratford, the same month died in the above prison, one Thomas Parret, and was buried in the back side the 27th of the month abovesaid. Also, Martin Hunt in the same prison was famished the 29th day. At which time likewise died in the same prison, as I find recorded, one John Norice, and after the same sort as the other was buried on the back side of the said prison the day above mentioned.

The Martyrdoms of ROBERT BERNARD, ADAM FOSTER, and ROBERT LAWSON, who were burned at St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk.

The first of these martyrs was a poor labourer, who lived in the parish of Franksden, in the county of Suffolk. Being apprehended by the constable of the parish for not going to church, he was brought before Dr. Hopton, bishop of Norwich, who inquired of him whether he had been with a priest at Easter to confess, or whether he had received the sacrament of the altar.

To these questions Bernard frankly replied, No, I have not been with the priest, nor confessed myself unto him; but I have confessed my sins to Almighty God, and I trust he hath forgiven me: wherefore I need not go to the priest for such matters, as he cannot forgive his own sins.

The bishop, after using various arguments to go to confession, without effect, pronounced him an heretic; on which Bernard said, My lord, it grieveth me not one whit to be called an heretic by you, for so your forefathers called the prophets and apostles of Christ long before this time.

Incensed at this abrupt reply, the bishop arose, and bid Bernard follow him. He then went to the sacrament of the altar; to which he kneeled and prayed, and severely reproved Bernard for not doing the same: but our martyr told him, he knew no authority for such behaviour, in the word of God.

The bishop then addressing him, pointed to the pix over the altar, in which the wafer or host is kept, and said, Why, lewd fellow, whom seest thou yonder? Nobody, my lord, replied Bernard. Seest not thou thy Maker, varlet? demanded the prelate. My Maker! (returned the countryman) no, I see nothing but a few clouts hanging together in a heap.

This answer so irritated the bishop, that he commanded the gaoler to take him away and lay irons enough on him, declaring that he would reduce him to subjection before he had done with him.

The next day he was again brought before the bishop, who asked him if he retained the same opinions as he professed yesterday. To which Bernard replied, Yes, my lord, I remember myself well, for I am the same man to-day that I was yesterday, and hope I shall remain steadfast to the end of my life in the principles I have professed.

One of his lordship's attendants being desirous of examining Bernard himself, advised the bishop to prevent giving himself any farther trouble, by committing his examination to him. Having obtained permission so to do, he took Bernard to an inn, where several Popish emissaries were assembled. They first used many fair words and alluring promises, to persuade him to abjure what they called his heretical opinions. This, however, not taking effect, they threatened him with whipping, the stocks, and burning; but all to no purpose. He told them, Friends, I am not better than my Master, Christ, and the prophets, whom your forefathers served after this sort; and I for his sake am content to suffer the like at your hands, if God should so permit, trusting that he will strengthen me in the same, according to his promise, and that of all his ministers.

After this declaration, they took him back to the bishop, who, according to the usual form of proceeding in the court, condemned him as an heretic; and he was delivered over to the secular power.

ADAM FOSTER lived in the parish of Mendlesham, in the county of Suffolk. He was apprehended in his own house by two constables, at the command of a neighbouring justice, for absenting himself from mass, and not receiving the sacrament at Easter. Being taken before the bishop of Norwich, who examined him concerning his religious principles, and finding him steadfast in his faith, according to the doctrines set forth in the days of king Edward VI. he condemned him as an heretic, and he was delivered to the secular power to be proceeded against according to law.

ROBERT LAWSON, by trade a linen-draper, was apprehended on the same account as the two former; and being brought before sir J. Tyrel, he committed him to the prison of Eye, in Suffolk. After laying there a short time, he was conducted to the bishop of Norwich for examination, when, holding fast to the principles he had professed, and also withstanding every effort made use of by the bishop to bring him to recant, he was deemed an heretic, received sentence of death, and was delivered into the hands of the sheriff, in order for execution.

When these three martyrs were carried to their deaths, after they had made their prayer, being at the stake, and the tormentors attending the fire, they most triumphantly ended their lives, in such happy and blessed condition, as did notably set forth their constancy and joyful end, to the praise of God, and their commendation in him, and also to the encouragement of others in the same cause to do the like. The Lord of strength fortify us to stand as his true soldiers, in what standing soever he shall think it good to place us!

In the examination of Roger Bernard, he was compared by the priests to JOHN FORTUNE, and called his scholar. This John Fortune, otherwise called Butler, of Hintlesham, in Suffolk, was by his occupation a blacksmith, whom they had before them in examination a little before, the 20th of April. In spirit he was zealous and ardent, in the scriptures ready, in Christ's cause stout and valiant, in his answers marvellous, and no less patient in his wrongful suffering than constant in his doctrine. Whether he was burned, or died in prison, I cannot certainly find; but rather I suppose that he was burned. Certain it is, howsoever he was made away, he never yielded. What his answers and examinations were before Dr. Parker and the bishop, ye shall hear, written with his own hand.

The Examination of John Fortune, before Dr. Parker and Mr. Foster.

First, Dr. Parker asked me how I believed in the Catholic faith? And I asked him which faith he meant; whether the faith that Stephen had, or the faith of them that put Stephen to death? Dr. Parker being moved, said, What a naughty fellow is this! you shall see anon he will deny the blessed sacrament of the altar.

Then said Mr. Foster, I know you well enough: you are a busy merchant: how sayest thou by the blessed mass?

And I stood still, and made no answer.

Then said Mr. Foster, Why speakest thou not, and makest the gentleman an answer? And I said, Silence is a good answer to a foolish question.

Then said the doctor, I am sure he will deny the blessed sacrament of the altar also. And I said, I know none such, but only the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Then said he, You deny the order of the seven sacraments; and why dost thou not believe in the sacrament of the altar? And I said, Because it is not written in God's book.

Then said he, You will not believe unwritten verities. And I said, I will believe that those unwritten verities that agree with the written verities, be true; but those unwritten verities that be of your own making, and invented by your own brain, I do not believe.

Well, said Mr. Foster, you shall be whipped and burned for this gear, I trow.

Then said I, If you knew how these words do rejoice my heart, you would not have spoken them. Why, thou fool, (said he,) dost thou rejoice in whipping? Yea, said I; for it is written in the scripture, and Christ saith, Thou shalt be whipped for my name's sake; and since the time that the sword of tyranny came into your hands, I heard of none that was whipped: happy were I, if I be the first to suffer this persecution.

Away with him then, said he; for he is ten times worse than Samuel. And so he was carried to prison again.

The second Examination of John Fortune, before the Bishop of Norwich.

When I came before the bishop, he asked me, if I did not believe in the Catholic church? I said, I believe in that church whereof Christ is the head.

Then said the bishop, Dost thou not believe that the pope is supreme head of the church? And I said, No, Christ is head of the true church.

So do I believe also, said the bishop: but the pope is God's vicar upon earth, and the head of the church, and I believe that he hath power to forgive sins also.

Then said I, The pope is but a man, and the prophet David saith, that no man can deliver his brother, nor make agreement for him unto God: for it cost more to redeem their souls, so that he must let that alone for ever.

Then the bishop said, Like as the bell-wether weareth her bell, and is the head of the flock of sheep; so is the pope our head. And as the hives of bees have a master-bee, that bringeth the bees to the hives again; so doth our head bring us home again to our true church.

Then I asked him, whether the pope were a spiritual man? And he said, Yea. And I said again, They are spiteful men, for in 17 months there were three popes, and one poisoned another for that presumptuous seat of Antichrist.

It is maliciously spoken, said he; for thou must obey the power, and not the man. (And thus was the pope denied to be the supreme head.) Well, said he, what sayest thou to the ceremonies of the church?

And I answered, All things that are not planted by my heavenly Father, shall be plucked up by the roots, said Christ. For they are not from the beginning, neither shall they continue to the end.

Bishop. They are good and godly, and necessary to be used.

For. St. Paul calleth them weak and beggarly.

Bishop. No, that is a lie.

I hearing that, said, That St. Paul writeth thus in the fourth to the Galatians, "You foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye seek to be in bondage to these weak and beggarly ceremonies?" Now which of you do lie, you or St. Paul? And also it is said, that works instituted and enjoined without the commandment of God, pertain not to the worship of God, according to the text, Matt. xv. "In vain do men worship me with men's traditions and commandments!" and St. Paul saith, "Wherefore do ye carry us away from the grace of Christ to another kind of doctrine?" And Christ openly rebuked the scribes, lawyers, pharisees, doctors, priests, bishops, and hypocrites, for making God's commandments of none effect, to support their own tradition.

Bishop. Thou liest, there is not such a word in all the scriptures, thou naughty heretic; thou art worse than all other heretics: for Hooper and Bradford allowed them to be good, and thou dost not. Away with him.

Here you may perceive, how that the Catholic church cannot err, but whatsoever they say must needs be true. And so my lord bishop cannot lie, as it may appear to all men plainly in the text.

The third Examination of John Fortune.

The next day I was brought before the said bishop again, where he made a sermon upon the sixth chapter of St. John's gospel, of Christ's words, "I am the bread that came down from heaven, &c." And thereupon had a great bibble-babble to no purpose. So in the end I was called before him, and he said to me, How believest thou in the sacrament of the altar? dost thou not believe, that after the consecration there is the real substance of the body of Christ? And I answered him, That is the greatest plague that ever came into England.

Why so? said he. I said, If I were a bishop, and you a poor man as I am, I would be ashamed to ask such a question; for a bishop should be apt to teach, and not to learn.

I am appointed by the law, said the bishop, to teach; so are not you. And I said, Your law breaketh out very well, for you have burned up the true bishops and preachers, and maintained liars to be in their stead.

Bishop. Now you may understand that he is a traitor; for he denieth the higher powers.

For. I am no traitor; for St. Paul saith, "All souls must obey the higher powers: And I resist not the higher powers concerning my body; but I must resist your evil doctrine wherewith you would infect my soul."

Then said a doctor, My lord, you do not well: let him answer shortly to his articles.

Bis. How sayest thou? Make an answer quickly to these articles.

For. St. Paul saith, Heb. x. "Christ did one sacrifice once for all, and sat him down on the right hand of his Father," triumphing over hell and death, making intercession for sins.

Bish. I ask thee no such question, but make answer to this article.

For. If it be not God before the consecration, it is not God after: for God is without beginning and without ending.

Then said he, Lo, what a stiff heretic is this! He hath denied altogether. How sayest thou, Is it idolatry to worship the blessed sacrament, or no?

For. God is a spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

Bish. I ask thee no such question; answer me directly.

For. I answer, that this is the god Mauzzim, that robbeth God of his honour.

Bish. It is pity that the ground beareth thee, or that thou hast a tongue to speak.

Then said the scribe, Here are a great many more articles. Then said the bishop, Away with him; for he hath spoken too much.

Another Examination of John Fortune.

And when I came to my examination again, the bishop asked me, if I would stand unto mine answer that I had made before?—And I said, Yea, for I had spoken nothing but the truth.

Then I desired him to stand to the text, and he read the gospel on Corpus Christi day, which said, I am the bread which came down from heaven: believest thou not this? And I said, Yea, truly. And he said, Why dost thou deny the sacrament? Because your doctrine is false.

Then said he, How can that be false which is spoken in the scripture? And I said, Christ said, I am the bread, and you say the bread is he: therefore your doctrine is false.

And he said, Dost thou not believe that the bread is he? And I said, No.

Bish. I will bring thee to it by the scriptures.

For. Hold that fast, my lord; for that is the best argument that you have yet.

Bish. Thou shalt be burned like an heretic.

For. Who shall give judgment upon me?

Bish. I will judge an hundred such as thou art, and never be shriven upon it.

For. Is there not law for the spirituality as well as for the temporality?

And sir Clement Higham said, Yes: what meanest thou by that?

For. When a man is perjured by the law, he is cast over the bar, and sitteth no more in judgment: and the bishop is a perjured man, and ought to sit in judgment on no man.

Bish. How provest thou that?

For. Because you took an oath in king Henry's days, to resist the pope. So both spiritual and temporal are perjured, that here can be no true judgment.

Bish. Thinkest thou to escape judgment by that? No, for my chaneellor shall judge thee. He took no oath, for he was then out of the realm.

Mr. Higham. It is time to weed out such fellows as you be indeed.

Bish. Good fellow, why believest not thou in the sacrament of the altar?

For. Because I find it not in God's book, nor yet in the doctors. If it were there, I would believe it with all my heart.

Bish. How knowest thou it is not there?

For. Because it is contrary to the second commandment: and seeing it is not written in God's book, why do you then rob me of my life?

Then the bishop having no more to say, commanded the bailiff to take him away.—And thus much touching the examinations of this man. Now whether he died in fire, or was otherwise prevented with death, as I said before, I am uncertain.

In the register of Norwich this I do find, that his sentence of condemnation was drawn and registered; but whether it was pronounced, in the said register is not expressed, according as the usual manner of the notary is so to declare, in the end of the sentence. Nevertheless, this is most certain, that he never abjured nor recanted, howsoever it pleased the Lord by death to call him out of the world.

The Death of J. CARELES in the King's Bench.

About this time, the first day of July, among divers other prisoners which died the same year in the King's Bench, was also John Careles, of Coventry, a weaver; who though he were by the sacred judgment of Almighty God prevented by death, so that he came not to the full martyrdom of his body, yet he is no less worthy to be counted in honour and place of Christ's martyrs, than other that suffered most cruel torments, as well for that he was for the same truth's sake a long time imprisoned, as also for his willing mind and zealous affection he had thereunto, if the Lord had so determined.

The History and Martyrdom of a learned and virtuous young Man, called JULIUS PALMER, some time fellow of Magdalen-College, in Oxford; with two other Martyrs, to wit JOHN GWIN, and THOMAS ASKIN, burned together in Newbery, at a place there called the Sand Pits.

The same month of July, in which Careles, as before is declared, was released out of prison by death, in a short time after, about the 16th day of the same month of July, suffered these three godly martyrs above mentioned, at Newbery, in which number was Julius Palmer, some time student and fellow of Magdalen-college, in Oxford, and afterwards schoolmaster in the town of Reading.

JULIUS PALMER.

As all God's works are wondrous, in calling of all sorts of men to confirm his truth, and to bear witness unto his assured and infallible word, which the adversaries have depraved and corrupted with their fair glozes, to establish the fleshly kingdom of Antichrist, and to purchase security in the world, which they seek to keep in their possession by all possible means, rather cursing with the thunderbolt of excommunication, burning, hanging, drowning, racking, scourging, and persecuting, by secret practice and open violence, the simple sheep of our Saviour Christ, than that their false forged packing should be detected, their estimation impaired, their kitchen cooled, their rents, revenues, goods, lands, and possessions, abated: I say, as God's works be wonderful, which chooseth some of all sorts to confess his gospel; so there is no one example in the whole godly fellowship of martyrs more to be marked, yea, more to be wondered at, than this, that one who all king Edward's days was a Papist within the university of Oxford, and so obstinate as that he did utterly abhor godly prayer, and sincere preaching, and almost by all with whom he lived was therefore likewise abhorred, and, as I may say, pointed at with the finger, did yet after in queen Mary's time suffer most cruel death at the Papists' hands, at Newbery, in Berkshire, for his zealous profession of the blessed truth.

His name was Julius Palmer, born in Coventry, where also his parents dwelt. His father had some time been mayor of the city. How he was brought up in his young and tender years, from his first entering, we know not; but as we have learned, he was some time scholar to Mr. Harley, who taught the free scholars of Magdalen-college, in Oxford, by whose diligence and the goodness of his own capacity, he became a toward young scholar in prose and verse; for he had a very prompt and ready memory, a wit sharp and pregnant. He spake Latin with great facility, and wanted not competent knowledge in the Greek tongue, inso-much that divers times he supplied the room of the Greek reader in his house. He was a subtle disputer, both in the public schools and also at home: he used to say, that he was never so pleasantly occupied as when he came to the hard debating of profound questions in philosophy: so that he hath oftentimes watched and spent the whole night in the discussing and searching out the truth of deep and diffuse questions; and this used he to do sundry times with divers of his equals.

In familiar talk he greatly delighted, for the exercise of his learning, to defend the contrary to that which was affirmed, yet with modesty, and without all ostentation; for he greatly abhorred all overthwart cavilling, all frivolous talk, and unsavoury babbling. He was not captious, but would reason so soberly, and with such probability, that even his adversaries would no less marvel at the dexterity of his invention, than at his comely and decent behaviour in prosecuting the same.

And although he applied to divinity very lately, it appeared that he recompensed the small time of his study with the greatness of his diligence bestowed in the same, and his late coming to the truth, with his earnest and zealous proceeding therein. For by the secret inspiration of God's holy Spirit inwardly working in his heart, he gave an apparent signification in his young years, that if God had spared his life to age, he would have grown to such maturity and ripeness of judgment, as to have been an ornament to Christ's church, and an honour to his country.

In private study he was so indefatigable, that he arose ordinarily every morning at four of the clock, and went not to bed before ten at night. Inso-much that as he grew in years and understanding, so he came to be a bachelor of arts, and at length, for the hopeful appearing in him, to the preferment of a fellowship in Magdalen college, where also he was admitted to the office of a reader in logic, anno 1550. Now, if he had at the first favoured sincere religion, so much as he followed his book, then had we had the less matter to note in him. But indeed he was so much addicted to the Romish faith, that his company and conversation in the same house was altogether with such as were utter enemies to the gospel of Christ. If he came to common prayer at any time, it was by violence and compulsion; for otherwise he came not. Sermons would he hear none himself, nor yet suffer his scholars to resort unto them by his good-will; for he was fully persuaded that they might be better occupied at home. The preachers themselves he did both disdain and despise, and all such as were setters forth of sound doctrine beside. For which contumacy and stubbornness, he was so oft called before the officers of the college, and punished sometimes by the purse, sometimes by the lack of his commons, and otherwhile by certain tasks and exercises of learning enjoined unto him, that divers supposed him to have endeavoured of set purpose continually to seek occasion whereby he might be counted a sufferer for the religion of the Romish church.

In the end, not long before the death of king Edward, that godly prince, certain slanderous libels and railing verses were privily fixed to the walls and doors in sundry places of the college, against the president, which was then Dr. Haddon, whereby was ministered further matter of trouble to Palmer. For whereas it was well known that he, and some of his companions, had a very little while before spoken contumelious words against the president; it could not now be avoided, but that thereby arose a vehement suspicion, that he conspiring with others had contrived, made, and scattered abroad the said slanderous writings. Great inquisition was made in the college, to search out the author of so malicious and spiteful a deed; but nothing could be found and proved against Palmer, or any of his companions. Now Palmer being hereupon examined by the officers, did not only with stout courage deny the fact to have been his, but also spake further many reproachful words touching the said officers, and sent the same to them in writing, whereby he was by them adjudged to be an unworthy member of that society. And so for this and other Popish pranks, continuing obstinate still, he was expelled the house.

After he was thus despatched of his room, he was fain for his own maintenance to apply himself to be a teacher of children in the house of sir Francis Knolles, in which trade he continued until the coming in of queen Mary. And when her visitors were sent to Magdalen-college, under the title of reformation, (whereas all things were better before,) I mean, to displace divers of the followers that were learned, and to put right Catholics, as they termed them, in their rooms; then came this Julius Palmer, waiting to be restored to his living again, of which he had been deprived before, thinking by good right to be restored by them, whose faith and religion (as he said) he did to the uttermost of his power defend and maintain: and indeed at length he obtained the same. Then after he was restored again to his house in queen Mary's reign, God dealt so mercifully with him, that in the end he became of an obstinate Papist an earnest and zealous gospeller.

Concerning whose conversion to the truth, for the more credit to be given to the same, we have here put down a letter written by one Mr. Bullingham, fellow in some part of king Edward's time with the said Palmer, then also of the same faction of religion with him, and towards the latter end of the said king's reign, a voluntary exile in France for Papistry; in queen Mary's days likewise a chaplain unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester; and after the coming in of queen Elizabeth, such an one as for his obstinacy was quite clean despatched from all his livings by her majesty's commissioners. And yet now, God be praised therefore, a most constant professor and earnest teacher of the word of God. This man, at the request of a certain friend of his in London, being desirous to know the truth thereof, wrote unto him concerning this Julius: the copy of which letter we thought good here to insert.
